This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

FRANCE, ENGLAND, AND THE PALMERSTON POLICY.

THE public feeling in England, respecting the state of our foreign relations, exhibits, at the present moment, a remarkable contrast to that of France. In France, all parties and classes are anxious and excited: some eagerly hoping for war with England; others as eagerly seeking to maintain peace; but all actively engaged in discussing the chances, and moved by a lively interest in the possible consequences of hostility. In England, on the contrary, all is apathy. The newspapers write and speculate about war with France, it is true, because they must write about something; but there is no excitement, no anxiety in the public mind about it. For the truth of this assertion, we appeal to the experience of every man in his own society. Of the fact of this want of interest, this absence of all anxiety in the public mind, there can be no doubt. What, then, is the cause of this remarkable difference of feeling? How is it that, while our neighbours are so excited, so anxious, and so much on the alert, we regard all that is going forward with such striking indifference? The cause, we suspect, is this: the people of this country are unable to persuade themselves that war is imminent. Removed, as we are, from the hopes and fears of continental politics, we—that is, the people of this country—are not, like the French, always on the qui vive, jealous and watchful of what is going on around us. Our minds are, therefore, turned exclusively towards our own concerns; and we leave what are called the foreign affairs of the country almost entirely in the hands of the executive government. The House of Commons partakes so much of this feeling of the people, that, for many years after the passing of the Reform Bill, it was absolutely impossible to maintain a debate upon questions of foreign policy. This indifference, arising from a good principle, and attended with many beneficial effects, is yet productive of some mischievous consequences. The good principle is, the determination to mind our own affairs, leaving to others the undisturbed management of theirs. But the mischievous effect of our conduct arises from our not compelling the executive government to act upon the same principle. The parliament and the people confine their attention to their own affairs; but they carelessly allow the ministry to meddle, and meddle just as they like, with every intrigue that may agitate not merely Europe, but the world. The people of the continent, therefore, never believe the assertion that the people of this country are careless of foreign politics. They judge of us by the doings of our government; and as the government is really, from our apathy, wholly without check or control, the judgment of foreigners respecting us is but too often, and too justly, unfavourable towards our character, and hostile to our interests. The present position of our relations with France, is a remarkable instance of the consequence of this conduct on our part. The people are careless, confident in the continuation of peace, and looking on with a strange and fatal indifference; our Foreign minister, on the contrary, is active, meddling, and mischievous. The French, naturally suspicious, from their former experience, are jealous, excited, hostile. While we think war impossible, and act upon this belief, they, deeming war inevitable, moot this question only—When will it happen? This expectation of hostilities moves their people from one end of their country to the other; all classes, all parties, are equally on the alert; and, if we look closely into the language of men of every party, we shall find throughout a strong feeling of hostility to England; an expectation that war with her is at hand; and that the only point of difference is the mode of preparing for, and the time of declaring it.*

* In the late debates in the French Chamber, M. Guizot and Marshal Soult appear the only exceptions to this statement. In the speeches of all the other speakers, whatever may be the practical conclusion at which they severally arrive, there is manifest an angry tone towards England, and a readiness to go to war, when the proper time shall have arrived. It is much to be suspected that, spite of all their pacific language, M. Guizot and Marshal Soult are carefully preparing for war, under the apprehension that the petulance of the English minister, acting upon the jealous temper of the French people, will, at no very distant day, bring on a war however painful to the king and his present ministers.

War! say the people of this country—in the name of common sense, we ask for what are we to go to war? Syria! Turkey! the integrity of the Ottoman empire! What are these things to us? Can any arrangement of the affairs of the barbarian, Mehemet Ali, and those of the still greater barbarian, the sultan, be fraught with mischief to us and the world equal to what would follow if war were to break out between us and France? Certainly not, is the answer of every rational man. How, then, is it possible that on such a pretext war can arise? Satisfied, as each man is, of the absurdity of such a reason for disturbing the peace of Europe, all pursue their ordinary avocations; comforting themselves with the notion that our neighbours are an excitable people, much given to fierce gesticulation on trifling occasions; but on the whole far too sensible to forget their real interests in maintaining peace, and stir up a war with England on account of some idle unintelligible disputes about Syria, Egypt, and Turkey. The Minister for Foreign Affairs is, therefore, allowed to do as he pleases; and that he pleases to create a disturbance in Europe, is but too manifest to all who will take the pains carefully to watch his conduct throughout the whole of the proceedings relating to what is called the Eastern question.

A glance at the condition of the English ministry may enable us to see some light in the present matter; more especially, if we look also at the state of party politics in France. It will not be difficult to ascertain how the existing combustion has arisen—why Messrs Palmerston, Thiers, and the King of the French have succeeded in raising a quarrel between France and England which threatens to create confusion from one end of the world to the other.

It was plain to every body that, at the close of the last session of parliament, the Whigs saw that their tenure of office would hardly extend beyond the next session, if no alteration took place in the public mind. The small majority in the House of Commons, which afforded them their poor pretext for retaining office, was every day dwindling away—every new election diminished their numbers. The apathy of the people was now too manifest to be mistaken, and, if it continued, was sure to be fatal to their existence as a ministry. There was another feeling also that was daily becoming stronger—disgust at the open and shameless ministerial desertion of all the principles which the Whigs, as a party, had so long advocated. This disgust rendered the liberal public indifferent as to Tory success; and the oft-repeated cry of “Keep out the Tories” had lost its efficacy; for men said—and said truly—“Why need we keep them out, seeing that you ape all their evil doings in office? If out, you may do good; but, now that you are in, we have an illiberal ministry watched by a somewhat more illiberal opposition.” Things were hastening to their natural conclusion—yet a few months, and the Whig ministry had ceased to exist. Like desperate gamblers, they now seem trying their last throw. It would appear as if they said—“Peace has been fatal to us,—let us see what war will bring; confusion may recreate excitement and enthusiasm—things cannot be worse, they may be better. Sauve qui peut.”

The affairs of France afforded a happy opportunity for trying such an experiment. M. Thiers had succeeded in thrusting himself into power, spite of the most decided and violent opposition of the French king. Louis Philippe has never been content to reign upon the principles and with the power of a constitutional monarch. Irresponsible, he yet has ever desired to be his own minister—that is, he desired to do what he pleased, and to make others responsible if evil should follow. The Liberal party have always opposed him in this pretension; and at length M. Thiers, who had already become personally offensive to him, was able, by the aid of a majority in the chamber, in spite of the expressed wishes of the king, to seize upon the post of prime minister, with the open determination of acting not at the king's dictation, but on his own opinion, and subject to responsibility for his own acts alone. He knew that every engine of intrigue would be employed to dispossess him,—that the first favourable opportunity for that purpose would be eagerly seized,—and that every art would be used to destroy his power in the chamber, and his popularity with the people. It was necessary for him to be prepared for the struggle that was coming between himself and the sovereign, and to shape his course accordingly.

M. Thiers had in early life, and for some years after he was known as a politician, been of what is called the Ultra-liberal party. This party he offended, by adopting the opinions of a section of the juste milieu, which had great power in the Chamber of Deputies. But any one who desires to cope with the king, at the head of the Conservative party, soon feels in France that he must be supported, not only by this section,—which is in reality of the bourgeoisie or middle class,—but that he must also acquire the confidence of the more declared liberals. These latter, though few in number in the chambers, are numerous out of doors—active, intelligent, and powerful. Now, this party entertain a belief that their views of change will be advanced by war. The movement party in France is also a war party;* and herein is one great distinction between the English and the French Radicals. M. Thiers, therefore, wishing to conciliate this section, and well aware of the general feeling of the French people respecting war and glory, was not unwilling to seize any opportunity which should enable him to arouse the national vanity, to link himself to the national glory, in the hope of being by this means able to cope with the king and the Conservative party. Lord Palmerston quickly gave him an opportunity of playing this card.

Some months before M. Thiers came into office,

* It should be remarked, however, that although the movement is, on the whole, a war party, yet that their desire for war is war with the despots of Europe, rather than with England. That the national vanity has been hurt by the successes of England cannot be denied; neither can it be doubted that there are many persons in France who talk of washing out this stain, as they are pleased to term it, on their national honour; nevertheless, it is to be hoped and believed that the majority of the liberal party would rather have England a friend than foe.

an offer was made by England to France to join the fleets of the two nations and assume the entire arbitrement of Eastern affairs; this would have led to a war with Russia, and was by the King of the French, therefore, very prudently refused,—he well knowing that war with any power would endanger his crown. On this refusal, Russia, and the other despotic powers, were applied to, and France left on one side: the pretence being, that it was necessary to maintain the integrity of the Turkish Empire; and to this end, to compel Mehemet Ali to give up Syria, which he had conquered, and the Turkish fleet, which had deserted to him. This proceeding on our part was by M. Thiers construed into an insult to France. Whereupon he and his party newspapers, made forcible appeals to the vanity and self-love of the people. The flame spread from one end of France to the other, and, to the astonishment of the people of this country, every Frenchman seemed frantic for war. Nothing startled by this state of things, Lord Palmerston continued his game; a fleet was sent to Syria, troops also were despatched there, and arms and ammunition were distributed among the turbulent population, which by Mehemet Ali had been disarmed, and rendered amenable to law and justice. It is at this stage of the narrative that we could wish the reader to pause, and calmly, but earnestly, to inquire into, and judge of, the whole morality of this extraordinary proceeding.

One of the greatest calamities that could at this moment happen to the civilized world, would be a war between France and England; and any one who deliberately risks the immediate bringing about of this dire event, ought, if he wish to escape the execration of his fellow men, be able to show that he was driven by an overwhelming necessity to run so dangerous a hazard. But, in the present case, no such excuse can be offered; ignorance of the probable consequence cannot be pleaded; Lord Palmerston well knew, as did every one at all acquainted with France, that if he pursued his proposed scheme with respect to Syria, it might be utterly impossible to prevent an immediate declaration of war by the French people. Whether peace or war would result was as uncertain a contingency, as the number that would appear upon the throwing of a die. Louis Philippe, we all were aware, earnestly desired peace, and would use his utmost efforts to maintain it; but it was also clear, that the excitement of the people might be too much for him. Happily, for the moment, peaceful counsels have prevailed. The dexterous management of the king has secured, for the instant, a majority in the chambers; but the great risk was run; and even at this moment we cannot say that we have escaped the fearful consequences. Any hour may bring a change in the determination of the chambers; and the peaceful prospects which sanguine spirits believe to be before us, may at once be overclouded, and war, with all its horrors, come suddenly upon us and the world.* For what then has this risk been encountered? What interest of England was at stake? What wise purpose is sought to be attained? Wherefore, we reiterate, wherefore are we, at this moment, shedding blood, squandering treasure, and risking the terrible calamity of a general war? What is the answer hitherto given to this question? It is impossible to discover any that a rational man can for a moment listen to. The integrity of the Turkish Empire? In the first place, we ask fearlessly how does this supposed integrity concern us? and, in the second place, this integrity has been long since destroyed, and was, by the very proposal to make Mehemet Ali sovereign of Egypt, utterly set at nought. But Mehemet Ali, if permitted, would have become undisturbed master of Syria. Well, and what then? He ill-treated the Syrians. Is this a reason for interfering in the affairs of another people? Ask the Irish Catholics if England ill-treats them. Ask the inhabitants of Lower Canada if England has been a merciful master? Let the thousands of her people slain by the sword, by famine, by frost, and misery, answer! The pretence is ridiculous. Mehemet ill-treated the Syrians: therefore, we have spread war and desolation over their land, and levelled their cities with the earth. If ours be a merciful consideration of their misery, this is a strange way of showing it! But it was necessary to counteract Russia. We confess we cannot understand how this was to be effected by destroying the only power in the East that was steadily pursuing a system of improvement and civilisation. Mehemet Ali powerful, might have been a useful ally—checked in his plans, ruined abroad, crushed at home, he is useless as a friend, while he may be a vengeful and annoying enemy. We pretend to desire the improvement of the East—we say that we wish to see European civilisation spreading over Africa and Asia; and, in order to forward its advance, we destroy the only power which has hitherto successfully attempted to bring the natives of those regions even into the path which leads to this desired goal!

But allowing all that is said about the necessity of coercing Mehemet Ali, aiding the Turk, and opposing Russia,—would not most of these ends have been attained more easily and completely through an alliance with France, than with the four despotic powers of Europe; and would any of the evils anticipated in the East have weighed against the terrible mischiefs that must follow upon a war with the French nation?

Let us for a moment contemplate some of the probable results of hostilities between the two countries; and while so doing we would entreat the attention of all classes of politicians. We know that there is much triumph among Tory success ought not to blind us to the folly of undertaking this war at all,—nor to the worse than folly of undertaking it in a manner likely (and indeed intended) to give offence to the French nation. If the same spirit is still to direct our councils, it is evident, whatever the present deceitful appearances of peace may be, that we shall not escape from our negotiations with France without a rupture.

* The probabilities of the present peace being disturbed are the greater, because of the insulting bearing and reckless conduct of our Minister for Foreign Affairs. Hitherto, success has attended his waslike doings; but statesmen, at the present warlike proceedings of their opponents the Whigs. They remember the lamentations over war, the demands for peace, in which the Whigs constantly indulged during the last struggle with France; and they see, with much complacency, the Whigs forgetting the principles of those days, and following now in the very footsteps of the Tories of the olden time. Moreover, the Tory party are glad of any thing which distracts the public attention; which calls it away from our own internal affairs, and thus silences the cry for reform. They hail this coming storm, therefore, because it will utterly destroy the character of their political opponents, and because it will put off the evil day of reform. But there is another light in which this picture may be viewed, in which the scene is far from promising a pleasant prospect even for them. To this view we solicit their earnest consideration; and not only theirs, but that of every man, to whom the weal or wo of his country and mankind is a matter of concern.

Suppose that the hostilities already commenced in Syria continue; suppose the pacha obstinate, Alexandria destroyed, or any other contingency that may anger or alarm the French; suppose, thereupon, a violent outbreak of the French people, and war declared; what will be the condition of France? What will be her conduct? She will, as in 1793, stand alone against the world; but not, as then, weak and distracted,—torn with internal convulsions, and wholly unprepared for hostilities. The prestige of her former victories will attend her. Her numerous and disciplined forces will be eager for attack; while her leaders will not fail to seek for aid against the despots who trample upon Europe, from the people whom these despots oppress. The propagande will be their principle of action,—to Italy they will speak as deliverers; and let no one doubt but that within that land they will find ample means for spreading the flame of war and insurrection. France will fight Austria, not simply with her own armies, but with the people oppressed by the degrading rule of the Hun. From the Alps to Reggio, Italy will at once be in arms, and give Austria reason to curse the hour in which the demon of liberty (for to her liberty is a demon) was aroused by the war-cry of France. Spain, too, aided by republican France, would soon remodel her government. Even now the democratic party is in the ascendant;—let France interfere as a friend to that party, and resistance will be impossible. The days of 1807 will not return. The French, taught by the experience of that time, will not commit again the fatal mistake of Napoleon; but leaving the people of Spain to frame their own government, will acquire an ally in place of making a revengeful enemy. In Poland, also, will France seek alliance. Germany, in spite of what we constantly hear of the paternal nature of the various governments which partition her soil, will afford abundant means of exciting discontent. The spirit of liberty is not dead, but sleeping amidst her fields and cities. War once declared in Europe, that spirit will be up and doing, over every part of the continent. And who will say that here in Britain and in Ireland all will be peaceful? Is there no discontent among our people?—is it perfect quiet in Ireland? Let us not hide the truth from ourselves. Throughout England and Scotland, more especially in the manufacturing districts, the working classes are bitterly hostile to those institutions by which they are excluded from political rights. In some parts of the country they have, in a time of profound peace, risen in open insurrection, and are only kept down in sullen obedience, because they have learned that violence is useless. This desire to resist is not confined to a few—the feeling of discontent is widely spread;* and this feeling will not be soothed or allayed by increasing the misery which gave it birth. But war will inevitably do this—millions will be again thrown away—our burthens, already far too heavy, will become insupportable; discontent will, all over the land, break out in open violence; and an armed effort will be made to attain those ends, which, if peace continue, the people hope to attain by the gradual advance of truth, and the increase of knowledge among all ranks. This would be, even for those who hope, in war, a means of staying off the evil day of reform, a far worse result than peaceful change; for with this violent tumbling down of old institutions, ruin will come far and wide. The debt which hangs round our necks, a vast and almost overwhelming burthen, will be shaken off, without regard to the direful suffering which must follow. All improvement must, for the time, cease. The millions which, even now, find a scanty subsistence, will then be all too many for our narrow limits; the most terrible convulsions will occur; and, if succeeding generations may be destined to see happier times, we at least shall be miserable. In Ireland confusion is yet more likely to happen. At this present time the leaders of the Tory party are fearful of accepting power, because they dread insurrection and civil war in that ill-governed land. Will the chance of evil be lessened by the miseries of war? If the powerful hand of England be once withdrawn, or if the Irish once successfully resist our dominion, a civil war will follow that will very much resemble the war of extermination between the whites and the blacks of Hayti. The Catholic and Protestant have so long been opposed to each other, such a fearful spirit of hate and revenge has been aroused, that an internecine war would be the inevitable consequence of any appeal to force

* The Morning Chronicle, which has been lustily blowing the war trumpet for Lord Palmerston, nevertheless thus writes concerning the feeling of the working people:—"So long as the extension of the suffrage below the middle classes is refused by the legislature, there will be a great breach in the community, incapable of healing. The working classes are now, in fact, at war with all the superior classes. They do not indeed take the field in arms; though perhaps there are many who might not object to that, and with whom it is simply a question of prudential calculation. But they are alienated and hostile in heart and soul."—Dec. 10, 1840.—This newspaper, which has so long been the organ of the Whigs, and which so often and so loudly complained of Tory wars, has, since the Eastern question arose, employed all its energies to excite discord between England and France. Party purposes had to be served; so old professions and worn-out principles have been conveniently forgotten. Whatever may be the policy of such conduct, the morality cannot be doubtful.

—one party or the other would be rooted out for ever.

This is no exaggeration. We are on the brink of this precipice. It is not that we need expect defeat, or that physically we are unprepared for war. Nothing was ever more false than the representations of the Times newspaper respecting the inefficiency of our navy. The events of the campaign in Syria have amply shown the mendacity of those party appeals of the Tory press. But, still, we dread war; we dread the confusion that would necessarily arise throughout the world; we dread the direful consequences in our land, and among our own people; and we vainly endeavour to find any justification for the minister who wantonly drags us to the brink of this mischief. The warlike propensities of Lord Palmerston appear to us fraught with the most terrible calamities to this country. What good he may be seeking for himself, we know not: he has, indeed, figured in every ministry, except one, that has existed since 1812. He may wish to spend his last days in office, and to that end may be seeking to conciliate those who must soon succeed the Whigs. War with France may be a means of reconciliation. Of all this we know nothing; but of the danger to the country there can be no doubt; and we cannot think this danger wisely incurred, even though it should insure to us the continuance of Lord Palmerston's services as a statesman. Not only should we, if peace could be insured thereby, bear his loss without repining; but we would even go one step further, and attempt to insure it, by at once dismissing him. The public indignation ought to be pointedly expressed against any man, who should, for any reason, bring his country into the dangerous condition in which we now stand: how much more severe, then, ought to be our reprobation of him, who wantonly, and without the shadow of a rational pretext, compels us to run so dangerous a hazard! It behoves the people to be aware of the mischief now hanging over us; and, by proper precautions, to prevent it. If Lord Palmerston's present policy be continued, war is inevitable. On the other hand, if a tone of conciliation be used towards France—if steps be taken to show that we are sincerely grieved that any misunderstanding should have arisen, her people are too generous not frankly to accept our proffered friendship—too wise to scorn the benefits of our alliance. Let it not be said that the apathy of the English nation permitted a flippant, arrogant, and desperate minister to perpetrate a crime in their name, which coming generations will blush to remember.

It may be necessary, before we close this article, to notice one objection which may be stated as an answer to our alarms:—"The Syrian affair is settled, and France can have no further reason for complaint; therefore, your fears, as to the probability of a war, are wholly without foundation." Our answer to this, is first: The Syrian affair is not settled at the date of this writing; and, second, if it were, it is plain that other causes for hostility will be found or made.

We say, that the question with Mehemet Ali is not yet settled; because we see the ministry themselves creating obstacles to that settlement: obstacles which seem to be conjured up solely for the purpose of insulting the French people, wounding their sense of honour, and thereby exciting them to anger and open warfare. Before the commencement of hostilities, the ultimatum sent to Mehemet Ali, offered him the hereditary possession of Egypt. Now, when he appears willing to accept of this offer, the ministerial papers, and among others, the Morning Chronicle, evidently speaking the sentiments of the ministry, and more than probably written by some of their agents, declare, that by this offer, the sovereignty of Egypt was not meant, but merely possession under the supreme authority of the sultan, as heretofore was the case. Every one understood the offer originally to signify, an offer to make Mehemet Ali an independent sovereign over Egypt. Now, when there is a chance of an amicable arrangement, it is unblushingly asserted, that nothing of the kind was intended. Mehemet is to remain pacha—subject to the sultan, and obedient to the laws of the Turkish empire. Let us hear the Chronicle on this head:

"The allies have already recommended to the Porte to continue Mehemet Ali in the pachalic of Egypt; and there is no doubt that the Porte will concede to him the hereditary administration of that province. That he and his successors will be continued in possession *so long as he complies with the terms of the arrangement cannot be doubted; though we are unable to see in what manner the allies can offer a direct guarantee without trenching, which they have always been anxious to avoid, on the sultan's right of sovereignty. There are subsisting treaties, too, by which the relations between the sultan and the pacha must necessarily be affected. In the treaty of commerce, for instance, between Turkey and Great Britain, the duties payable on British commodities are regulated throughout the whole extent of the Turkish empire; Egypt, of course, included. In the same manner, the abolition of all monopolies is carefully secured. Now, we need not observe, that Egypt, under Mehemet Ali, has been one great monopoly. He has constituted himself the sole proprietor of the soil: he forces the fellahs to sell all their produce to him, on terms fixed by himself; and he is consequently the only seller in Egypt. Then, again, the French quacks about him, have inoculated him with their system of having protecting duties, in order to make Egypt what it never can be—a manufacturing country. All these things are expressly in the teeth of the treaty between Turkey and Great Britain. Mehemet Ali must administer the country in accordance with the laws of the empire."—December 10, 1840.

The purpose of this is to raise up obstacles to any amicable arrangement. The reasons set forth are as contemptible as the end is mischievous—"Egypt, of course, included?" Why, of course? Is Greece included? Greece was as much a part of the empire as Egypt; but the treaty would not, therefore, affect Greece. Suppose Spain had objected when France ceded to England Canada and the West India islands, conquered during the war preceding the peace of 1763,—that there were existing treaties between Spain and France which affected all the dominions of France,—would it not have been deemed a sufficient answer to say, Canada, &c., do not now form part of the French dominions? So, in the present case, the difficulty started, is at once obviated by saying, Egypt no longer forms a portion of the Turkish dominions. The talk about monopolies is an appeal to the prevailing feelings in England respecting commerce, not altogether skilfully managed. The contemptuous mention of French quacks may, indeed, give offence to France, and thus attain the end at which the writer probably aimed. But did it not suggest itself to the scribe in the Chronicle that there are quacks nearer home who favour protecting duties? Why should he call it a French system, when the English corn-laws exist, for the purpose of making England an agricultural nation? In America, too, there is a tariff expressly for the purpose of making America a manufacturing nation. In truth, this system of protecting duties is common to all the nations, and is, we are fully willing to allow, a common error. The desire to excite an ill feeling against France and French opinions was too strong, however, to be resisted; so the Chronicle hazarded a false charge rather than make none at all.

But our purpose in quoting the words of the Chronicle, is to show that the question is far from being settled. Mehemet Ali will claim for himself—and he will be supported in his pretensions by France—the sovereignty of Egypt. Having so long lived independent, he will not again formally subject himself to the dominion of the Turk. If we attempt to force him to such subjection, by destroying Alexandria, Louis Philippe will find it impossible to maintain peace between France and England.

Suppose, however, this difficulty conquered, it is evident, from the language of the Ministerial and Tory journals respecting France, that although they pretend to deprecate a war, they are actively employed in creating the ill feeling, that must naturally produce one. Not a day passes without our seeing in the Chronicle, the Globe, and even in journals which pretend to great liberality and kind feelings towards France, every species of attack upon the self-love, the vain-glory, and the boasting of the French nation. The Times joins in the hue and cry, while the Standard makes no pretence to good-will, but openly, and so far honestly, avows its hatred of France. Every opportunity is seized, to bring back the recollection of past hostilities. French defeats are dwelt upon; the valour of the French impugned, their notions of honour and their desire for glory treated with unmitigated contempt; and all this time great complaints are made, because the French journalists are guilty of the same errors! If a French journalist, judging of the English people by the conduct of the English Ministry, expresses indignation and hostility against the nation, at once a hundred pens are at work to insist upon the undying hate of France to England. Regardless of the provocation—regardless of the peculiar position of France—judging of her as if she enjoyed our insular position, making no allowances for the many causes of jealousy and natural suspicion which beset her people—our party writers seize upon every hasty ill-judged expression used by their party writers, and convert it into a means of exciting anger and hatred amongst the people of this country against the nation with which, of all others, the interest of ourselves and of mankind should induce us to cultivate friendly relations. A sudden passion, and the explosion to which it may give rise, is taken as irrefragable evidence of a settled hatred and jealousy; and having proved to their own satisfaction that the ancient hostility between the two nations has not been allayed, but still subsists in all its former vigour, all these party writers seem overjoyed, as if they had made a most gratifying discovery. When we say all, we are in error. The Examiner stands alone among the Ministerial papers, in its opposition to the mischievous war policy now pursued by its patrons. But with this single and singular exception, all the Ministerial and Conservative papers seem determined to let slip no opportunity of exciting old feuds and creating new. The old Tory policy of 1793 is revived—the old play is to be enacted with a new cast of characters. Formerly the Whigs hissed in opposition; but now, disguised in the cast-off garments of their old opponents, using their words, their arts, and all their various deceiving pretences, they have become the actors in the scene. If the people treat them according to their deserts, they will at once hoot them with ignominy from the stage. Let the people continue apathetic, and the many little wars of the Whigs will end in one LARGE one.

MAN AND HIS MISSUS!

BY N. OR M.

IF we speak a little thick, beloved public, forgive us; our thickness, we trust, will be confined to our parts of speech, and not include our parts of understanding. The truth is, we have been drinking potations pottle deep to the health of the Princess Royal! We have been crying, "Long live the Princess," and "Long live the Queen," till we judged it necessary to be able to cry, as well as see, double.

We are, in short, pretty much in the condition of Sheridan, when, on being taken up drunk and disorderly by the watch, he was just able to articulate, "Gen-tle-men! I am not—often—in this condi-tion!—My—my name—is—W—Wilberforce!"

Like most other folks similarly overtaken, we are beginning to feel wondrous wise. Like Sheridan, we want to be mistaken for Mr Wilberforce. We have a mind to prose a bit, and to make ourselves listened to. Other honourable members are listened to when taken prosy ; or, if not listened to, are reported, and consequently read. We are in the predicament of being forced to report ourselves—nay, we have reported ourselves—as above. It can't be helped. The occasion must plead for us. It is only once a-year.

The headach, which we find creeping over us, hath perhaps disposed us to rebel against petticoat government ;—but so it is, that we find ourselves, pen in hand, most splenetically disposed against the sex. What the deuce are they all about ? Lady Morgan, Miss Martineau, all the rights-of-women-ists !—Will they never be quiet ?—Will they never let well alone ?—Can they not be satisfied with having their own way, without wanting to have every body else's way, till every body else wishes them out of the way ?—Ladies !—ladies !—be warned !—be wise ! What is it you want ? “POWER !” quoth they !—“Knowledge is power : we want a better education—we want a female university !” Are we in order, Mr Speaker ? Is not such, Mesdames et Mademoiselles, the tendency of your grumblings ? Are you not ambitious of having your confusion of tongues classicized,—your bad language purified ? Would you not fain inscribe yourselves M.A., in addition to all the Arts of which you are already mistresses ?—As we said before—be wise, be warned !

LISTEN ! The niggers, in their “untaught, innate philosophy,” believe the monkeys of their woods to be gifted with speech and understanding ; but that they sham stupid for fear of being made to work. We are free to confess that such has always been our secret opinion concerning the weaker sex. There can be no doubt that Greek and Mathematics might be flogged into them (if they choose to be flogged) as readily as into our own dunsical natures,—that they might get up in their places in the Lower House, and make speeches as flat as Salisbury Plain about Syria, or Canada, or Jewish Emancipation, or whatever other bagged fox of politics may have succeeded to the extinct Gog and Magog,—Catholics and Slave Trade,—which used to serve as a cockshy for the school-boy members to try their skill on. They might even, with sufficient prompting and bolstering, make tolerably good incumbrances of the treasury bench,—declaring war with some friendly power, as a preventive against the remote possibility of having war declared upon them by an unfriendly one.—But, bless their darling little souls ! What would they gain by this extension of their rights ? What would “WOMAN” acquire by flinging off the yoke of her “MASTER ?” Work instead of play—toil in lieu of sport !—It is only by submitting to be called of the weaker sex, that she obtains the immunity of sitting through life, in her easy chair, with her hands crossed. Those hands, oh ! foolish and perverse generation ! instead of remaining redolent of almond paste and smooth as satin, would 'come tinged with the filthy ink of Downing Street,—or rough with holding in their chargers a review. Were ye raised to our level, these delicate cheeks must become freckled with exposure ;—those ivory brows wrinkled with cogitation ; those beaming faces

Sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought.

Ye are at present fair as the lilies of the field, which are fair because they toil not, neither do they spin ! Believe us, lovely abolitionists ! (and we told you just now we were Mr Wilberforce !)—believe us, that the moment ye are enfranchised, ye will have to work like slaves !

We call upon you, therefore, in your own sweet interests, to reflect what will be your remorse when you find yourselves growing fretful and frightful from nightly exposure to the foul air, and other irritations of parliament ; to the confinement of law-courts ; to the torment of chapter-houses.—Think what will be your sensations on waking one morning, after a harrassing session, to find your faces on your pillows, transformed into fac-similes of those of my Lords Brougham and Lyndhurst ! Think of living to be wigged and gowned, like those illustrious ex-chancellors ; think of finding yourselves ghostified in surplices ; think of preaching a Visitation Sermon to the Bishop of Exeter ; think of being involved in a controversy with the Right Hon. the Earl of Cardigan ; think of being blown up by the Horse Guards ; think of being blown up at Acre !

And all this, WOMAN will have to undergo should she persist in running it neck-and-neck with her MASTER. At present, pretty dear, she is coaxed and sugar-plumbed through life. Like the monkeys, she is allowed to

Leap from tree to tree,
And shall her nuts at liberty ;

or, if deprived of liberty, is allowed to skip about, making faces, and chattering at all the world. Let her only make so much as a wry face, when once she has assumed her position cheek by jowl with lordly man, and see how she will be called to account !—

We know something of the world. The better half—(plague take it, and all other better halves !)—the better half of a century has passed over our head ; and our fifty years' wisdom teaches us more and more excruciatingly, every day of our lives, the bitter severity of the sentence which assigned to the fallen Adam something to do. The world would do very well—that is, we should do very well in the world—if we had only “nothing to do.” We fear we do not express ourselves distinctly ; but, as we said before, “we are not often thus—we are Mr Wilberforce.” Soberly speaking, we mean that if, like the ladies, we were privileged to sit in boudoirs, with our feet upon the fender, with a good novel in our hands ; to walk in silk attire (not that of a Q. C. ;) to eat the fat of the land, (that fat being the fat of venison ;) and taste of the fruits thereof (those fruits being Providence pines and Newington peaches ;) without having to burn the midnight oil in our youth, or rise with the lark in our middle age,—either because, like the lark, we are on the turf,—or because, like an unlucky dog, we are professional ; we should think twice before we voted for a reform-bill to re-legislate our condition.

Who, in their senses, would not rather belong to the ornamental than the useful part of the creation? Who would not rather be a rose than a stalk of hemp—a myrtle than a carrot—a lyre than a pulley—an ostrich feather than a birch broom?—Was ever such folly as to wish to abjure universal impunity—general irresponsibility? Was ever such a thing heard of, as for an angel deliberately to cut off its ethereal wings—to moult (with premeditation) its angelic pinions? We had heard before of fallen angels; but, for beings of a higher sphere to fling themselves head foremost into Tophet, like some love-sick apprentice, from the top of the Monument or Sam Patch from Niagara, is a wantonness of self-sacrifice that lacks a name in the category of angelic follies.

Ye lady novelists!—Ye right honourable annual spinners!—who accomplish your thousands and tens of thousands by smiling upon quires of Bath post, whereupon romances and sonnets appear like a palace raised by the bat of Harlequin:—reflect, we conjure you, upon your weariness of spirit, when, instead of weighing out these literary comfits to us at a guinea an ounce, ye have to write politics like Fonblanque, or to compile Bridge-water Treatises;—to steam it once a-year in search of the British Association; and having found it, go breaking stones on the road with it, or star-hunting into the skies. Instead of prattling about “Gems of Beauty,” certain that your Bristol stones will pass for diamonds, you will have to talk about greywacke and molybdena. Instead of “Flowers of Loveliness,” you will be forced to defile your crow-quills with cotyledons and classification. We shall insist on Algebra, Natural and Moral Philosophy, and the Ologies by cart-loads. No more nonsense—no more fiddle-faddle; there must be grain in your chaff. If you make yourselves morally responsible to us, we require that your “Gems” be not paste, nor your “Flowers” weeds. It was only on your plea of being of inferior mind, that we addressed the jury in your favour when convicted of passing base coin for silver.

If you make yourselves out compos mentis, to the tread-mill with you, as impostors! You are welcome to shoot your rubbish, but not to call it building materials. MAN, over whom you pretend to be Missus, has a conscience in such matters; or if not a conscience, he is a duelling animal, and amenable to cannon law.

Oh! happy Mrs Glass—Mrs Glass of blessed memory,—who, with the simplicity becoming thy sex, the guilelessness of the dove, the pluckability of the pigeon, didst counsel thy clients to catch the hare ere they attempted to seethe it in the pot,— canst thou imagine, in those Elysian fields, where thou dost probably enjoy a seventh heaven in tossing up omelets for evermore, in a frying-pan of gold; canst thou imagine, we say, the weakness of those, who, like the frog in the fable, bursting to pass for a bœuf à la mode, disdain thy modest immortality. Venerated woman! whose flycap we have ever admired in her frontispiece, as secondary in truly feminine dignity only to the mother of the Gracchi—it seems to us a desecration of thy memory, to hear of Female Political Economists, and Feminine Architects of the Heavens. The pretension of teaching their grandmothers, &c., appears to us an act of profanation. To us there is something fifty times more touching in the simplicity of such as thou: like the spindle which, in the chaste bas-reliefs of antiquity, we find in the hands of Penelope! Be assured, thou classic of our infancy, that for one man who admires Madame de Staël, a thousand venerate Mrs Glass!

But is it a true bill, dear sex—dear prattling, rattling, battling sex—that you pretend to become top sawyer?—Have you not been led away by some Louis Napoleon, to invade a great country, when you fancied you were embarking on a trip to Margate? Has not some demagogue abused your ear for especial purposes? Have you not been promised, like the settlers in New Zealand, a region where ortolans fly about ready roasted, and canvass-back ducks quack upon the waters, all stuffed with sage and sundries?—Are you not deluded by promises of a kingdom that is not of this world, like the simple Mexicans, when bribed to discover their hidden treasures to Pizarro?—If so, desist from your rash act!—Pause, ere you cut your own throat!—Madame Roland assures us, that congregating together in popular assemblies causes people's ears to lengthen. Have ye not been indulging in secret meetings?—Not at Almacks, not at Exeter Hall; but in some such assemblage as that academic gathering which, the other day, made a defender of the faith of Lord Lyndhurst?—

If so, curtail the auricular appendages that have been made to sprout, and become simple woman again. As Horace Twiss used to sing, before he began to say (for he was a poet before he became a politician),

Prerogative seems not the basis
Best suited to woman's command,
Where influence keeps them their places,
And gives them the rule of the land!

We are not certain that this quotation from Horace is verbally correct; but, as we have already pleaded, we have been drinking the Princess Royal's health. “We are not often in—this—condition! Gen-tle-men! Our name—is—WIL-BERFORCE!”

NEW NOVELS.

THE HOUR AND THE MAN.

WHETHER Miss Martineau's novel of "Deerbrook," a tale of English life and the domestic affections, or this historical romance, be the work most deserving admiration, must be determined by the varying characters and tastes of her readers; though there can, we imagine, be no doubt that the new story will, as a literary performance, tell much more quickly and forcibly.

The HOUR is that in which the doctrines and influence of the French Revolution in the colonies, and especially that decree of the Convention, which recognised the slaves of St Domingo as free citizens, tolled the hour of the begun-redemption of the negro race:—The MAN is Toussaint L'Ouverture, in whom is found the Deliverer, the Opener of the way, the Spartacus of Africa.

The subject is one peculiarly adapted to the tastes of the author, and, in many respects, to her powers. If inadequate to the production of the grander effects of the historical painter, she is happily qualified to imagine, sketch, and colour the thousand little details and accessories which give reality and life to every picture. The Patriot hero, the Christian chief, whom she has designed after the purest models which the study of the Christian system, and of whatever is noblest in heathen philosophy, can suggest—may not be, nay, cannot be, the sagacious and bold negro who was born, and for half a century remained, a slave; and whom great native energy, vigorous if uninstructed intellect, and, above all, a fortuitous combination of the most extraordinary circumstances, forced into so remarkable a position. This incarnation in ebony of every imaginable human, or rather super-human, perfection,—Miss Martineau's beautiful ideal of the king, the statesman, the husband, the father, the friend, or, in a word, of the Christian in every social aspect, cannot be Toussaint, the slave postilion of the Breda estate; any more than the Wallace of Miss Porter's Scottish Chiefs is the Wallace of Scottish history, or would have been the Wallace of a Waverley novel: but he is, notwithstanding, a lofty and pure conception; and he forms the noble central figure of an historical group, having a more real existence in nature; enriched, moreover, by nameless rare accessories, and relieved by the most magnificent and gorgeous back-ground which the sublimities and beautiful accidents of tropical scenery and climate furnish to the skilful limner.

The romance opens finely; though its progress hardly keeps the promise of the first volume; at least if critics be entitled to insist that the interest of every story shall continue to augment until it is wound up by the denouement. That denouement, so far as the fate of Toussaint is connected with one of the foulest of the many crimes against liberty and humanity which blacken the career of Napoleon, history has left in that obscurity which fully devolves the matter into the hands of the fictionist; and, in this instance, it has suited the artist to exhibit the brave and ill-starred chief expiring in the dungeon of Joux, like a Christian Socrates—calm, hopeful, forgiving, god-like.

In the details of the émancipation, which awakened and brought to light the sleeping soul of the negro chief, Miss Martineau has more strictly taken history for her ground-work. She gives a brief retrospect of those events in the colony which followed the revolution in the mother-country. The whites had early caught the contagious frenzy of that pseudo liberty and equality, with which they could no more imagine that blacks or mulattoes had any business, than the mongrel race could fancy any right that pure blacks could have to participate, in the freedom which they claimed for themselves, equally with the whites. There were, in short, then three parties in St Domingo, each jealous and watchful of the other two; and not unlike, in some of their ideas, the men we see around us. There were the pure aristocrats, or whites; the ten-pound voters, or mulattoes; and the chartists, those who claim the suffrage, or negroes. The republicanism of the whites had been suddenly converted, if not into loyalty to the Bourbons, into disaffection to the Convention, by its recognition of equal rights and privileges, and of the citizenship of coloured men. They openly despised the decree, and talked of transferring their allegiance to England. In this temper the Colonial Assembly of the island was elected; and the angry deputies, before meeting, passed many vigorous and patriotic resolutions, and held daily carousals at Cap Français. While they were meeting and speechifying, their slaves were also idling and rambling about, scheming insurrection, and upon a sultry August night, one of high festival among the planters collected in the town, fires were seen bursting out simultaneously on many estates, both in the mountains and the plain.

Among the planters none was more good-natured and indulgent to his slaves than M. Bayou, who had gone to carouse with his friends in the town, while his sedate and philosophic postilion is thus introduced, and thus occupied:—

In the piazza of his dwelling sat Toussaint this evening, evidently waiting for some one to arrive; for he frequently put down his book to listen for footsteps, and more than once walked round the house to look abroad. His wife, who was within, cooking supper, and his daughter and little boy who were beside him in the piazza, observed his restlessness; for Toussaint was a great reader, and seldom looked off the page for a moment of any spare hour that he might have for reading, either the books M. Bayou lent him, or the three or four volumes which he had been permitted to purchase for himself.

"Do you see Jean?" asked the wife from within. "Shall we wait supper for him?"

"Wait a little longer," said Toussaint. "It will be strange if he does not come."

"Are any more of Latour's people coming with Jean, mother?" asked Génifrede from the piazza.

"No; they have a supper at Latour's to-night; and we should not have thought of inviting Jean, but that he wants some conversation with your father."

"Lift me up," cried the little boy, who was trying in vain to scramble up one of the posts of the piazza, in order to reach a humming-bird's nest which hung in the tendrils of a creeper overhead, and which a light puff of wind now set swinging, so as to attract the child's eye. What child ever saw a humming-bird thus rooking, its bill sticking out like a long needle on one side, and its tail at the other, without longing to clutch it? So Denis cried out imperiously to be lifted up. His father set him on the shelf within the piazza, where the calabashes were kept—a station whence he could see into the nest, and watch the bird, without being able to touch it. This was not altogether satisfactory. The little fellow looked about him for a calabash to throw at the nest; but his mother had carried in all her cups for the service of the supper table.

The boy, tired out with his sport, began to play with those books which had taught the great soul of his father patient endurance, and the magnanimous suffering of evil. He spelled out Epictetus—

"What is that?" asked the boy. "Epictetus was a negro," said Génifréde, complacently. "Not a negro," said her father, smiling. "He was a slave; but he was a white." "Is that the reason you read that book so much more than any other?" "Partly; but partly because I like what is in it." "What is in it—any stories?" asked Denis. "It is all about bearing and forbearing. It has taught me many things which you will have to learn by and by. I shall teach you some of them out of this book." Denis made all haste away from the promised instruction, and his father was presently again absorbed in his book. From respect to him, Génifréde kept Denis quiet by signs of admonition; and for some little time nothing was heard but the sounds that in the plains of St Domingo never cease. . . . His sister was poring over her work, which she was just finishing, when a gleam of greenish light made both look up. It came from a large meteor which sailed past towards the mountains, whither were tending also the huge masses of cloud which gather about the high peaks previous to the season of rain and hurricanes. There was nothing surprising in this meteor, for the sky was full of them in August nights; but it was very beautiful. The globe of green light floated on till it burst above the mountains, illuminating the lower clouds, and revealing along the slopes of the uplands the coffee-groves, waving and bowing their heads in the wandering winds of that high region. Génifréde shivered at the sight, and her brother threw himself upon her lap. Before he had asked half his questions about the lights of the sky, the short twilight was gone, and the evening-star cast a faint shadow from the tufted posts of the piazza upon the white wall of the cottage. In a low tone, full of awe, Génifréde told the boy such stories as she had heard from her father of the mysteries of the heavens. He felt that she trembled as she told of the northern-lights, which had been actually seen by some travelled persons now in Cap Français. . . . Denis listened with all due belief to his sister's description of those pale lights shooting up over the sky, till he cried out vehemently, "There they are! look!"

Génifréde screamed, and covered her face with her hands; while the boy shouted to his father, and ran to call his mother to see the lights.

What they saw, however, was little like the pale, cold rays of the aurora borealis. It was a fiery red which, shining to some height in the air, was covered in by a canopy of smoke.

"Look up, Génifréde," said her father, laying his hand upon her head. "It is a fire—a cane-field on fire."

"And houses too—the sugar-house, no doubt," said Margot, who had come out to look. "It burns too red to be cane only. Can it be at Latour's? That would keep Jean from coming.—It was the best supper I ever got ready for him."

"Latour's is over that way," said Toussaint, pointing some distance farther to the south-east. "But see! There is fire there too! God have mercy!" . . .

"Alas! alas! this is rebellion, rebellion against God and man. God have mercy! The whites have risen against their king; and now the blacks rise against them in turn. It is a great sin. God have mercy!"

Margot wept bitterly. "O, what shall we do?" she cried. "What will become of us, if there is a rebellion?"

"Be cheerful, and fear nothing," replied her husband, "I have not rebelled; and I shall not. M. Bayou has taught me to bear and forbear; yes, my boy, as this book says, and as the book of God says, We will be faithful and fear nothing."

The faithful and loyal negro saddled a horse, and rode off to meet and protect his white master, who now, with his friends, from the windows of the hotel, was witnessing the alarming sights which had disturbed the slave family. But first we have the dinner, the dessert, the wine, the music, the oratory, all in the finest style of the tropics, and of the white lords of the Western Isles in their most palmy days—ere they had yet dreamed that black men possessed living souls. Here also, in a characteristic scene, is first seen Henri I., the future Emperor of Hayti, and then as indubitably a cook, as his friend, Toussaint, was an overseer or postilion. Dr Proteau's speech, and all the speeches, or something very like them, may easily be paralleled, at least once a-year, in any county or colonial newspaper; so we pass the oratory, and come to action:

While waiting for lights, the jealousies were once more opened by orders from the chair. The apartment was instantly pervaded by a dull, changeful, red light, derived from the sky, which glowed above the trees of the Jesuits' Walk with the reflection of extensive fires. The guests were rather startled too by perceiving that the piazza was crowded with heads; and that dusky faces, in countless number, were looking in upon them, and had probably been watching them for some time past. With the occasional puff of wind, which brought the smell of burning, came a confused murmur, from a distance, as of voices, the tramp of many horses in the sand, and a multitude of feet in the streets. This was immediately lost in louder sounds. The band struck up, unbidden, with all its power, the Marseillaise Hymn; and every voice in the piazza, and, by degrees, along the neighbouring streets and square, seemed to join in singing the familiar words,

"Allons, enfans de la patrie,
Le jour de gloire est arrivé."

The consternation of the deputies and their guests was extreme. Every man showed his terror in his own way; but one act was universal. Each one produced arms of one sort or another. While they were yet standing in groups about the table, the door burst open, and a negro, covered with dust and panting with haste, ran in and made for the head of the table, thrusting himself freely through the parties of gentlemen. The chairman, at sight of the man, turned pale, recoiled for a moment, and then, swearing a deep oath, drew the short sword he wore, and ran the negro through the body.

"O master!" cried the poor creature, as his life ebbed out in the blood which inundated the floor.

The act was not seen by those outside, as there was a screen of persons standing between the tables and the windows. To this accident it was probably owing that the party survived that hour, and that any order was preserved in the town.

"Shame, Proteau! shame!" said Odeluc [a planter of humane and liberal sentiments,] as he bent down, and saw that the negro was dying. Papalier, Bayou, and a few more, cried "Shame!" also; while others applauded.

"I will defend my deed," said Proteau, struggling with the hoarseness of his voice, and pouring out a glass of wine to clear his throat. His hand was none of the steadiest as he did so. "Hush that band! There is no hearing one's self speak. Hush! I say; stop!" and swearing, he passionately shook his fist at the musicians, who were still making the air of the Marseillaise peal through the room. They instantly stopped and departed.

"There! you have sent them out to tell what you have done," observed a deputy.

"I will defend my deed," Proteau repeated, when he had swallowed the wine. "I am confident the negroes have risen. I am confident the fellow came with bad intent."

"No fear but the negroes will rise, any where in the world, where they have such as you for masters," said Odelluc.

"What do you mean, sir?" cried Proteau, laying his hand on the hilt of his dripping sword.

"I mean what I say. And I will tell you too, what I do not mean. I do not mean to fight to-night with any white; and least of all, with one who is standing in a pool of innocent blood, of his own shedding." And he pointed to Proteau's feet, which were indeed soaked with the blood of his slave.

"Hush! hush! gentlemen!" cried several voices. "Here is more news!"

"Hide the body!" said Bayou; and as he spoke, he stooped to lift it. M. Brelle made shorter work. He rolled it over with his foot, and kicked it under the table. It was out of sight before the master of the hotel entered, followed by several negroes from the plain, to say that the "force" had risen on several plantations, had dismantled the mills, burned the sugar-houses, set fire to the crops, murdered the overseers, and, he feared, in some cases, the proprietors.

"Where?" "Whose estates?" "What proprietors?" asked every voice present.

The mischief was now fairly at work. Henri Christophe, who had no knowledge of the movements of the insurgents, escorted, or rather protected, Bayou and Papalier, until they were met by Toussaint, though Papalier already suspected Henri, and indeed every black, of "treachery." On the ride, Papalier entered lightly into conversation with Toussaint, whom he questioned about the number of his wives and children. The negro had five children; and farther he did not reply to those light inquiries. His master whispered that Toussaint was rather romantic in domestic affairs. He had "married at twenty-five a wife so good that he never wanted more. He was prudish in such matters." The white Papalier was less scrupulous. At his ravaged plantation had dwelt Thérèse, a beautiful negress, whom he had educated and made his mistress. Though Bayou offered him shelter at his own plantation, when they discovered that his house had been plundered, dilapidated, and deserted by the slaves, he persisted in searching for one slave whose affection and fidelity he could not doubt. He galloped off.

Toussaint, also, pricked his horse into the court-yard, and after a searching look around, dragged out from behind the well a young negress who had been crouching there, with an infant in her arms. She shrieked, and struggled till she saw Papalier, when she rushed towards him. "Poor Thérèse!" cried he, patting her shoulder. "How we have frightened you!"

The young creature trembled excessively; and her terror marred for the time a beauty which was celebrated all over the district—a beauty which was admitted as fully by the whites as by people of her own race. Her features were now convulsed by fear, as she told what had happened,—that a body of negroes had come, three hours since, and had summoned Papalier's people to meet at Latour's estate, where all the force of the plain was to unite before morning,—that Papalier's people made no difficulty about going, only stopping to search the house for what arms and ammunition might be there, and to do the mischief which now appeared;—that she believed the whites at the sugar-house must have escaped, as she had seen and heard nothing of bloodshed; and that this was all she knew, as she had hidden herself and her infant, first in one place, and then in another, as she fancied safest, hoping that nobody would remember her.

"Now you will come with me," said Bayou to Papalier, impatiently. "I will, thank you. Toussaint, help her up behind me, and carry the child, will you? Hold fast, Thérèse, and leave off trembling as soon as you can."

Thérèse would let no one carry the infant but herself. She kept her seat well behind her master, though still trembling when she alighted at the stables at Breda.

Great personages thicken upon us. In this slave girl is seen the future queen, "the good empress," the black Josephine of Hayti, the consort of Jacques I. Her feelings for her master, her white lover, after he has alienated her heart by outraging all that was tender and womanly in her fine original nature, are, if less morally grand, at least as true as the idealized hero of the tale.

Through the address and fidelity of Toussaint, his master was enabled to escape in an American vessel, and with a considerable share of his property. Toussaint does more: as a slave he had always been loyal to the king; and he reasons, like a Christian and philosopher, with those of his friends who would now persuade him to become a chief and leader of blacks; though, when informed that the plantation will be visited by the insurgents, he feels that, with his single arm, he can do no more in defence of his master's property; and he also learns that his king, far off at Paris, is a prisoner and dethroned. He, therefore, resolved to fulfil his next duty—to join the Spaniards in the other end of the island, "and fight for his king with his king's ally."

Toussaint meant first to place his wife and children under the protection of his brother Paul, who is described as an indolent, good-natured, ordinary negro, a fisher on the coast; and then to volunteer his single services, independently and unfettered, to the Spanish commander, and not as a follower of Jean François, the black insurgent leader, who was going over to the Spaniards with a considerable force. The migration of the family, and the promiscuous concourse of negroes bent on the same errand as Toussaint, afford place to some sweet sketches of the domestic manners of the blacks; and to glowing descriptions of the gorgeous and enchanting mountain-scenery which they traversed.—Day dawned, and the sun arose—the sun of the tropics—upon the mountains, forests, and rivers of St Domingo:—

Back to the north the river led the eye, past the cluster of hunters' huts on the margin—past the post where the Spanish flag was flying, and whence the early drum was sounding—past a slope of arrowy ferns here, a grove of lofty cocoa-nut trees there, once more to the bay, now diamond-strewn, and rocking on its becom the boats, whose sails were now specks of light in contrast with the black islets of the Seven Brothers, which caught the eye as if just risen from the sea.

"No windmills here! No cattle-mills!" the negroes were heard saying to one another. "No canes, no sugar-houses, no teams, no overseer's houses, no overseers! By God, it is a fine place this! So we are going down there to be soldiers to the king! Those cattle are wild, and yonder are the hunters going out! By God, it is a fine place!"

These exclamations are not merely true to nature; they must be literal fact.

Toussaint is at once appointed a colonel by the Spanish commander.

Charmingly is the sylvan life of the negro-family and their friends described. Between Génifréde and her cousin Moysse, the son of Paul and afterwards an historical personage, the most ardent attachment springs up, which has very tragic, but effective, results in the progress of the story. Aimée, the second girl, knows no joy but in her brother Isaac; and Denis, the youngest son, is a brave and heedless boy, fond of all manner of dangerous adventures and wild sports. Margot alone, separated from the husband whom she worshipped, is quite as natural in character as her daughters, but not nearly so happy as her children in her new and bewildering state of freedom.

The only time when her heart was completely at ease and exulting, was when Toussaint came to see his family, to open his heart to his wife, and to smile away her troubles. Her heart exulted when she saw him cross the ridge, with a mounted private behind him, urge his horse down the ascent, gallop along the sands to the foot of the rocks, throw the bridle to his attendant, and mount to the platform, looking up as he approached, to see whether she was on the watch. She was always on the watch. She liked to admire his uniform, and to hear his sword clatter as he walked. She liked to see him looking more important, more dignified, than Bayou or Papalier had ever appeared in her eyes. Then, her heart was always full of thoughts about their children, which he was as anxious to hear as she to tell; and he was the only one from whom she could learn any thing of what was going on in the world, or of what prospects lay before themselves.

One day that Toussaint came, he said—

"I am not going to stay with you to-day. And, Margot, I shall take the lads with me, if they are disposed to go." "The lads! my boys!" "Yes," said Toussaint, throwing himself down in the shade. "Our country and its people are orphaned; and the youngest of us must now make himself a soldier, that he may be ready for any turn of affairs which Providence may appoint. Do you hear, my boys!" "Yes, father," answered Placide, in an earnest tone. "They have then murdered the king!" asked Margot; "or did he die of his imprisonment!"

"They brought him to trial, and executed him. The apes plucked down the evening-star, and quenched it. We have no king. We and our country are orphaned."

After a pause, Paul said:—

"It is enough to make one leave one's fishing, and take up a gun."

"I rejoice to hear you say so, brother," said Toussaint.

"Then, father, you will let me go," cried Moysse. "You will give me your gun, and let me go to the camp."

"Yes, Moysse: rather you than I. You are a stout lad now, and I know nothing of camps. You shall take the gun, and I will stay and fish."

The boys are alike eager to go with their father, who thus manfully expounds the duty of a free citizen in such an emergency:

"I do not know, my son, what we are to do next. When the parent of a nation dies, it may take some time to decide what is the duty of those who feel themselves bereaved. All I now am sure of is, that it cannot but be right for my children to be fitted to serve their country in any way that they may find to be appointed. I wish to train you to arms, and the time has come. Do not you think so!"

Isaac made no direct reply, and Aimée had strong hopes that he was prepared with some wise, unanswerable reason for remaining where he was. Meantime, his father proceeded,—

"In all that I have done, in all that I now say, I have the sanction of Father Laxabon."

Toussaint was a humble and devoted Catholic, who paid the utmost reverence to his confessor; though, when his hour of trial comes, he thinks, reasons, and acts by his own independent judgment of truth and duty. The commissaries sent out by the Convention, had made tempting offers to the negroes in name of the French Republic. When Margot inquired what was the nature of these offers, her loyal husband replied—

"Nothing that we can accept. I have written a letter in reply, saying that I cannot yield myself to the will of any member of the nation, seeing that, since nations began, obedience has been due only to kings. We have lost the King of France; but we are beloved by the monarch of Spain, who faithfully rewards our services, and never intermits his protection and indulgence. Thus, I cannot acknowledge the authority of these commissaries till they shall have enthroned a king. Such is the letter which, guided by Father Laxabon, I have written."

"It is a beautiful letter, I am sure," said Margot. "Is it not, Paul?"

In her hut, on the sunny mountain-side, living in the sunshine, and subsisting on the spontaneous gifts of rich and bountiful nature, gathered by her children, Margot is perhaps as true to the negro character as Madame Toussaint in her palace, the lady of the Commander-in-Chief of St Domingo, although she never loses her simplicity. We shall, therefore, do Miss Martineau the justice to present the negro matron in her humble condition. Her grief really sprung from the departure of her husband and her boys, but her sorrows were attributed to a more dignified cause—the murder of the king.

"We have no one to look up to now," said Margot, sobbing; "no one to protect us. Who would have thought, when I married, how desolate we should be one day on the sea-shore, with our master at Baltimore, and the king dead, and no king likely to come after him! What will become of us! Our good king would never have let Jean François' wife dress herself in the best jewels the white ladies left behind, while the wife and daughters of his very best officer are living here in a hut, on a rock, with no other clothes to wear than they brought away from Breda. No, no; as my husband says, in losing the king we are orphans."

Aimée trusted that God would protect them all; but Margot justly fears that God, who takes care of the whole world, might be on the enemy's side as well as on theirs.

While Toussaint is with the Spanish army, fulfilling his military duties, and instructing his boys in science and philosophy—if we take them in their essence, and not in their names—and fitting them for the high destinies of free men, by precept and example—his hour arrives—the hour of fate—that which, from a loyal subject of Louis, and a good partisan officer, elevates him into the first deliverer of his race. M. Papalier, the planter, loath to abandon his property, had been skulking about the country; and he now reached

Toussaint, in the disguise of a negro, to obtain, through his interest with the Spanish commander, protection, and the means of leaving the island. Yet, so strong is habit in the thorough-bred planter, that, when this meanly-dressed, seeming negro entered the tent of Colonel Toussaint, he said—

"Close the tent," in the same tone in which he had been wont to order his plate to be changed at home, "And now, give me some water to wash off this horrid daubing. Some water—quick! Pah! I have felt as if I were really a negro all this day."

Toussaint said nothing; nor did he summon any one. He saw it was a case of danger, led the way into the inner part of the tent, poured out water, pointed to it, and returned to the table, where he sat down, to await further explanation.

Papalier at length reappeared, looking like himself, even as to his clothes, which Thérèse must have brought in the bundle which she carried. She now stood leaning against one of the tent-poles, looking grievously altered, —worn and wearied.

"Will you not sit down, Thérèse?" said Toussaint, pointing to a chair near his own, Papalier having seated himself on the other side of the table.

Thérèse threw herself on a couch at some distance, and hid her face.

Papalier had told his errand—his fears, and the peril in which he stood—unable, meanwhile, to bridle the habitual insolence of a planter's feelings, even before the black man whom he came to supplicate for safety and life. Toussaint bore this almost-unconscious insolence of the white man with the utmost magnanimity. To forbear had ever been his principle: he could now afford to pity and forgive. Thérèse was less magnanimous. Her cruel and selfish master, alarmed that the crying of their child, on a former night-march, might expose him to danger, had taken it from her bosom, and permitted it to be murdered! Thérèse was now a woman, first awakened to a sense of her degradation as a woman—a mother cruelly bereaved of her child. She hated her white master, and proclaimed her eternal hatred of him, and of his race. Her African blood was on fire; and, while she fiercely spoke,

"O! silence!" exclaimed Toussaint. He then added in a mild tone to Thérèse, "This is my house, in which God is worshipped and Christ adored; and where, therefore, no words of hatred may be spoken."

In the conversation which followed, Toussaint first heard of the memorable decree of the Convention, conferring freedom, and the rights of citizenship, not alone on the mulattoes, but on the whole blacks of St Domingo. At which decree Papalier, humbled as he was, scoffed while he told of it, as a piece of impracticable nonsense and folly.

"Toussaint was glad to be alone. Never had he more needed solitude; for rarely, if ever, in the course of his life, had his calm soul been so disturbed. During the last words spoken by Papalier, a conviction had flashed across him, more vivid and more tremendous than any lightening which the skies of December had sent forth to startle the bodily eye: and amidst the storm which those words had roused within him, that conviction continued to glare forth at intervals, refusing to be quenched. It was this—that if it were indeed true that the revolutionary government of France had decreed to the negroes the freedom and rights of citizenship, to fight against the revolutionary government would be henceforth to fight against the freedom and rights of his race. The consequences of such a conviction were overpowering to his imagination. As one inference after another presented itself before him—as a long array of humiliations and perplexities showed themselves in the future—he felt as if his heart was bursting. . . . A few hours may, at certain crises of the human mind and lot, do the work of years; and this night carried on the education of the noble soul, long repressed by slavery, to a point of insight, which multitudes do not reach in a lifetime. No doubt, the preparation had been making through years of forbearance and meditation, and through the latter months of enterprise and activity; but yet, the change of views and purposes was so great as to make him feel, between night and morning, as if he were another man.

The lamp burned out, and there was no light but from the brilliant flies, a few of which had found their way into the tent. Toussaint made his repeater strike; it was three o'clock. As his mind grew calm under the settlement of his purposes, he became aware of the thirst which his agitation had excited. By the light of the fitting tapers, he poured out water, refreshed himself with a deep draught, and then addressed himself to his duty. He could rarely endure delay in acting on his convictions. The present was a case in which delay was treachery; and he would not lose an hour. He would call up Father Laxabon, and open his mind to him, that he might be ready for action when the camp should awake.

He awoke the priest, who had obtained a copy of a decree, of which the good man thought so slightly, that he could not remember where he had thrown it. "With your sacred books, perhaps, father," said Toussaint, as the priest searched; "for it is a gospel to me and to my race;" and he proceeded to inform his confessor that, hitherto, he had loyally fought for his king, but now a higher duty summoned him. No longer would he hold a command "against the interests of his race, now at length to be redeemed."

"I cannot remain in an army opposed to what are now the legal rights of the blacks."

"You will give up your command?" "I shall." "And your boys,—what will you do with them?" Send them whence they came, for the present. I shall dismiss them by one road, while the resignation of my rank goes by another." "And you yourself by a third." "When I have declared myself to General Hermona." "Have you thoughts of taking your soldiers with you?" "No." "But what is right for you is right for them." "If they so decide for themselves.—My power over them is great. They would follow me with a word. I shall therefore avoid speaking that word, as it would be a false first step in a career of freedom, to make them enter upon it as slaves to my opinion and my will."

This, we fear, is painting partisan or patriotic leaders, and military chiefs, of whatever colour, and in whatever cause engaged, as they ought to be—not as they are. Acting on these high and, alas! uncommon ideas, Toussaint reasoned farther with his confessor—a pious and loyal priest, but still only a priest—who thus remonstrates:—

"But you will be giving up every thing. What can make you think that the French at Cap, all in the interest of the planters, will receive you?"

"I do not think it; and I shall not offer myself."

"Then you will sink into nothing. You will no longer be an officer, nor even a soldier. You will be a mere negro where negroes are wholly despised. After all that you have been, you will be nothing."

"I shall be a true man."

"You will sink to less than nothing. You will be worse than useless before God and man. You will be held a traitor."

"I shall; but it will be for the sake of a higher fidelity."

There was a long pause, after which Laxabon said, in a tone, half severe and half doubting,

"So, here ends your career; You will dig a piece of ground to grow maize and plantains for your family;—you will read history in your piazza, and see your daughters dance in the shade, while your name will never be mentioned but as that of a traitor. So, here ends your career!"

"From no one so often as you, father, have I heard that man's career never ends."

The priest made no reply.

"How lately was it," pursued Toussaint, "that you encouraged my children, when they, who fear neither the wild bull nor the tornado, looked somewhat fearfully up to the eclipsed moon! Who was it but you that told them that though that blessed light seemed blotted out from the sky, it was not so; but that behind the black shadow, God's hand was still leading her on through the heaven, still pouring radiance into her lamp, not the less bright because it was hidden from men! A thick shadow is about to pass upon my name; but is it not possible, father, that God may still be feeding my soul with light,—still guiding me towards himself! Will you not once more tell me that man's career never ends!"

"In a certain sense—in a certain sense, that is true, my son. But our career here is what God has put into our own hands: and it seems to me that you are throwing away his gift and his favour. How will you answer when he asks you, 'What hast thou done with the rank and the power I put into thy hand! How hast thou used them!' What can you then answer, but 'I flung them away, and made myself useless and a reproach.' . . . You know this—that you unite the influence of the priest with the power of the commander; and yet you are going to cast off both, with all the duties which belong to them, and sink yourself in infamy—and, with yourself, the virtues you have advocated. How will you answer this to God!"

"Father, was there not one in whose path lay all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of the world, and who yet chose ignominy—to be despised by the world instead of to lead it! And was God severe with him! Forgive me, father; but have you not desired me to follow him, though far off as the eastern moon from the setting sun!"

"That was a case, my son, unique in the world. The Saviour had a lot of his own. Common men have rulers appointed them whom they are to serve; and, if in rank and honour, so much the greater the favour of God. You entered this service with an upright mind and pure intent; and here, therefore, can you most safely remain, instead of casting yourself down from the pinnacle of the temple, which, you know, the Son of God refused to do. Remember his words, 'Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God.' Be not tempted yourself, by pride of heart, to compare your lot with that of Christ, which was unique."

"He devoted himself for the whole race of man: he, and he alone. But it seems to me that there may be periods of time when changes are appointed to take place among men—among nations, and even among races, and that a common man may then be called to devote himself for that nation, or for that race. Father, I feel that the hour may be come for the negro race to be redeemed; and that I, a common man, may so far devote myself as not to stand in the way of their redemption. I feel that I must step out from among those who have never admitted the negroes' claims to manhood. If God should open to me a way to serve the blacks better, I shall be found ready. Meantime, not for another day will I stand in the light of their liberties."

These are high, and noble, and, above all, truly Christian sentiments—a pure gospel;—and they may have been those of the black chief, in the crisis that had arisen. His spiritual guide having exhausted dissuasion, refuses to give him either light or direction; and Toussaint withdrew to his tent, and threw himself on his couch:

"No help! no guidance!" thought he. "I am desolate and alone. I never thought to have been left without a guide from God. He leaves me with my sins upon my soul, unconfessed, unabsolved: and, thus burdened and rebuked, I must enter upon the course which I dare not refuse. But this voice within me which bids me go, whence, and what is it! Whence is it but from God! And how can I therefore say that I am alone! There is no man that I can rely on—not even one of Christ's anointed priests; but is there not he who redeemed men! and will he reject me if, in my obedience, I come to him! I will try—I will dare. I am alone; and he will hear and help me."

Without priest, without voice, without form of words, he confessed and prayed, and no longer felt that he was alone. He arose, clear in mind, and strong in heart; wrote and sealed up his resignation of his commission, stepped into the next tent to rouse the three boys, desiring them to dress for early mass, and prepare for their return to their homes immediately afterwards.

The celebration of morning mass is picturesquely described. All the troops were present in the church, and, among them, Jean Français, a negro military leader of ferocious character, whose name must be familiar to those acquainted with the history of St Domingo. Jean, the slave expected by the Toussaint family on the night the insurrection broke out, is the poetical or moral contrast, and the jealous rival of Toussaint.

The Spanish commander complimented Toussaint upon the enthusiastic attachment displayed towards him by the black soldiers; and he replied almost in the identical words frequently used by O'Connell, when in his candid moods he chanced to be told of his wonderful influence over his countrymen—

"It is by no skill of mine," replied Toussaint; "it is by the power of past tyranny. The hearts of negroes are made to love. Hitherto, all love in which the mind could share has been bestowed upon those who degraded and despised them. In me they see one whom, while obeying, they may love as a brother."

"The same might be said of Jean Français, as far as your reasons go; but Jean Français is not beloved like you. He looks gayter than you, my friend, notwithstanding. He is happy in his new rank, probably. You have heard that he is ennobled by the Court of Spain!"

"I had not heard it. It will please him."

"It evidently does. He is made a noble; and his military rank is now that of lieutenant-general. Your turn will come next, my friend; and if promotion went strictly according to personal merit, no one would have been advanced sooner than you."

"I do not desire promotion, and . . ."

"Ah! there your stoical philosophy comes in. But I will show you another way of applying it. Rank brings cares; so that one who is not a stoic may have an excuse for shrinking from it; but a stoic despises cares.—Ha! we have some young soldiers here," he said, as Moyse and his cousins stood beside the way, to make their obeisance; "and very perfect soldiers they look, young as they are. They seem born for military service."

"They were born slaves, my lord; but they have now the loyal hearts of freemen within them, amidst the ignorance and follies of their youth."

"They are . . ."

"My nephew and my two sons, my lord."

"And why mounted at this hour!"

"They are going to their homes, by my direction."

"If it were not that you have business with me, which I suppose you desire them not to overhear . . ."

"It is as you say, general."

"If it had not been so, I would have requested that they might be at our table this morning. As it is, I will not delay their journey."

And the general touched his hat to the lads, with a graciousness which made them bend low their uncovered heads, and report marvels at home of the deportment of the Marquis d'Hermona. Seeing how their father was occupied, they were satisfied with a grasp of his hand as he passed, received from him a letter for their mother, and waited only till he and his guest had disappeared within the tent, to gallop off.

Papalier's affair is also expedited; and now the critical moment has arrived. The honourable soldier of Spain could apprehend the high motives avowed by Toussaint more clearly than Father Laxabon; but he also had a duty to perform. He sank into profound astonishment, from which he was only roused when Toussaint, having laid aside his glittering uniform and polished arms, appeared in his old plantation-clothes—woollen cap in hand—ready to leave the camp.

Toussaint merely passed through the tent, bowing low to the general, and bidding him farewell. A confused noise outside, followed by a shout, roused Hermona from his astonishment.

"He is addressing the troops!" he cried, drawing his sword, and rushing forth.

Toussaint was not addressing the troops. He was merely informing Jacques, whom he had requested to be in waiting there, beside his horse, that he was no longer a commander,—no longer in the forces; and that the recent proclamation, by showing him that the cause of negro freedom was now one with that of the present government of France, was the reason of his retirement from the Spanish territory. He explained himself thus far, in order that he might not be considered a traitor to the lost cause of royalty in France; but, rather, loyal to that of his colour, from the first day of its becoming a cause.

Numbers became aware that something unusual was going forward, and were thronging to the spot, when the general rushed forth, sword in hand, shouting aloud,

"The traitor! Seize the traitor! Soldiers! seize the traitor!"

Toussaint turned in an instant, and sprang upon his horse. Not a negro would lay hands on him; but they cast upon him, in token of honour, the blossoms of the amaryllis and the orange that they carried. The Spanish soldiers, however, endeavoured to close round him, and hem him in, as the general's voice was still heard,

"Seize him! Bring him in, dead or alive!"

Toussaint, however, was a perfect horseman; and his favourite horse served him well in this crisis. It burst through, or bounded over, all opposition, and amidst a shower of white blossoms which strewed the way, instantly carried him beyond the camp.

After a gallant pursuit, Toussaint escapes, and carries many hearts along with him. The proclamation declaring the slaves free, became generally known, and

The tidings of freedom rang through the ravines, and echoed up the sides of the hills, and through the depths of the forests, startling the wild birds on the mountain ponds, and the deer among the high ferns; and bringing down from their fastnesses a multitude of men who had fled thither from the vengeance of the whites and mulattoes, and to escape sharing in the violence of the negro force which Jean François had left behind him, to pursue uncontrolled their course of plunder and butchery. Glad, to such, were the tidings of freedom, with order, and under the command of one whose name was never mentioned without respect, if not enthusiasm. The negro who did not know that there was any more world on the other side the Cibao peaks, had yet learned to be proud of the learning of Toussaint. The slave who conceived of God as dwelling in the innermost of the Mornes, and coming forth to govern his subjects with the fire of the lightning, and the scythe of the hurricane, was yet able to revere the piety of Toussaint. The black bandit who had dipped his hands in the blood of his master, and feasted his ear with the groans of the innocent babes who had sat upon his knee, yet felt that there was something impressive in the simple habit of forgiveness, the vigilant spirit of mercy which distinguished Toussaint Breda from all his brethren in arms—from all the leading men of his colour, except his friend Henri Christophe. At the name of Toussaint Breda, then, these flocked down into the road by hundreds, till they swelled the numbers of the march to thousands.

Among the first of the black officers who followed him from the Spanish camp, was Jacques Dessalines—another historical personage, lately a slave, and afterwards the first Emperor of Hayti. With Papalier, Jacques had seen Thérèse; and,

He had strong reasons for remembering the first time he had seen Thérèse—on the night of the escape across the frontier. She was strongly associated with his feelings towards the class to which her owner belonged; and he knew that she, beautiful, lonely, and wretched, shared those feelings. If he had not known this from words dropped by her during the events of this morning, he would have learned it now; for she was declaring her thoughts to her master, loudly enough for any one who passed by to overhear.

Jacques entered the tent: and there stood Thérèse, declaring that she would leave her master, and never see him more, but prevented from escaping by Papalier having intercepted her passage to the entrance. Her eyes glowed with delight on the appearance of Jacques, to whom she immediately addressed herself.

"I will not go with him—I will not go with him to Paris, to see his young ladies. He shall not take care of me. I will take care of myself. I will drown myself, sooner than go with him. I do not care what becomes of me, but I will not go."

"You will come with me to the priest, and be my wife," said Jacques.

"I will," replied Thérèse, calmly.

"Go," said Papalier. "You have my leave. I am thus honourably released from the care of you till times shall change. I am glad that you will not remain unprotected, at least."

"Unprotected!" exclaimed Thérèse, as she threw on the Spanish mantle which she was now accustomed to wear abroad. "Unprotected! And what has your protection been?"

"Very kind, my dear, I am sure. I have spent on your education money which I should be very glad of now. When people flatter you, Thérèse (as they will do; for there is not a negress in all the island to compare with you,) remember who made you a lady. You will promise me that much, Thérèse, at parting!"

"Remember who made me a lady!—I have forgotten too long who made me a woman," said Thérèse, devoutly upraising her eyes. "In serving him and loving my husband, I will strive to forget you."

"All alike!" muttered Papalier, as the pair went out. "This is what one may expect from negroes, as the General will learn when he has had enough to do with them. They are all alike."

Thérèse was with her husband when he, next day, joined Toussaint—whose force had already swelled to six thousand men. But great and important military affairs—the pressure of mighty coming events, cannot lead Toussaint to neglect the tenderest offices of humanity, and to speak peace to the bruised spirit.

Toussaint stepped back into the piazza where Thérèse sat quietly watching the birds sitting in and out among the foliage and flowers.

"Thérèse," said he, "what will you do this night and to-morrow! Who will take care of you?"

"I know not,—I care not," said she. "There are no whites here; and I am well where they are not. Will you not let me stay here?"

"Did Jacques say, and say truly, that you are his wife?"

"He said so, and truly. I have been wretched, for long . . ."

"And sinful. Wretchedness and sin go together."

"And I was sinful; but no one told me so. I was ignorant, and weak, and a slave. Now I am a woman and a wife. No more whites, no more sin, no more misery! Will you not let me stay here?"

"I will: and here you will presently be safe, and well cared for, I hope. My wife and my children are coming home,—coming, probably, in a few hours. They will make this a home to you till Jacques can give you one of your own. You shall be guarded here till my Margot arrives. Shall it be so?"

"Shall it! O thank God! Jacques," she cried, as she heard her husband's step approaching, "O Jacques! I am happy. Toussaint Breda is kind,—he has forgiven me,—he welcomes me,—his wife will!"

Tears drowned her voice. Toussaint said gently, "It is not for me to forgive, Thérèse, whom you have never offended. God has forgiven, I trust, your young years of sin. You will atone (will you not!) by the purity of your life;—by watching over others, lest they suffer as you have done. You will guard the minds of my young daughters: will you not? You will thank God through my Génifrede, my Aimée!"

"I will, I will," she eagerly cried, lifting up her face, bright through her tears. "Indeed my heart will be pure,—longs to be pure."

"I know it, Thérèse," said Toussaint. "I have always believed it, and I now know it."

The rapid elevation of Toussaint is traced, and attributed to the moral grandeur of his soul—the purity of his single heart. Beyond, above, the purest nature, much of this may be; but shall we for this scoff at the very aspiration after future good,—laugh to scorn the anticipation of a new, a Christian chivalry? Toussaint is now, in Cap Français, the directing head, the acting arm in the momentous affairs of the crisis; hailed as "the saviour of the whites, the black Spartacus, foretold by Raynal, whose destiny was to avenge the wrongs of his race." But in Toussaint's heart there was no place for vengeance. Some of his admirers and flatterers—for already the successful soldier had found flatterers—compared him with another hero who had arisen in France, a young artillery officer, named "Napoleon Buonaparte." The Toussaint of the novel belongs to a far higher order of moral beings than the young artillery officer; and his character, whether true or not, is consistently maintained. Left alone, he feels perplexed and humbled by his exaltation, doubtful of himself, and strong only in faith and in the sustaining power of the mission to which he feels that he is appointed. There has seldom been a man, black or white, to whom power was offered, who did not finally find excellent reasons to silence his conscientious doubts against its acceptance; and Toussaint satisfies his mind, as to the course of duty, in a strain of reflection which some may say borders on cant of a new species; and which, had it really passed in open council, instead of the pages of fiction, might have justified the charge of gross hypocrisy and dissimulation, with which the negro chief has often been loaded. Thus he meditates:—

"Low, indeed, are we sunk, deep is our ignorance, abject are our wills, if such a one as I am to be the leader of thousands. I, whose will is yet unexercised,—I, who shrink ashamed before the knowledge of the meanest white,—I, so lately a slave,—so long dependent that I am an oppression to myself,—am at this hour the ruler over ten thousand wills! The ways of God are dark, or it might seem that he despised his negro children in committing so many of them to so poor a guide. But he despises nothing that he has made. It may be that we are too weak and ignorant to be fit for better guidance in our new state of rights and duties. It may be that a series of teachers is appointed to my colour, of whom I am to be the first, only because I am the lowest; destined to give way to wiser guides when I have taught all that I know, and done all that I can. May it be so! I will devote myself wholly; and when I have done, may I be more willing to hide myself in my cottage, or lie down in my grave, than I have been this day to accept the new lot which I dare not refuse!—Deal gently with me, O God! and, however I fail, let me not see my children's hearts hardened, as hearts are hardened by power! Let me not see in their faces the look of authority, nor hear in their voices the tones of pride! Be with my people, O Christ! The weaker I am, the more be thou with them, that thy gospel may be at last received! The hearts of my people are soft—they are gentle, they are weak:—let thy gospel make them pure,—let it make them free. Thy gospel,—who has not heard of it, and who has seen it! May it be found in the hearts of my people, the despised! and who shall then despise them again! The past is all guilt and groans. Into the future open a better way . . ."

"Toussaint L'Ouverture!" he heard again from afar, and bowed his head, overpowered with hope.

"Toussaint L'Ouverture!" repeated some light, gay voices close at hand. His boys were come, choosing to bring themselves the news from Breda,—that Margot and her daughters, and old Dessalines and Moyse were all there, safe and happy, except for their dismay at finding the cottage and field in such a state of desolation.

"They will not mind when they hear that they are to live in a mansion henceforward," said Placide. "Jean Français had better have stood by his colour, as we do."

Placide told that Jean Français was going to Spain.

"We shall be better without him," said Isaac. "He would never be quiet while you were made Lieutenant-Governor of St Domingo. Now you will be alone and unmolested in your power."

"Where did you learn all this?"

"Every one knows it—every one in Cap. Every one knows that Jean has done with us, and that the commissary is going home, and that General Laveaux means to be guided in every thing by you; and that the posts have all surrendered in your name; and that at Port Paix—"

"Enough, enough! my boys. Too much, for I see that your hearts are proud."

"The commissary and the general said that you are supreme—the idol of your colour. Those were their words."

"And in this there is yet no glory. I have yet done nothing, but by what is called accident. Our own people were ready—by no preparation of mine; the mulattoes were weak and taken by surprise, through circumstances not of my ordering. Glory there may hereafter be belonging to our name, my boys; but as yet there is none. I have power; but power is less often glory than disgrace."

"O father! do but listen. Hark again! 'Toussaint L'Ouverture!'"

"I will strive to make that shout a prophecy, my sons. Till then, no pride! Are you not weary! Come in to rest. Can you sleep in my fine chamber here as well as at Breda?"

"L'Ouverture" had been the epithet applied to Toussaint by an eloquent French commissary, and it was caught up by the enthusiastic blacks as the name of their deliverer.

The long, sanguinary, and ferocious struggle that followed, is judiciously kept in the background. Seven years are silently passed over—a blank in the story, but memorable from the complete regeneration of the colony under the government of Toussaint; memorable, also, for the growth and expansion of his understanding. We now see him in his office, the enlightened and indefatigable statesman, the able general, the wise pacificator.

Jealous as he was for the infant freedom of his race, Toussaint knew that it would be best preserved by weaning their minds from thoughts of anger, and their eyes from the sight of blood. Trust in the better part of negro nature guided him in his choice between two evils. He preferred that they should be misgoverned in some affairs of secondary importance, and keep the peace, rather than that they should be governed to their hearts' content by himself, at the risk of quarrel with the mother-country. He trusted to the singular power of forbearance and forgiveness which is found in the negro race, for the preservation of friendship with the whites, and of the blessings of peace; and he, therefore, reserved his own powerful influence over both parties for great occasions—interfering only when he perceived that, through carelessness or ignorance, the French authorities were endangering some essential liberty of those to whom they were the medium of the pleasure of the government at home.

The seven years so productive of social improvement in the colony, had also witnessed bright change in the family of the deliverer. The description of their new condition affords a favourable specimen of Miss Martineau's level manner, her ductility of fancy, and power of reproducing the ordinary images of domestic life, in a country not wholly removed from her experience; as, among the American planters of the south and west, she must have witnessed nearly similar things. The picture of the interior of the palace is sweet and engaging; and if the Negro Court is faithfully represented, it was certainly the happiest, the most rational, and not the least refined, which the civilized world at that time contained.

The clergy, who found in Toussaint a dutiful son of the Catholic church, brought him a good report of the improved religious and moral condition of his subjects. Numerous marriages had been celebrated; the children were attending the schools, where the quarrels of those by different mothers were disappearing; and the blacks who had indulged in a plurality of wives, were now liberally providing for those they put away. And for all this Toussaint thanked God, and lauded the servants of Christ, those holy men whose servant he called himself. A prettier speech could not be made to a clerical deputation, than this addressed by the negro potentate to the priests; who must surely have listened to it with great unction:—

"You," said Toussaint, "the servants of Christ, are the true rulers of this island and its inhabitants. I am your servant in guarding external order, during a period which you will employ in establishing your flocks in the everlasting wisdom and peace of religion. I hold the inferior office of keeping our enemies in awe, and enabling our people to find subsistence and comfort. My charge is the soil on which, and the bodies in which, men live. You have in charge their souls, in which lies the future of this world and of the next. You are the true rulers of St Domingo; and we bow to you as such."

Every head was immediately bowed, and the priests went out, amidst the obeisances of the whole assemblage,—some of the order wondering, perhaps, whether every mind there was as sincere in its homage as that of the commander-in-chief.

When will Lord Melbourne learn to address a deputation of Scottish clergy in this fashion? or a deputation of manufacturers from Glasgow or Manchester, as Toussaint, the wise and philanthropic negro ruler did his subjects; entering into the most minute interests and comforts of the people, which, having come from among them, he perfectly understood. Last of all came those white planters, who had been reinstated in their lands, and were protected in them by Toussaint. They were enthusiastic in gratitude for the display of magnanimity of which they had not dared to dream.

Toussaint, in his new position, knew how to maintain his dignity. While engaged in conference with the Creole planters, his old master, Bayou, who had just landed from America, on the assurance of protection, entered the saloon, and advanced, with extended arms, to embrace him.

"Gently, sir," said the commander-in-chief, drawing back two steps. "There is now a greater distance between me and you than there once was between you and me. There can be no familiarity with the chief of a newly-redeemed race."

M. Bayou fell back, looking in every face around him, to see what was thought of this. Every face was grave.

"I sent for you," resumed Toussaint, in a mild voice, "to put you at the head of the interests of the good old masters;—for the good alone have been able to return. Show us what can be done with the Broda estate, with free labourers. Make the blacks work well. Be not only just, but firm. You were formerly too mild a master. Make the blacks work well, that, by the welfare of your small interests, you may add to the general prosperity of the administration of the Commander-in-chief of St. Domingo."

M. Bayou had no words ready.

We are not surprised. This was a lecture from his old black postilion; but Bayou found Madame less stately and more sociable, and the girls wonderfully like other young ladies of their age; and from them he learned all the family history. The boys had been sent to Paris for their education, and partly as hostages for the fidelity of their father to the Directory. This is all most wonderful to Bayou; and so is the appearance of the stately Thérèse, converted into the lady of the black General Dessalines, and much more beautiful than when the mistress of his friend Papalier.

Having had so many examples of the humanity and gentleness of Toussaint, we are now permitted to see his inflexible justice, and also his deep mortification, when, on the arrival of the French commissioners, it is found that, with many presents and compliments, no secret recognition, no special letter, no brotherly greeting, came from Napoleon, the first of the Whites, to Toussaint the first of the Blacks. He speaks his disappointment with a frankness and high spirit, in accordance with the character with which it has pleased the author to invest him.

prosperity. His family make progresses through the country in their way to their estates; and are every where received with the enthusiasm of which his deeds are the source. They are attended by artists and savans from Europe. The young people amuse themselves, cultivate the arts, and make love; preserving the distinctive characters formirth, gaiety, gentleness, or passion, and superstition, which has been assigned to each. Génifrède, the elder daughter, is a true African; superstitious, and a passionate lover; timid in presence of her great father, and giving her whole soul to her cousin. Yet the loving negro damsel displays the delicacy, with the tenderness, of the true womanhood of every clime and colour. The scenes of courtship between her and her lover Moyse, a tiger in his ferocious hatred to the whites, but gentle as a lamb with her, are in sweet accordance with the characters assigned them; and they, besides, prepare the reader for that catastrophe which they heighten by contrast.

Miss Martineau does not attempt a connected fable. Her object is better effected by a series of sketches, illustrative of the state of society, and of those great changes which she wishes to represent. Leaving the children of Toussaint, and the black chief himself, at the dizzy summit of prosperity, though he is still anxious, alert, and watchful, we are led to the family of an old, tyrannical, French planter—whom the revolution, and the retributive justice visited on his children, has nearly crazed—and to his granddaughter, Euphrosyne, a charming creature, and a beautiful conception of the candour, gentle waywardness, and warm, clinging affections of girlhood. Euphrosyne adores the negro commander-in-chief; and, however she may have escaped the contagion, feels nothing of the prejudice of colour; yet her parents had perished in the general massacre of the whites, while she was almost an infant, and she knows it. This bright and delightful creature is rather abruptly dropt in the course of the tale; and we can almost infer that she had, in part, been created with the purpose of giving the rich treasure of her affections to one of the Toussaint family, or to some sable youth; but that the artist had finally, and, as an artist, wisely, shrunk from outraging that feeling which, whether right or not, is so powerful that it almost seems natural instinct, which makes Europeans revolt from the idea of the marriage of white women with negro men. In the meanwhile, Euphrosyne is the affectionate minister of her querulous and imbecile old grandfather, of whose cruelty as a slave-master she happily knows nothing. In a lovely morning, she is seen in the balcony, playfully enjoying the fragrance of the flowers, and the beauty of the humming-birds flying about, while she yet carefully watches the feverish slumbers of her aged relative, M. Revel. When, on his awaking, she has kindly arranged his pillows, and endeavoured to amuse the old man, she brings in his coffee, and this conversation ensues:—

"You will find the bath ready whenever you want it, grandpapa," said Euphrosyne, as she placed the little tray before him: "and it is a sweet airy morning."

"Ay; I must make haste up, and see what is to be done. It is not safe to lie and rest in one's bed, in this part of the world." And he made haste to stir his coffee with his trembling hands.

"Oh, you have often said that,—almost ever since I can remember: and here we are, quite safe still."

"Tell the truth, child. How dare you say that we have been safe ever since you remember?"

"I said 'almost,' grandpapa. I do not forget about our being in the woods,—about . . . but we will not talk of that now. That was all over a long time ago; and we have been very safe since. The great thing of all is, that there was no L'Ouverture then, to take care of us. Now, you know, the commander-in-chief is always thinking how he can take the best care of us."

"'No L'Ouverture then!' One would think you did not know what and where Toussaint was then. Why, child, your poor father was master over a hundred such as he."

"Do you think they were like him? Surely, if they had been like him, they would not have treated us as they did. Afra says she does not believe anybody like him ever lived."

"Afra is a pestilent little fool."

"Oh, grandpapa!"

"Well, well! She is a very good girl in her way; but she talks about what she does not understand. She pretends to judge of governors of the colony, when her own father cannot govern this town, and she never knew Blanchelande! Ah! if she had known Blanchelande, she would have seen a man who understood his business and had spirit to keep up the dignity and honour of the colony. If that sort of rule had gone on till now, we should not have had the best houses in the island full of these black upstarts; nor a mulatto governor in this very town."

"And then I should not have had Afra for a friend, grandpapa."

"You would have been better without, child. I do not like to see you for ever with a girl of her complexion, though she is the governor's daughter. There must be an end of it—there shall be an end of it. It is a good time now. There is a reason for it to-day. It is time you made friends of your own complexion, child; and into the convent you go—this very day."

"Oh, grandpapa, you don't mean that those nuns are of my complexion! Poor pale creatures! I would not for the world look like them: and I certainly shall, if you put me there. I had much rather look like Afra than like sister Benoite, or sister Cecile. Grandpapa! you would not like me to look like sister Benoite."

While this conversation was going on, a note from Afra was secretly put into the hands of Euphrosyne, warning her that the cultivators were in insurrection, and marching to the town. The whites were consequently in imminent danger, and an asylum at the Government-house was kindly offered. It might be reached in safety through the garden of the nunnery, which bordered on that of M. Revel, if no time was lost. The old man was obstinate, and stupid, and prejudiced; but Euphrosyne managed him with delicate address—coaxed, and entreated, and prayed, though to no purpose. When Revel saw that there was disturbance in the town and imminent peril, he became even more senselessly stubborn. He would not betray his colour and his child, by trusting to the treachery of mulattoes! He would rather perish on his own threshold, and in his impotent fury,—

He sank down on his knees by the bedside, and prayed that the earth might gape and swallow them up,—that the sea might rush in and overflow the hollow where the city had been, before he and his should fall into the hands of the cursed blacks.

"Grandpapa," said Euphrosyne, gravely, "if you pray such a prayer as that, do not pray aloud. I cannot hear such a prayer as that." Struggling with her tears, she continued: "I know you are very much frightened,—and I do not wonder that you are: but I do wish you would remember that we have very kind friends, who will protect us, if we will only make haste and go to them. And as for their being of a different colour,—I do wonder that you can ask God to cause the earth to swallow us up, when you know (at least, you have taught me so) we must meet people of all races before the throne of God. He has made of one blood all the nations of the earth, you know."

M. Revel shook his head impatiently, as if to show that she did not understand his feelings. She went on, however:—

"If we so hate and distrust them at this moment, here, how can we pray for death, so as to meet them at the next moment there! Oh, grandpapa! let us know them a little better first. Let us go to them now."

The old man is, at length, conveyed to the Government-house, haunted by the terrors which conscience inspired. He had been a cruel master, and the day of retribution had again arrived.

The insurrection had been fomented by the French Commissioner's jealousy of Toussaint, who is now fully occupied by public cares, but equal to the crisis: calm, self-possessed, energetic. Many historical events in the public life of the Black Chief are here introduced with good effect; and the increasing efforts of Toussaint to restore peace and good order—to maintain the laws—to soften prejudice—and above all, to bridle the fierce spirit of hatred, and prevent acts of retaliation—are genuine history. It was his policy to pursue the course he did; but it was a generous and enlightened policy scarcely to have been expected from him. Toussaint, the real man, may have been ambitious and deceitful, but he could not have been cruel and blood-thirsty; and his just severity in repressing the sanguinary violence of the blacks, to which principle he sacrificed his nephew, Moyse, together with his confidence in the honour and integrity of the French, were certainly among the causes of his downfall. That the power which so easily crumbled and fell to pieces, could have been so firmly rooted—so thoroughly consolidated—so based on the affections of all classes, as Miss Martineau has chosen to represent it, is more than doubtful.

Though Toussaint consistently plays, in public life, his part of a great statesman, actuated and governed by the principles of the gospel and by these alone, the general run of readers will probably be more delighted with the illustrious black in the bosom of his family; simply great, affectionate, thoughtful, sage, humble—the exemplar, in short, of whatever is most exalted in the Christian character. He is only surpassed by the fair girl, Euphrosyne, whose charity and faith in the coloured race is not shaken, nor her sense of justice confused, even after her grandfather had been barbarously shot dead in the carriage by her side. In these cruelties to the whites, General Moyse, the betrothed, the adored of Génifréde, the elder daughter of the chief, was deeply implicated. Moyse was arrested by orders of his uncle, who proceeded to execute justice with the stern determination of an ancient Roman—tempered, however, by the softest feelings of pity for his own despairing child. We are afraid that the perfections of Tous-saint, in principle and temper, are altogether too highly finished and too absolute to admit of the entire sympathy of ordinary mortals. Some touch of human passion and infirmity would have brought him, at times like this, nearer to the heart. Moyse is executed, and Génifréde plunged into the wildest despair. She refuses consolation from the sympathy of Thérèse, or the spiritual ministrations of the priest, and defies her hard-hearted father. On hearing of her lover's arrest, she had left her mother and sisters in the country, and flown to Cap Français, where, in prison, in the midst of deadly agony, the lovers had agreed that they would perish together. The African poison, the red water, concealed by Génifréde about her person is discovered, and through the kindness of Thérèse, the wretched girl is thrown into a stupor by a dose of henbane, until the execution of her lover is past. When Father Laxabon then seeks admission to her chamber, to impart spiritual consolation, Thérèse implored him to spare her.

"I bring her comfort," said the father, turning reprovingly to Madame Dessalines. "His conflict is over, my daughter," he continued, advancing to Génifréde. "His last moments were composed: and, as for his state of mind in confession . . ."

He was stopped by a shriek so appalling, that he recoiled as if shot, and supported himself against the wall. Génifréde rushed back to the chamber, and drove something heavy against the door. Thérèse was there in an instant, listening, and then imploring, in a voice which, it might be thought, no one could resist.

"Let me in, love! It is Thérèse. No one else shall come. If you love me, let me in."

There was no answer.

"You have killed her, I believe," she said to the priest, who was walking up and down in great disturbance,—not with himself, but with the faithless creature of passion he had to deal with.

"The windows!" exclaimed Thérèse, vexed not to have thought of this before. She stepped out upon the balcony. One of the chamber windows was open, and she entered. No one was there. Génifréde must have fled down the steps from the balcony into the gardens; and there Thérèse hastened after her. In one of the fenced walks leading to the fountain, she saw the flatterer of her clothes.

"The reservoir!" thought Thérèse, in despair.

She was not mistaken. Génifréde stood on the brink of the deep and brimming reservoir,—her hands were clasped above her head for the plunge, when a strong hand seized her arm, and drew her irresistibly back. In ungovernable rage she turned, and saw her father.

"They say," she screamed, "that every one worships you. Not true now! Never true more! I hate . . . I curse . . ."

He held up his right hand with the action of authority which had awed her childhood. It awed her now. Her voice sank into a low shuddering and muttering.

"That any one should have dared to tell you—that any one should have interfered between me and my poor child!" he said, as if involuntarily, while seating her on the fresh grass. He threw himself down beside her, holding her hands, and covering them with kisses.

"This sod is fresh and green," said he; "but would we were all lying under it!"

"Do you say so!" murmured Génifréde.

"God forgive me!" he replied. "But we are all wretched."

"You repent, then!" said Génifréde. "Well you may! There are no more such, now you have killed him. You should have repented sooner: it is too late now."

"I do not repent, Génifréde; but I mourn, my child."

"There are no more such," pursued she. "He was gallant."

"He was."

"He was all life : there was no deadness, no coldness ; —he was all life."

"He was, my child."

"And such a lover !" she continued, with something of a strange proud smile.

"He was a lover, Génifrède, who made your parents proud."

"Such a soldier !" she dreamed on. "War was his sport, while I trembled at home. He had a soldier's heart."

Her father was silent ; and she seemed to miss his voice, though she had not appeared conscious of his replies. She started, and sprang to her feet.

"You will go home now, Génifrède," said her father.

"With Madame Dessalines you will go. You will go to your mother and sister."

"Home !" she exclaimed, with loathing. "Yes, I must go home," she said, hurriedly. "You love Pongaudin,—you call it paradise. I wish you joy of it now ! You have put an evil spirit into it. I wish you joy of your paradise !"

She disengaged herself from him as she spoke, and walked away.

Every scene is not so animated as this ; and some of the long dialogues between the nuns and their guests, and the conversations of Toussaint's family, though illustrative of feeling and opinion among the different classes and colours of the colony, or rather of Miss Martineau's sentiments, seem tedious and languid in contrast with the fire and passion of the interviews between the dark lovers, and those of the righteous and sympathizing father and his despairing child.

A fearful change was now impending in the colony. The peace of Amiens had left Buonaparte at leisure to turn his attention to St Domingo, and the fate of the colony was sealed in that of Toussaint. Intelligence of an expedition from France to reduce the island to its former condition, and crush the power of Toussaint, had been received, and the negro chief took measures to receive the invaders. The conduct of Buonaparte was such that the path of duty now lay before him clear and well-defined, though the upbraiding of Jacques Dessalines could not yet convince him that his trust, forbearance, and moderation with the whites had been wrong, or even bad in policy. "Though Buonaparte," he said, "betrays and oppresses, the gospel stands."

The time when compromise was no longer possible, when submission would have been the betrayal of freedom and of his race, had arrived, and Toussaint resolved to proclaim war. The people he governed would, he said, have loved and served France for ever as a protector, but they should cast her off when she became an incubus on their freedom. In providing for the defence of the colony, Toussaint and his officers were now occupied night and day, and at length the French expedition was discovered making for the shores of the island. It was first seen by Toussaint and his friend Henri Christophe, who were watching for it on the mountainous promontory of Samna. The scene is picturesque, and morally grand. As the vast fleet came gradually into view, Toussaint, counting up the number of the war ships and transports as he gazed through his glass, exclaimed—

"Henri, we must all perish. All France has come to St Domingo !"

"Then we will perish," replied Henri.

"Undoubtedly : it is not much to perish, if that were all. But the world will be the worse, for ever. France is deceived. She comes, in an error, to avenge herself, and to enslave the blacks. France has been deceived."

"If we were but all together," said Henri, "so that there were no moments of weakness to fear . . . If your sons were but with us . . ."

"Fear no moments of weakness from me," said Toussaint, its wonted fire now glowing in his eye. "My colour imposes on me duties above nature ; and while my boys are hostages, they shall be to me as if they no longer existed."

"They may possibly be on board this fleet," said Christophe. "If, by caution, we could obtain possession of them . . ."

"Speak no more of them now," said Toussaint. "Presently, as if thinking aloud, and with his eyes still bent on the moving ships, he went on :

"No, those on board those ships are not boys, with life before them, and eager alike for arts and arms. I see who they are that are there. There are the troops of the Rhine—troops that have conquered a fairer river than our Artibonite, storming the castles on her steep, and crowning themselves from her vineyards. There are the troops of the Alps—troops that have soared above the eagle, and stormed the clouds, and plucked the ice-king by the beard upon his throne. There are the troops of Italy—troops that have trodden the old Roman ways, and fought over again the old Roman wars—that have drunk of the Tiber, and once more conquered the armies of the Danube. There are the troops of Egypt—troops that have heard the war-cry of the desert tribes, and encamped in the shadow of the pyramids."

"Yet he is not afraid," said Henri to himself, as he watched the countenance of his friend.

"All these," continued Toussaint, "all these are brought hither against a poor, depressed, insulted, ignorant race—brought as conquerors, eager for the spoil before a blow is struck. They come to disembarrass our paradise of us, as they would clear a fragrant and fruitful wood of apes and reptiles. And if they find that it takes longer than they supposed to crush and disperse us, France has more thousands ready to come and help. The labourer will leave his plough at a word, and the vine-dresser his harvest, and the artisan his shop,—France will pour out the youth of all her villages, to seize upon the delights of the tropics, and the wealth of the savages, as they are represented by the emigrants who will not take me for a friend, but eat their own hearts far away, with hatred and jealousy. All France is coming to St Domingo !"

"But," . . . interposed Christophe.

"But, Henri," interrupted his friend, laying his hand on his shoulder, "not all France, with her troops of the Rhine, of the Alps, of the Nile, nor with all Europe to help her, can extinguish the soul of Africa. That soul, when once the soul of a man, and no longer that of a slave, can overthrow the pyramids and the Alps themselves, sooner than be again crushed down into slavery !"

"With God's help," said Christophe, crossing himself.

"With God's help," repeated Toussaint. "See here," he continued, taking up a handful of earth from the broken ground on which they stood, "see here, what God has done ! See, here are shells from the depth of yonder ocean, lying on the mountain top. Cannot he who thus uprears the dust of his ocean-floor, and lifts it above the clouds, create the societies of men anew, and set their lowest order but a little below the stars !"

"He can," said Christophe, again crossing himself.

"Then let all France come to St Domingo ! She may yet be undeceived.—What now !" he resumed, after a pause of observation. "What manœuvre is this ?"

The sons of Toussaint had been sent back from Paris with the expedition, which was under the command of General Leclerc, and they are politically used to embarrass their father, and induce him to submit unconditionally to the wishes of Buonaparte. Dissension is artfully sown among his friends; even in his family there are divided interests; and Aimée follows her beloved brother Isaac to the French headquarters. Desertion and treachery arise on every hand; and while many submit and court the protection of the French, Toussaint and the remnant faithful to him and their cause, or, like Dessalines, faithful to their diabolical, if not unprovoked hatred of the whites, retreat to the mountain fastnesses. And thither went the orphan Euphrosyne, and her friend Afra, now Madame Pascal; for a little bit of delicate amalgamation is after all effected in the union of the beautiful mulatto girl with M. Pascal, a young literary Frenchman, the private secretary of Toussaint, and the devoted admirer of the virtues and grandeur of mind of the negro chief. The way of life of the outlaws, or rather of the last defenders of independence and freedom, in their mountain hold,—the arrival of scouts and spies,—the military exercises of the men, and the sports of the children,—the occupations and talk of the women, and the wild scenery of the Mornes, as the mountain wildernesses of the island are termed, furnish themes of which Miss Martineau has made the most felicitous use. The narrative is no longer desultory nor languid. Toussaint, hemmed in, is impatient for a fair open trial of battle; but the French preferred spying, bribing, cajoling, and pretending to negotiate, and would not risk an action. Meanwhile, disaffection spreads, and nearly all the black leaders have gone over to the French. The black troops under Maurepas, a negro general, anxiously expected by the beleaguered outlaws, and confidently relied upon as faithful to the cause of their race, are seen to join the army of the French general at the very moment when Euphrosyne, the wounded Dessalines, and the other excited spectators are watching their march, and exulting in their arrival. Their exclamations of wrath against the traitor are scarce hushed when this wild and horrible incident occurs. General Vincent, one of the black officers who is more than suspected of favouring the French, having first cried, "Hark! silence! silence all for a moment!"—

They listened, ready to take alarm from him, they knew not why. Nothing was heard but the distant baying of hounds—the hunters coming home, as it was supposed.

"Those are not St Domingo hounds," said Vincent, in a low voice, to Dessalines.

"No, indeed!—Home, all of you! Run for your lives! No questions, but run! Thérèse, leave me! I command you.—If this is your doing, Vincent . . ."

"Upon my soul, it is not. I know nothing about it.—Home, ladies, as fast as possible!"

"My children!" exclaimed Madame Bellair. "I can find them:—if you will only tell me the danger—what is the danger!"

Madame Bellair, the African Deesha, is the wife of a Congo negro, who, in the changes of the times, had become the proprietor of the plantation on which they had lately been slaves. Dessalines continued—

"You hear those hounds. They are Cuba bloodhounds. The fear is that they are leading an enemy over the hills."

Not a word more was necessary. Every one fled who could, except Thérèse, who would not go faster than her husband's strength permitted him to proceed. The voice of the hounds, and the tramp of horses' feet were apparently so near before they could reach the first sentry, that both were glad to see Pascal hurrying towards them, with two soldiers, who carried Dessalines to the house, while Pascal and Thérèse ran for their lives,—she striving to thank her companion for remembering to bring this aid.

"No thanks!" said Pascal. "General Dessalines is our great man now. We cannot do without him. Here is to be a siege,—a French troop has come over by some unsuspected pass;—I do not understand it."

"Have you sent to the Plateaux?"

"Of course, instantly; but our messengers will probably be intercepted, though we have spared three men, to try three different paths. If L'Ouverture learns our condition, it will be by the firing."

Some of the sportsmen had brought in from the hills the news of the presence of an enemy in the Morne,—not, apparently, on their way to the plantation, but engaged in some search among the hills. Others spoke tidings which would not have been told for hours, but for the determination of Madame Bellair to set out in search of her children, whatever foe might be in the path. It became necessary to relate that it was too late to save her children. They had been seen lying in a track of the wood, torn in pieces by the blood-hounds, whose cry was heard now close at hand. Though there was no one who would at first undertake to tell the mother this, there were none who, in the end, could conceal it from her. They need not have feared that their work of defence would be impeded by her wailings and tears. There was not a cry; there was not a tear. Those who dared to look in her face saw that the fires of vengeance were consuming all that was womanish in Deesha's nature. She was the soldier to whom, under Dessalines, the successful defence of Le Zephyr was mainly owing. Dessalines gave the orders, and superintended the arrangements, which she, with a frantic courage, executed. From that hour to the day when she and her husband expired in tortures, the forces of the First Consul had no more vindictive and mischievous enemy than the wife of Charles Bellair. Never propitiated, and long unsubdued, Charles Bellair and his wife lived henceforth in the fastnesses of the interior, and never for a day desisted from harassing the foe, and laying low every Frenchman on whom a sleepless, and apparently ubiquitous vengeance, could fix its grasp.

The only effectual aid upon which Toussaint could now rely, was the heats of August, so intolerable to Europeans; and the consequent fever which must thin and disable the ranks of the French. But of this providential alliance of natural causes for the independence of the black race, Toussaint was not, in his own person, to witness the effects, afterwards found of great advantage by Dessalines and Henri Christophe in the course of the war. Before fever and pestilence had aided the cause of African freedom, Toussaint had been betrayed and kidnapped. He was a prisoner in chains on the high seas, and on his way to France, with his family, who would follow his fortunes, and share his fate,—all, save the passionate and superstitious Génifréde. She had more than once seen her lost lover's spirit in the Mornes. She could not leave the place which Moyse haunted; and she became the child of him who alone could share her feelings, and who needed her consolations; of Paul, the bereaved father of her lover.

One pretext which history assigns for the cruel and execrable persecution of the unfortunate negro chief, was the belief entertained by Buonaparte and the French, that he had vast treasures, the plunder of the richest island of the West Indies, buried in the Mornes. Denial was in vain:

though on board ship, as, when afterwards interrogated by the agents of Buonaparte, in the prisons of Paris, Toussaint's noble reply was still the same; and the First Consul, offended by the brave spirit which soared above his own, gave the final order for that secret imprisonment at Joux which issued in his murder. Joux was visited by Miss Martineau last year, during a tour in Switzerland; but little light was obtained by her inquiries concerning the prisoner; and the closing incidents in the life of the illustrious negro are thus left free to fancy. They are delicately touched, and yet dwelt upon so long as to mar the highest effects of tragic art. If the soul of the great negro rises superior to his unmerited fate; if he triumph in his concluded work; and possess his spirit in Christian patience and philosophic equanimity, ordinary minds cannot contemplate his protracted sufferings, and lingering death by famine, without emotions which it is not desirable to excite. Yet is the character wonderfully well sustained. From the depths of his solitary dungeon, the dying Christian hero thus adjures those whom he loves:—

My wife, my children! I may name you all now—name you in my thoughts and in my song. Placide! are you rousing the nations to ask the tyrant where I am? Henri! have you buried the dead whites yet in St Domingo! and have your rains done weeping the treason of those dead against freedom! Let it be so, Henri! Your rains have washed out the blood of this treason; and your dews have brought forth the verdure of your plains, to cover the graves of the guilty and the fallen. Take this lesson home, Henri! Forget—not me, for you must remember me in carrying on my work—but forget how you lost me. Believe that I fell in the Morne, and that you buried me there; believe this, rather than shed one drop of blood for me. Learn of God, not of Buonaparte, how to bless our race. Poison their souls no more with blood! The sword and the fever have done their work, and tamed your tyrants. As for the rest, act with God for our people! Give them harvests to their hands; and open the universe of knowledge before their eyes. Give them rest and stillness in the summer heats: and shelter them in virtuous and busy homes from the sheeted rains. It is enough that blood was the price of freedom—a heavy price which has been paid. Let there be no such barter for vengeance!—My children, hear me! Wherever you are, in the court of our tyrant, or on the wide sea, or on the mountain-top, where the very storms cannot make themselves heard so high, yet let your father's voice reach you from his living grave! No vengeance! Freedom, freedom to the last drop of blood in the veins of our race! Let our island be left to the wild herds and the reptiles, rather than be the habitation of slaves: but, if you have established freedom there, it is holy ground, and no vengeance must profane it. If you love me and my race, you must forgive my murderers.—Yes, murderers,” he pursued in thought, after dwelling awhile on the images of home and familiar faces—“murderers they already are, doubtless, in intent.”

And they were soon murderers in fact—Toussaint was found dead in his dungeon. The deliverer was himself delivered. If the yoke of bondage still lies “heavy on his race,” the good work which he began, and carried forward, whatever and howsoever mixed his motives might have been, has never since lacked champions, both of the Sword and the Pen. Among the latter, Miss Martineau holds no mean rank. Nor can we doubt, that her work which will be eagerly prized for the interest which it excites as a romance, will, indirectly, be effectual as a moral stimulus.

So much of our space has been occupied with the beauties and excellencies of this romance, that we have neither room nor leisure left for its imperfections, if—keeping in view the whole scope of the author's design—it can be said to have any. Want of probability will be the most urgent objection. Nor do we imagine that the freed negroes, or the wives and daughters of either slaves or planters, were likely to have imbibed the elevated sentiments, or spoken the pure language put into their lips. But the business of the poet and the fictionist, who write with a moral purpose, is the possible, as much as the probable, of humanity:—not merely with what imperfect and corrupted men and women now are, at their best, but with what they are capable of becoming, when their hearts are brought under the same blessed influences which animated and swayed those of the imaginary Euphrosyne, and the perhaps not less imaginary Toussaint of this high-toned romance.

THE CONSPIRATORS is a series of unconnected tales—“Romances of Military Life,” far above the average gauge of such productions, whether we regard the power, knowledge, or artistic skill of their author, Mr Quillinan. The readers of Tait's Magazine were, in May last, made acquainted with that singular and mysterious person, James Joseph Oudet, the soul and centre of those secret Philadelphic societies which were said to exist in the army of Napoleon, and of which the object was the overthrow of the emperor and the restoration of the Bourbons. The Philadelphic societies, if not altogether apocryphal, were undoubtedly greatly mystified and exaggerated; though they are not, on this account, the less adapted to the purposes of fiction, as is proved by these tales. Mr Quillinan has made excellent use of their agency and machinery. The scene of the tales is Spain, Portugal, Germany, Switzerland, and the Tyrol, during Napoleon's wars. Though conspirators figure in each of them, they are in nowise connected, save by the common epithet. The scene of one very effective and life-like story, The Connaught Rangers, is Ireland during the insurrection of 1798. This is now a rather hackneyed period in fiction, and yet the simple story, though much less romantic than the Sisters of the Douro, or the splendid tale of The Royalist, and composed in a more subdued tone than any of the series, will, we venture to think, affect many readers more deeply, by its truthfulness and simple pathos, than the more brilliant and highly-wrought compositions, by their passion and poetry. Yet it possesses no new elements nor combinations, and narrates no startling or improbable events. The unhappy, and the more devoted because ill-starred, love of a Catholic disaffected gentleman and a Protestant lady, has often before been told. Gerald Fitzmaurice O'Neil, the eldest son of a Catholic family, is the object of the causeless but rooted dislike of his father, who destines him to holy orders. The young man, who feels no vocation, returns from Douay to his churlish home in Connaught; and while hanging on in comfortless idleness, is introduced at Dromore, the seat of Sir Guy Vernon, a bigoted Orange Protestant, blessed with one fair daughter and no other child. Love for the exquisitely womanly, and, shall we say, consequently the spoiled and somewhat capricious, Mary Vernon, had grown into impassioned strength in the breast of Gerald before the danger of his position is apprehended; nor is Mary longer heart-free; and the change and state of her affections is so naturally, and so simply and gracefully traced, that we choose this in preference to more brilliant extracts.

A change of manner soon began to be observable in Mary. At times she seemed no longer the giddy girl, fresh as the strawberry just ripened on the sunny slope beneath her window, and blithe as the young thrush that was pecking at the fruit. The animation of her cheek and eye often deserted her. She appeared to court solitude, and frequently rode to the coast, where, dismissing her pony and attendant to a hut about half a mile distant, she would take her station on some stupendous cliff, and sit for hours gazing on the tumultuous mass of waters, and indulging the spirit of her thoughts till her heart was full, almost to oppression, with a sweet and melancholy pleasure. And this was happiness—exquisite happiness!

Gerald Fitzmaurice did not always suffer her to enjoy this luxury without participation. He grew bolder in his approaches, by degrees, as he was more and more convinced that the prize was really worth winning, and willing to be won. He became a still more constant visitor at Dromore, where he was civilly enough received by Sir Guy, when he happened to be in the way, and always frankly welcomed by Lady Vernon, who frequently invited him to dinner. His walks with Mary were more frequent than before, and Lady Vernon was seldom particular in her inquiries as to the cause of her daughter's protracted absence on these occasions. In such intimate association they passed many hours of many weeks delightfully, and Fitzmaurice was every day more enchanted with the charms of his companion, and her peculiar graceful originality of manner and expression, which was even more captivating than her beauty. But he could not but be conscious that Sir Guy might not, with his Orange party-spirit, be at all willing to have a Catholic son-in-law.

And here was the luckless blot in Mary's conduct. She deceived her father, and was not ingenuous with her mother. Nothing is more common than this sort of dissimulation in a daughter towards a parent.

Among their favourite walks was a little spot which they called the Well among the Mountains, whose spring was believed to possess a holy virtue, and to which the country people, therefore, resorted on the anniversary of Saint Patrick, to whom it was dedicated. Except on that day of pilgrimage it was little frequented, but by Mary and Fitzmaurice; and the redbreast, singing to himself, was usually the only pre-occupant they found. This rustic shrine, with its most rudely carved little crucifix of wood, in its quiet nook, may be still seen within its circular shade of sycamores and thorns; and its bubbling waters still tinkle as of yore,

"basoned in an unsmuned cleft,
A beauteous spring, the rock's collected tears."

These flowery days were sweet and transient.

The Orange prejudices and predilections of Sir Guy, and some of his guests, became at length offensively apparent to Gerald; and at one loyal carouse their opinions and sentiments were so rancorously and insultingly manifested, while the party were discussing rumours of an insurrection in the West, that the young Catholic rose indignantly from the table, and left the house in fury and despair. At Douay, Gerald had been intimate with several of his disaffected countrymen, with whom he still maintained a dangerous correspondence; and many circumstances now combined to urge him on a desperate course, while pride whispered that he had returned for some loftier purpose than sighing for "an Orange bigot's daughter." The enthusiastic attachment of the peasantry to Gerald had its effect in urging him forward, and he became a secret leader of the insurgents of the West, or The Connaught Rangers. From the night that his religion and his country had been insulted, Gerald dropt all intercourse with Sir Guy; though to his secret protection the Vernon family owed their safety when danger and alarm had spread through the district, and the Protestants were deserting their homes. Were we in search of merely romantic or exciting specimens from these beautiful tales, we should at once turn to The Royalist; but this simpler Irish story, if less highly-wrought and imaginative, is not less affecting.

Fears of personal danger gradually subsiding in Sir Guy's establishment, Mary, whom confinement and the absence of Fitzmaurice rendered miserable, was allowed to take her accustomed walks. She was almost idolized by the surrounding tenantry, and so far as her own safety was concerned, had never entertained any fear at all. But the conduct of Fitzmaurice was unaccountable to her; and, as she wandered again among the scenes of her childhood, she felt that their charm was no longer the same. He whose presence had of late afforded her in her walks or rides a novelty of delight, of which she was too inexperienced in the subtleties of love to analyze the cause, was no longer at her side; and every prospect looked dreary and forlorn. She had, one day, in this mournful state of spirits, rode towards the sea-shore, and sent her pony home, saying that she would return on foot.

Lovelier than Naiad by the side
Of Grecian brook, or Lady of the Mere Sole sitting by the shores of old Romance, she sat down on the edge of one of the dark frightful precipices of Altho, and the grandeur of the scenes around her could not divest her thoughts of their deep sadness. At her feet the waters of the Atlantic dashed against the rocks, and receded with hoarse unceasing murmurs. Before her, across the heaving waters, the mountains of Donegal rose, purple in the distance. On the left swelled her own wild height, the hill of the heart, and on her right Knocknaree and Benbulbin. The strong beams of the sun were darted under and between rich masses of dark clouds. The broad decided lines and sheets of light thus thrown upon the hills and waves gave them a magical character. Any mind but the love-struck mind of Mary might have been enchanted. But scenery, however sublime, and however efficient to raise for awhile the spirit that droops under worldly troubles, cannot win a youthful heart from the earnest tenderness with which it dwells on its first and most spiritual passion. It rather co-operates with solitude to strengthen, and almost to sanctify, the feeling.

The love of a young woman (such love as deserves the name) is no sordid calculation of selfish interests; the happiness of its object is her first, her own the second consideration only, depending on the first. It is this absence of self, this generous devotedness in woman, that makes her first passion so pure and so delightful.

Every thing near her reminded Mary Vernon of the absence of Fitzmaurice. On that very rock where she was now seated he had, at various times, read to her the Odes of Collins, the Pastor Fido of Guarini, and St Pierre's affecting tale of the Mauritius. Along that coast they had often strayed together, and often had she ventured too near the edges of the precipice to be secretly delighted with his vigilance in drawing her away, and his reproachful petulance in exaggerating her temerity. From one of the neighbouring acclivities most difficult of access, he had procured for her a young merlin-hawk, having heard her express a wish to possess one of those beautiful birds. It had grown so tame under her care as frequently to fly after her in her rambles, sometimes perching on her neck, yet showing all its native fierceness to strangers, and permitting the familiarity of no one but its mistress. In short, there was not a spot around her which had not been endeared, of late, beyond its early charm by some association with Fitzmaurice. She had continued musing on the pleasures that were past, till her dejection became insupportable, and she rose to return home. On looking at the sun she was astonished to find him in the west, and her watch converted her surprise into agitation, by showing her the lateness of the hour. She resolved to hurry home; but a disappointment that weighed down her mind seemed also to retard her steps; for, however unreasonable the expectation, she had almost unconsciously indulged a hope of encountering Fitzmaurice on his favourite coast. The shades of evening were gathering fast, as she entered the avenue of oaks, whose usual gloom was already nearly deepened into the obscurity of midnight. Appalled at the darkness, and eager to terminate the solitude that her long absence must have occasioned, she was hastening on, when a well-known voice arrested her and fixed her in amazement to the spot—"Mary!" And the hand of Fitzmaurice held her's while he spoke: "Pity and forgive a wretch whose destiny forces him from you, and hurries him to destruction. I would say, forget me too, but I cannot bear that Mary should quite forget me.—You will be told—"

He was proceeding when the swift approach of horsemen was heard. He raised to his lips the hand which he had taken, and in a moment vanished. Poor Mary remained motionless till the horsemen came up; and, in the exclamation of inquiry which they uttered, she recognized the voices of two of her father's servants who had been sent in quest of her, and had met each other in returning from their unsuccessful search. In a state of emotion, easily imagined, she preceded them to the house, and rushed into the arms of her mother. Lady Vernon was prepared to reprove her, and began to inquire peremptorily into the cause of an absence so extraordinary; but the excited girl burst into tears and entreated to be spared. The tears of Mary were ever irresistible, and at once silenced both question and reproach from the too-indulgent mother.

Sir Guy was gone to Sligo on magisterial business, and was not expected back for two days.

The next day Sir Guy Vernon returned, and the intelligence that he brought completed the misery of his daughter, and struck Lady Vernon with dismay. Gerald Fitzmaurice O'Neil had joined the rebels at ———, and two or three hundred of his father's tenants had followed him. A considerable body of troops was in motion to attack them, and it was confidently expected that the insurgents would be put down before they could concentrate much strength in that portion of the island.

Sir Guy was now among the most active in watching the proscribed Fitzmaurice. He had never once suspected his daughter's attachment to the rebel, but Lady Vernon was not so blind to her child's past feelings, nor to her present misery. She was no bigot, and she had tacitly allowed that growing affection between the young people from which she had not anticipated such fatal results. The mother and daughter thus understood each other's secret feelings; and though both avoided explanation, it was to Mary blessed relief to shed her tears on the bosom of her mother, unquestioned and unblamed.

Mary now passed a considerable portion of each morning in the avenue, where she walked with a quick and impatient step, watching for the return of the messenger who was daily despatched to the Post-office at Sligo, a distance of twelve miles. She was not long without intelligence concerning Fitzmaurice. After a few days—ages to her—an account arrived of an engagement in which the insurgents had been totally routed by the king's troops. Fitzmaurice, when all was over, had effected his escape from the field, or at least such was the general belief, as he was not recognized among the prisoners or killed, though he had been noticed in the act of attempting to rally a small body of the fugitives towards the close of the contest. The newspapers contained a proclamation offering rewards of various amount for the apprehension of such of the insurgent leaders as were supposed to have absconded; and on the list of proclaimed was the name of Gerald Fitzmaurice O'Neil, for the seizure of whom the sum of a thousand pounds was offered. A mortal numbness of frame awhile arrested the sensibility to mental suffering in Mary after this was read. But the kindly stupor did not last long; and the unhappy girl was for some days in a state of horrible excitement that threatened to subvert her reason. The constant and judicious attention of her mother saved her from this worst calamity, and so touched the warm grateful heart of Mary, that, by efforts infinitely painful, she forced herself into an appearance of resignation in her presence. But when alone, she gave way without reserve to the anguish of her heart.

While in this condition, and wandering like a ghost in her lonely haunts, she is startled by hearing her name breathed in "that deep, sweet tone which could not be mistaken," and a letter fell at her feet, in which the fugitive Gerald, about to escape, implored a last interview "with almost the only person upon earth the forfeiture of whose society could make him regret the part he had taken in a just though unprosperous cause."

Nor could Mary refuse this last prayer of her unhappy lover. On the extract which follows we are content to rest our admiration of these tales, although their merits are of a varied and comprehensive, as well as a high character.

At as early an hour on the following morning as Mary could quit the house without exciting remark or curiosity she set forward with a beating heart. Numerous were the times that she paused and looked round to see if she were followed or observed. The lark that sprung from her feet startled and affrighted her, and the faint sound of her own quick footsteps seemed to be unusually loud, and likely to betray her course and its object to some enemy of Fitzmaurice. At length she arrived at the coast, and she had scarcely seated herself on one of the rocks overhanging the sea, when her expectation was roused by one of those shrill piercing whistles that the Irish peasants blow between their fingers, and by which they convey signals to a distance beyond which the blast of a bugle-horn would hardly be heard. Though she could perceive no person near, she had not the least doubt but that this notice proceeded from some one in the confidence of Fitzmaurice; and, accordingly, in a few moments, she discerned her friend, approaching round the beach below, not so disguised but that the quick eye of fondness knew him. He was dressed in the common garb of a sailor. He surmounted the steep with ease, and was almost immediately at the side of Mary, whose hand he took fervently and silently, and whom he at once conducted down the rocks by a descent dizzy and difficult, though somewhat less abrupt than the crags which he had climbed. Supported by the arm of Fitzmaurice, she felt no personal fear. When they had descended but a little way, they became enveloped as it were amid the dark cliffs, till, at a sudden turn, they found themselves, near the edge of a tremendous precipice, on a rock, which, jutting considerably beyond the rest, stretched over upon the ocean. This is the fa-avourite haunt of the sea-fowl. At the appearance of Mary and Fitzmaurice, the birds started away with a simultaneous burst, and wheeled and hovered over them with loud melancholy screams, literally obscuring the air for some moments by the abrupt expansion of such a multitude of wings.

Large flocks of cormorants, with their long picturesque forms of shining jet, and gulls with their white breasts and wild bright eyes and backs of ashy gray, have their nests in this part of the coast, and are to be seen promiscuously mingled along the rocks, to which they give an extraordinary appearance by their inconceivable numbers and the contrasts of their colours and shapes.

It was not the first time that Mary had ventured to this place with her companion. In more auspicious hours they had visited it together, and, among the solemn sights and sounds which it presented, had tempered down the giddy ecstasy of youthful enjoyment to the reflective sobriety in which true happiness is best felt and understood. In their present altered condition, Fitzmaurice only found the place favourable to the darkest contemplations; and, as he stood with Mary on the brink of the abyss, after a long silence, he hastily turned to her, and, with a hurried but emphatical expression, borrowing the language of another enthusiast, exclaimed; "Do you remember the ancient use of the rock of Leucadia? This place resembles it in many respects: the rock is high, the water is deep, and I am in despair."

Mary did not shrink back at this dreadful question; she only clung more closely to his arm, as if resolute to share his fate, should he be so desperate as to decide it there. Fitzmaurice was the first to recover from this horrible state of mind, and snatched her away with trembling eagerness. "This place," said he, "is not good for us, Mary. These brown rocks look churlishly upon us, and these clamorous birds are shrieking their dismissal to me too harshly and too soon."

He supported her to the foot of the cliff, and, after walking for a short distance along the beach, turned into a deep recess formed by a chasm in the rock. Here they were quite concealed from observation from the land side, and could descry any vessel or boat that might appear on the sea, whose murmur was the only sound that now reached their ears.

There are, along this shore, several of these secluded inlets, which, notwithstanding the cries of the sea-birds resounding among the adjacent heights, are so silent and so lonely that they might seem to have had no visitors but the waves since the foundation of the world. Such was the tranquillity of the spot to which these lovers had now retired, and where they were about to undergo the agony of parting without hope of reunion. The majestic rocks were around and above them; the sun was in his glory, in the rich blue heaven; the green space of waters spread before them; and the waves, pursuing each other over the yellow sands, rippled at their feet. To happy lovers such a scene and such an hour would have "sent into the heart a summer feeling." To an exile, about to be cut off for ever from his native shore, where, in future, his very name would be a by-word of execration—except among the lowly and devoted peasants, whose wretchedness of condition had only been aggravated by the frantic plot in which he had encouraged them—except, too, with her who was, as yet for a little while, sitting pale and speechless at his side—to him, and to that young fond victim of his errors and her love, how did that sun shine in mockery, and that peaceful retreat invite to happiness in vain! They sat in the mute anguish of hopelessness, neither daring to address the other, lest the answer should be—farewell!

Fitzmaurice at last remembered that Mary was far from home, and that many reasons required the termination of this useless and afflicting interview. He addressed her in a voice almost inarticulate from emotion. "I resolved at all risks to see you, Mary, before my departure; and perhaps I owe my safety to this resolution; for a quarter where I am so well known is the last in which my enemies would expect to find me. I thought that it would be some alleviation to my misery if I could but be convinced that, in spite of my unworthiness, you had not entirely cast me off from your regard.

To-night I shall be abroad on the Atlantic. I shall never behold you more; but I shall hear that you are the bride of some better and happier man, and my yearning heart will torment me into madness."

"O, my unhappy friend," replied Mary, "how shall I convince you of the error of that fear? To-night you will be on the Atlantic—Shall I go with you, Gerald, and break my mother's heart, and make the hearth of my father desolate?"

"No, lovely and generous girl; I will never lure you from your parents to follow the fortunes of an outlawed man. I am not so lost to honour as to tempt you to such a sacrifice and such a crime."

Overcome with agitation, Fitzmaurice burst into tears. Those of Mary had long been flowing; but when she saw her lover weep, she threw herself into his arms with a shriek of which the thrilling delirious agony was such that Fitzmaurice, for years afterwards, could not revert to this moment without shuddering. She clung to his bosom with the energy of a maniac, while he soothed her with all the prodigality of fond expression.

They were suddenly alarmed by a screaming whistle, still more shrill and piercing than that which had given Fitzmaurice notice of Mary's arrival at the cliff.

"What can that sound mean?" whispered Mary, trembling; it is surely the cry of a banshee; no human signal was ever so dreadful."

"It is the cry of my death-ghost, Mary," said Fitzmaurice, solemnly, after pausing to listen for a few seconds; "I am taken in the toils. Can Dillon have betrayed me? Now leave me, and God for ever and for ever bless you!"

"I will not leave you, Gerald," was the answer; and she twined her arms round him and listened. Then, suddenly disengaging herself, she exclaimed: "Fly, fly, Fitzmaurice, I hear the tread of many feet upon the sands."

"It is too late to fly," he replied, "the bloodhounds are too near: but let them not see you; remain in this cave, and I will meet them."

He kissed her cheek and rushed forward; but he dragged her with him, for she had again clung to his arm. At that instant a detachment of twelve foot-soldiers, with an officer, appeared, accompanied by two persons on horseback, Sir Guy Vernon (followed by a groom) and Mr Sullivan. Fitzmaurice stood motionless, with Mary on his arm, till they came close up. Sir Guy's astonishment and rage, at finding his daughter in such a situation, it would not be easy to depict. He had never, till that instant, suspected her attachment.

Sir Guy poured out a volley of execrations, and fiercely called on the soldiers to seize the papist traitor, Gerald Fitzmaurice O'Neil, whom he further insulted with abuse to which he received no answer. The officer had halted his men, and he now commanded them not to stir; and, walking singly up to Fitzmaurice, he said to him, in a tone not unsoftened by compassion, "Sir, you are my prisoner." Fitzmaurice bent his head in acquiescence, while Mary precipitated herself towards her father, and implored him to have mercy, which was now not less far from his inclination than from his power. His only notice of her supplication was, "Take that wretched girl away, Sullivan, and see her home."

Gerald Fitzmaurice was carried off by the party; but Mary, on her way home, contrives a rescue for her lover, which is completely successful, and which deepens his admiration of the tenderness and energy of her from whom he was parted for ever. He escapes from Sligo in an American merchantman; but the lovers, after long separation, meet again; nor are their trials ended; and the close of the story, though it may disappoint the ordinary readers of romance, gently harmonizes with its sober, mournful, and life-like tone. Gerald was now a Roman Catholic priest, the disciple of Fenealon, filled with high notions of the duties of his sacred function ; and Mary became his placid and comparatively happy Protestant friend ; and no tongue was heard to utter, nor mind known to harbour a sentiment injurious to the reputation of either of these early and passionate lovers, and ever devoted friends.

In the tale of The Royalist, Hofer is introduced ; and the dreamy and half-mad German student, the boy Stappa, who had vowed the death of Napoleon, and expiated an attempt on the life of the emperor by the forfeiture of his own life. Napoleon is represented, in the Philadelphic Tales, as the prey of continual apprehensions from secret assassins, and as having consulted personal safety, as much as ambition, in a union with an Austrian princess. The historical scenes, if they display knowledge and ability, are, however, not so pleasing as the family groups of the Hoffmans, the parish priest, and his housekeeper in the village of Mollis, and the canton of Glaris, and the households of Hofer and his brave compatriots in the Tyrol. Nothing, indeed, can be more charming than the freshness of the characters and the pictures of national manners, or the descriptions of the magnificent and lovely scenery of the Alps, with their lakes and valleys, and the merry and picturesque penitential pilgrimage to the altar of Our Lady of the Hermits. Mr Quillinan has, apparently, a personal knowledge of this region, and also of those parts of the peninsula which he describes in the "Sisters of the Douro." In this tale he has, in the conversations of a young Portuguese lady with her admirer, an English officer, gracefully given a rapid view of the literature of Portugal. Indeed, the whole of these compositions display talents and attainments which do not necessarily belong to even the better order of romance writers.

One, at parting, would like to be better certified that this author's dislike of Napoleon proceeded not from lurking royalist prejudice, but from a sincere love of that liberty which Napoleon despised, betrayed, and trampled under foot.

We have left ourselves no space to speak of "The Siege of Florence," another historical romance well worthy of the distinction of being classed with "Cromwell" and "The Conspirators ;" but, approaching nearer to the standard of pure romance, in its wild characters and marvellous incidents. As a well-connected story, it is much superior to the historical novel of Cromwell, while, in many scenes, it approaches the descriptive beauty of "The Conspirators."

That we may not need to return to novels again, for some time, we shall catalogue those we can recommend :—"The Dowager," by Mrs Gore, whose works need no recommendation ; "The Three Peers," by Lady Stepney, an entertaining romance, and a work which, as a juvenile performance, we regard as of high promise ; "The Romance of Jewish History," by the Misses Moes, young Jewesses, well read in the romantic annals of their illustrious nation, and by no means deficient in circulating-library lore.

To "Cromwell" we purpose to return. It is not a work to be either slighted or slightly handled : and our space for novels is fully occupied.

BY JOHN BOWRING.

PART VIII.

REMINISCENCES OF BOWOOD, ITS INMATES AND VISITERS.

"Bowood, Monday Evening,
(half after 10 o'clock) Sept. 17, 1781.

"The whist-table is just broke up, supper is announced, the game at chess between Lord Chatham and Miss V——, is drawing near to a conclusion, and, while the rest of the people are hovering round them, waiting for the event, I have taken French leave of them all, and stolen up here, that I may be a good boy to-morrow, and rise betimes. This Lord and Lady Tracton are the queerest jigs you ever saw : my lord wears his bob-wig, black coat, and coloured worsted stockings, and looks like a plain, stout, thickset country parson. My lady is a little shrivelled figure, of about sixty—with a hook nose, and ferret eyes, a long white beard, and a parchment mahogany-coloured skin—in a gray riding-habit, with a black hat and feather. Nobody speaks to her, nor she to any body ; she has been sticking close to her husband's side while he has been playing at whist, but would not play herself.

"Tuesday Evening, September 18th.

"We have, just now, a monstrous heap of people. Departed before breakfast, Pratt and the Pitts. Remain, Lord and Lady Tracton. Arrived before dinner, Lord Dartry and Colonel Barré, seemingly in company. Arrived before tea, Lord Camden, Miss Pratt, his daughter, and a Mr Smith, now or formerly a captain in the East India service. The carriages came in together ; but whether Smith belongs to Lord Camden and his daughter I cannot tell ; no signs of converse between them have I seen. Lord Dartry is a chatty sort of man, and seems to know everybody ; does not seem to trouble his head about party, but mixes with the Government as well as Opposition men. His wife is a good deal in favour with the queen, and often with her. She is of the family of the Penns. Miss Pratt is very fat ; not handsome nor very young : but well-bred, conversable, sensible, and, as far as one can judge, good-natured. Lord and Lady S., Lord Tracton, Lord Dartry, and Colonel Barré have been at the whist table ; the rest of us round the book table, à l'ordinaire, except that, for the last half-hour, Lord Camden has been walking in a passage room with Barré. With Lord Camden I have had, as yet, scarce any communication ; but, while the women have been at their work, I, with my book before me, have been joining in conversation occasionally with his daughter ; and Lords C. and S., I observed, were in close conversation for some time, with looks that seemed to indicate that they were talking about me.

" Wednesday Afternoon, 8 o'clock.

"This morning, before breakfast, Lord and Lady Tracton took themselves off. Joy go with them ; they were a pair of c—d sangliers, the latter more particularly to my dear Lady Shelburne, whose footsteps I adore. Miss V——, alas ! leaves us the day after to-morrow, without redemption. I forgot to tell you of a dinner visiter we had the day before yesterday, a Mr Talbot, a name he had taken from an estate, instead of Davenport. He is a young man but lately come of age. He has been to Christ Church in Oxford, and has now thoughts of going into the army. His family-house is in the neighbourhood—at or near Cosham, where Methuen lives ; it is an old monastery—one of the most perfect, they say, in England ; it is a vast place ; and the estate, though a nominal £2,000 a-year, is so reduced by encumbrances, as to bring him in, it is said, scarce £500 ; so that a profession is absolutely necessary to him. The man whom he has his estate from, was obliged to fly the country for Italian eccentricities. In the young man himself there is nothing that seems remarkable.

"Barré loves to sit over his claret, pushes it about pretty briskly, and abounds in stories that are well told, and very entertaining. He really seems to have a great command of language ; he states clearly and forcibly ; and, upon all points, his words are fluent and well-chosen. Lord Dartry is also intelligent and entertaining. They were talking over Irish affairs this afternoon ; their conversation was instructive : when they differed, as they did now and then, about matters of fact as well as opinion, it was with great firmness and urbanity. I put a word in now and then to keep the ball up, and to avoid appearing a perfect ninny : but it was pain and grief to me. My health is, somehow or other, in wretched order. I scarce know how to get up early enough ; even six o'clock is too late.

"Hyde Parker, it is said (this is Barré's story,) is not to have any thing after all. Being offered the command of a fleet against the Dutch, he demanded a reinforcement, but was denied. Afterwards a reinforcement was ordered : then he declared himself willing to serve, but then they would not let him. This, Col. Barré said, he had from an officer who is intimate with Parker, 'Ah, Johnny,' (said the old man, to his friend,) 'it was a rare bout ; 'twould ha' done thy heart good to have seen it ; there was not a shot that did not take effect on either side.'

" September 24th, Monday Evening, half after 10 o'clock.

"This morning, at eight, I received yours of the 20th ; but let that pass. I will go on at present with my Journal. Thursday, nothing happened that I can recollect worth mentioning. No fresh visiters.

"On Friday, the prediction given of Miss V——'s departure in the last page was but too well verified. There was a little incident—no, I won't go on with the sentence—a little piece of attention she showed me the night before, which, while it flattered my vanity, made me feel the loss of her the more sensibly.

"On the Sunday before, she and I had been playing at chess. Pitt, who did not play at the whist-table, and Lord Chatham, who cut in and out, had been occasionally looking on. After she had lost two games to me, which was as many as she ever had been used to play, she gave it up ; whereupon Pitt proposed we should play, which we did, and I beat him.

"Finding he had no chance with me, he complained of its hurting his head, and gave it up immediately ; towards the close of the evening, Lord Chatham gave me a challenge. I accepted it. From something that Pitt had said, I expected to have found him an easy conquest, especially as there was something seemingly irregular in the opening of his game ; but it was a confounded bite ; for I soon found his hand as heavy over me as I ever have felt yours : in short, he beat me shamefully, and the outcries I made on that occasion were such as would naturally convey to other people a formidable idea of his prowess. Now, what is all this to Miss V——? Why, the next evening, Tuesday, Pitt first proposed a game to her ; they played, and I don't know which beat, but, after playing one game, she declined playing any more. The words were scarce out of her mouth, when Lord Shelburne, from the whist-table, by way of saying something, called to me, as if pitying me for not being able to get a game. Upon that day, each of them proposed I should play with the other. After some pour parlers, as Miss V—— had before declined playing any more with Pitt, I thought it would be civiler to both of them for me not to make any proposal to her ; so I asked Pitt, but he declined it, saying, as he did before, that his head would not bear more than a game at a sitting. Accordingly the chess board was laid aside, and we took to our books à l'ordinaire. About an hour, or an hour and a half afterwards, Lord Chatham having cut out at the whist-table, came to the library-table and proposed to Miss V—— to play a game with him. She consented, and they had just time to play a game before supper. He beat her, of course, though not with so high a hand as one would have expected. Tuesday morning, as I told you, Lord Chatham went away ; and, on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, as Miss Pratt was there, and not playing at whist, I thought it not proper to say any thing about chess to Miss V——. Well, now comes the mighty favour. On Thursday, towards the close of the evening, she called me to her, and asked me (which was what she had never done before) whether I would play a game at chess with her, observing that she had used me excessively ill in refusing me, and then playing with Lord Chatham. Mighty thankful I was, as you may imagine. We sat down immediately, and we were mighty sociable and merry; more so than I had ever observed her on any occasion before; inasmuch that Lord Shelburne, from the whist-table, took notice of it; adding, that, whatever was the reason, he never saw her laugh with anybody so much as with me. When I talked to her about going, and asked her what time it was to be in the morning, she said that I should not see her, for that it would be before I was up. Well!—and what of all this?—you will say; a fine winded story this is, à la mode de Benham, to cook up about nothing at all. Why, to be sure it is; and if this had happened with some women, I should never have made any reflection on it, even in my own mind, much less have thought of boring you with it; but were you but acquainted with the girl, and à portée (as Clinton would say) to observe the extreme dignity, and coolness, and silence, and reserve, as much as is consistent with great good nature, (which it would be injustice to deny her,) you would then, and not otherwise, be able to estimate the value of any such little expression of complacency as I have been mentioning. Oh! and I have not told you either that it was by her means that I got upon the footing that I am upon of playing upon the harpsichord, (I mean upon the fiddle with the harpsichord,) every afternoon with Lady Shelburne; but that story I shall spare you: nor of the air of cordiality and attention with which she received the whisper in which I took my leave of her at night: in short, she actually took the sort of notice which no well-bred woman could have avoided taking of any man who was paying her a compliment of that sort. In the morning, you will have concluded, I made a point of being in the way to hand her to her carriage; but I did not, thinking it might be deemed an act of impertinence, and might give occasion to her maid, or people who did not know the great gulfs of a hundred and fifty kinds that are fixed between us, to prate.

“You can’t imagine what a reserve there is in the manners of this house, and how little there has been of gallantry towards her in the behaviour of all the men that have been here, young and old, as far as I have had occasion to observe.

“Lord Shelburne’s carriage took us but one stage; there it waited (it was at Malmesbury) for Miss Fox, who is sent here from Warwick castle, (you will excuse me, but it really is the Earl of Warwick’s castle at Warwick, and not Captain Donellan’s in exchange.) Miss F—— is a little girl, between thirteen and fourteen; a sister, and the only one, of the present Lord H——, who is about nine, consequently niece to C—— F—— and to Lady Shelburne, and great-niece to the Duchess of Bedford. The Duke of Bedford is now at this same Warwick castle; we shall hardly see him here, at least, I shan’t. She is very prettily made, and has already a very womanly sort of bosom, I assure you; as much so as a certain friend of ours at Brompton, notwithstanding the difference of age. By the by, I have a letter from that same friend at Brompton, who is a saucy slut, and tells me of her being just going to write to you, and that she likes you as well, ay, better, than she does me. Lord Shelburne introduced me to Miss F—— in a more particular manner than he did anybody else, as a favourite of Miss V——’s. We are very good friends: she, too, plays at chess; she is very fond of it. We played yesterday; and, I suppose, shall be playing every evening. She seems a good-natured, pleasant kind of girl; but has not much to say for herself, as yet, as you may imagine. Her face—I had like to have forgot her face—is far from an unpleasing one: but the form of it, which is rather too long, a mouth, which is the F—— mouth, and a set of teeth, which, though white, are rather too large, save her from being a beauty.

“On Friday, at dinner, we had again Mr Bull and Captain Onslow; and now, for the first time, a Mr Brooke, who was upon a visit to Mr Bull. Brooke is, or has been, something in the law; probably at the bar. I have a notion of having seen him taking notes in the King’s Bench—a little, dapper man, with a sharp face. Captain Onslow told me, that Brooke had lately met the Q. S. P.’s at Bath, drinking tea at Mr Poole’s; a man who is a son of Sergeant Poole, had a good fortune, but was once at the Crown-office with Abbot. Brooke has a house somewhere in this country.

“On Saturday there dined with us, a Mrs Johns. Mrs Johns was a sort of dependant of Lord S.’s first wife; lives gratis in a little house of my lord’s close by; is a Methodist; comes a-begging to great people for money to give in charity; is a conversable woman, who has seen the world, and has court connexions. She has distributed money for the queen; and, though she has the dress and appearance of an upper servant, has had correspondence with all manner of great people, and could be made use of occasionally to put news about. This is the account Lord S. was giving me of her.

“On Monday, Lord Dartry left us: it was he that pushed the bottle about, and not Colonel Barré. I beg the colonel’s pardon. He is a valetudinarian; finds it necessary to have a bottle a-day in his guts; is fond of religion, and of cards; does not know very well what to do with himself; hunts out oddities and knickknacks, and frequents auctions.

“On Tuesday, in the morning, Captain Smith took his departure. He was once an East India director; he has a house in Bloomsbury Square, and another at Ashsted, near Epsom. He found out that I was profoundly conversant with E. India affairs (you know how profoundly,) offered me access to unedited maps and MSS. of various kinds, and gave me pressing and repeated invitations to both his houses; mentioning connexions that he had with people who were philosophical men, and would be glad to be acquainted with me. Shall I go? I can’t tell; we’ll talk about it. He wrote a pamphlet once on India affairs, which Lord S. had taken notice of as one he approved of mightily, and never knew Smith to be the author till Monday night. It is entitled—“Observations on the Present Posture of Affairs in India, &c.”

"The same morning, Lord Camden and Miss Pratt went off to Beckford's at Fonthill; but they return to-morrow, or next day. Beckford, I told you before, was to have a grand fête on the 27th or 28th, upon his coming of age. Lord Camden went yesterday, in order to be before the fête; I suppose on account of Miss Pratt's not being prepared for it in the article of clothes. Lord Shelburne goes on Friday and returns the next day. Lord Camden likes all these bustles; Lord S. not. Nor would he go, I believe, but in view of fixing or drawing young Beckford into his party. Between him and old Beckford the alderman, you know, I suppose, that there was an intimate connexion.

"This was the day that Lord S. was to give the second and last treat to his corporation people; the first had been given since I have been here. Having missed that opportunity, I was very glad of this occasion of being witness to such a scene. I accordingly went and dined at Calne with my lord and Colonel Barré. We drank tea at Mr Bull's, and, coming home, found Mrs Dunning. She had left her husband at Bristol, and he is expected on Friday or Saturday. She plays on the harpsichord most divinely. I have just been accompanying her.

"Well, but I must go down—Miss F—— is waiting for me. Parson Townsend came to-day to dinner; and now we shall probably settle a day for Lord S. and Barré to go and dine with them; and that will probably fix the date of my departure from this place. What do you think I heard from Barré yesterday in the coach? that Mrs Armistead had taken, or bought, Lady Tankerville's, on St. Anne's Hill; so that you will have her for a neighbour. Who pays for it, whether Lord Derby or the prince, I have not learnt. Send these two sheets to Davies, as soon as you get a frank, together with all the others which are not exclusively to yourself. The copying machine does not do."

"Bowood, 28th September, 1781.

"One of Lord Shelburne's channels of American intelligence, is through General Grey, with whom he appears to be on a footing of some intimacy. Grey is, at present, at Plymouth, and from thence sends him letters which he (Grey) has received from America. General Camden was giving instances that have come very lately within his knowledge of the freedom used at the Post-office with letters that come from thence. In one letter, which he seemed to have seen, a part was actually cut out; but it was managed so clumsily, that what remained announced the contents of what was taken away. Lord S. was telling me, upon a former occasion, that there was a whole department in the office on purpose for that business.

"The same accounts still continue that we have heard before, of Clinton's eccentricities: that he shuts himself up for three or four days together, and is seen by nobody. It seems to be true that he has recalled Lord Cornwallis, either through jealousy or necessity. A paper received by Lord S. makes Washington upwards of 11,000 strong, including 4000, and, I think, two hundred French, but exclusive of militia: pieces of cannon, eighty-six. I saw the particulars in his hand; but I must not think of copying. There was a talk of 7000 or 8000 militia. Clinton was said to have about 9000 men that he could spare from ports and garrisons. Washington's vicinity straitened him, it is said, for provisions; and that was mentioned as the chief reason for his recalling Cornwallis.

"When Lord Bristol came here, it was, as he said, to thank Lord Shelburne for favours; I mean the share he had in getting him the bishoprick. When the late Lord Bristol was Lord-lieutenant, the bishoprick being vacant, he got a promise of it from the king. Meantime, Lord Townshend succeeded; and he, regardless of his predecessor's promise, made interest for somebody else. Lord Shelburne, when Secretary of State, reminded the king of his promise, and obtained the necessary document, which he sent over without delay. After this, Lord S. thought himself well entitled, upon the present occasion, to ask Lord B. for an Irish living, which he wants just now to satisfy the cravings of a man of Calne, who has a son a parson, and whose political chastity is assailed by Robinson of the Treasury. Lord Bristol changed the discourse, and would not hear him. This is exact: having heard Lord S. repeat it two or three times, Barré says, and says it seriously, that now he has some chance; but that, had Lord B. promised, he would have none. Everybody seems to be agreed about two things: that he is touched in his noddle, and that he draws a long bow.

"Lord Dartry says, the Irish exports, by the last accounts, were four millions a-year. Barré doubts, but Lord Dartry insists. Barré says he will write over to know.

"Some time after Lord Hertford had been Lord-lieutenant of Ireland, umbrage had been taken by the House of Lords there at something relative to one of their clerks. Being closely interrogated, he confessed at length, with much agitation, that the profits of his place were not what they might seem to be; for that, on being appointed to it, he had been forced to undertake for paying so much to Lord Beauchamp, whether a gross sum or an annuity, I forget. The House, therefore, transmitted a state of the case, with a complaint, to be laid before his majesty. It came, as in course, to Lord Shelburne; he being then Secretary of State. Lord S. from a notion of decency, thought proper, before he presented it, to give notice to Lord Hertford. He, accordingly, wrote a note to Lord H., saying that he had some particular business which he wished to talk to him about, and that he would be glad either to wait on him or to receive his visit. Lord H., little thinking how nearly it concerned him, gave rather a cavalier answer, appointing Lord S. to wait on him. What passed afterwards was slurred over in an obscure way, as usual; but so it was, that the complaint was stifled (as Lord S. says he must acknowledge to his shame,) and never reached the king. This is odd enough; for how came the Lords, when they saw it stick, not to follow it up? This was told after dinner to-day, in presence of all the company, except the ladies. Lord Beauchamp, it was also said, rides an Irish bishop. This the bishop bolted out one day, out of patience with hearing himself accused of stinginess for not living up to the apparent value of his income.

"Lord Dartry says, Penn, the proprietor, is living in Philadelphia in a state of the utmost indigence. After paying rent-charges created in favour of younger children, &c., or what encumbrances there are, he does not receive so much as £200 a-year. This is what Lord Dartry is in a way to know; Lady Dartry being a great-granddaughter of the first Penn's."

"1781, September 29.—Miss Pratt, Bowood, to J. B., ibid. Challenge given in drollery, under the name of Brookes:—

"'Sir,—Your ungentlemanlike behaviour, the last time I dined at his Lordship's, did not pass unnoticed. I am, sir, a man of honour, though, I believe, you did not think so. Sir, behind the lodge is a convenient place, where I shall expect you to give me satisfaction for winks and nods, and, in short, sir, behaviour that I don't understand, and won't take tamely. Swords or pistols, choose your weapons, as they are equal to your humble and offended servant,

"' J. BROOKES.

"' Calae, September 3^d 29th.

"' By seven o'clock to-morrow I shall be at the place appointed. No seconds.'"

"Bowood, 30th September, 1781.

"Sunday night, half after ten.

"HONOURED SIR,—To day, at dinner, I had the favour of yours of the 29th, as to my not seconding my last letter sooner. My own reproaches anticipated yours; but the fact is, it is with the utmost difficulty I have been able to find time for even this short tribute of duty, whatever it may prove. All the time I can get in the morning before breakfast, I find it absolutely necessary for my health to devote to exercise. Nor is even that always enough; for between breakfast and dinner, even although there should be no party made for any thing, I sometimes find it necessary to get on horseback and shake myself. It is but now and then that I have been able to get a morning to bestow upon any book, or on a few letters which, for one purpose or another, I have had occasion to write. After dinner, while the gentlemen are still at their bottle, I steal away to the library, where I meet Lady Shelburne, and wait on her to her dressing-room: there we have music of some kind or other, unless there happen to be ladies in the house, who are not musically disposed. When the gentlemen leave the dining-room, or if the weather permit of it, have done walking, we meet them again in the library to drink coffee; after which, unless Lady Shelburne wants me to make one at whist, it is absolutely necessary I should be in readiness to play at chess with Miss Fox, whose Cavaliere Serviente I have been, ever since she came here from Warwick castle in exchange for Miss V——.

Our company consists, at this present writing, of the persons following:—Lord Camden, Miss Pratt, and Mr Pratt (his Lordship's son and daughter,) Mr William Pitt (Lord Chatham's brother: there are such a heap of Pitts, it is necessary to distinguish.) Mr Banks (your Banks,) Colonel Barré, Mr and Mrs Dunning, Mr and Mrs, and two Miss Sturts (Sturt, member for Dorsetshire,) Miss F—— (the daughter of Stephen, the late Lord H——,) I have already mentioned. All these, Miss F—— excepted, are actually at supper. Mrs Dunning came on Tuesday; she is just ready to fall to pieces. Mr Dunning to-day after dinner, very much fatigued with the hard work which you have seen and heard of. Mrs Dunning is a perfect mistress of the harpsichord, and a very agreeable woman, though not very young nor handsome; but that's Mr D.'s concern, not mine. Miss Pratt sings extremely well, and plays on various instruments; she is lively, sensible, good-natured, and has every accomplishment but beauty, in which, however, she is not remarkably deficient. Miss F—— is a sprightly good-natured little girl, not fourteen, but forward for her age; she too plays on the harpsichord.

"Monday, half after ten at night.

"By to-morrow a whole posse of people will be gone; some of them to my very great regret: among them Mrs Dunning and Miss Pratt. Mr and Mrs Dunning went off in a violent hurry this morning, under the apprehension of Mrs D.'s being brought to bed. If it had not been for this accident they would have staid some time. I had not an opportunity of exchanging ten words with him, so that I had not time to make an acquaintance with him, which was what, for Mrs D.'s sake much more than for his, I greatly coveted. Miss Pratt, while she was here, drew Miss F——'s picture, and has just been making me a present of it. Before coffee was over, they made me leave the company and come with them into Lady Shelburne's dressing-room, where we very frankly avowed to one another our regrets at parting. There we had been about an hour, when Lady S. stole away from the company, and staid with us almost another hour, leaving the Sturts to take care of themselves! She took the precaution, however, to cut them out employment, some at cards, some at chess, that they might not come and interrupt us. They are but odd sort of people: Miss Sturt has been suffered to fancy she plays in a superior manner upon the harpsichord, without having the least notion of it. Would you have thought of my being in such favour with the ladies? yet so it is; and, to crown all, it was under favour of a good word which was put in for me by Miss V——, notwithstanding all her reserve, that I first got the entrées of this same dressing-room, which I am so fond of.

"Tuesday Morning.

"This morning departed Lord Camden and Miss Pratt, the Sturts, Will Pitt, and Banks; it was the first time of Banks' being here. Mr Pratt stayed after the rest, but goes away to-morrow.

Mr Hamilton is expected here in a day or two. It was at Fonthill t'other day, I believe, that Lord Shelburne first met with Banks; and it was from seeing him with Pratt and Pitt, who were come with him from Kingston Hall (Banks' house,) that he took occasion to invite him here. There he likewise saw Count Cernichef, and had some conversation with him, but did not invite him hither, though, as he says, he ought to have done it. It was rather odd he did not, considering the notice he takes of foreigners in general. The reason he mentioned was the awkwardness of his having his Polish tutor with him. Some little time ago, I had the pleasure of hearing of you from a Mr Brookes. You know, I suppose, that I must be at Oxford before the 17th, and on what account. I have wrote to Poore, as he desired me. How I shall be disposed of in the mean time, I do not exactly know; but my paper is at an end. Pray send me back Wilson's letter.—Yours, &c.

“JEREMY BENTHAM.

“Bowood, October 2d, 1781.

“It was a c——d foolish thing of me to set myself such a task as that of sending you a diary of every thing that passes here; and, now, I do not recollect where I left off. Oh, I think it was on Saturday that I despatched my letter, and I think I told you of Banks' coming in from Fonthill, with Pratt and William Pitt.

“Sunday, September 30.—Came in to dinner a whole heap of Sturts, likewise from Fonthill: Mr and Mrs Sturt, Miss Sturt, a girl of seventeen or eighteen, and Miss Eliza Sturt, about eleven. Banks, it appeared, is intimate in that family. After dinner came in Dunning, piping hot from Bristol.

“Monday, yesterday, 1st October.—A party of us went to Methuen's, at Cosham, about five miles from this place, to see his pictures. It is a famous collection, made by Sir Paul Methuen. The family were not at home: they are at Lord Boston's, who married a daughter of Methuen's; I should have said Methuen's daughter, as he has but one. The party consisted of Lady Shelburne, Lord Camden, Miss Pratt, and Miss F——, in Lord S.'s coach; Pratt, Pitt, Banks, and your humble servant, on horseback. On our return, to my great mortification, we found Mr and Mrs Dunning were set off for London. It was absolutely necessary. Mrs Dunning and her maid were expecting every hour to fall to pieces.

“Tuesday, October 2.—In the morning, before breakfast, Lord Camden and Miss Pratt went off for Herefordshire; Banks and Pitt for Kingston Hall, Banks' house in Dorsetshire; the Sturts to their house, which is four miles from Kingston Hall.

“Wednesday, October 3.—This morning, before breakfast, Pratt went off for Bath, where he is gone to cultivate his belly; so that there is nobody left but Barré and L. Sir E. Bayntun has been breakfasting here. One would think he came here as a spy of the court; for he always comes at breakfast; the time that people are collected together. This is, at least, the sixth time of his breakfasting with us since I have been here.

“I see, by the Dutch papers that are come to-day, that the Dutch despair of saving their Prince William. This will be a great loss to them, as she is one of the most capital ships they have, or can have: a seventy-four.

“Affairs seem to wear a very unfavourable aspect in Minorca. Barré's character of Murray is, that he is obstinate and wrongheaded, but brave to desperation. He has seen a letter from Draper to a person here, who is a government man. Draper says that the effective men in garrison are but 1500 regulars; consisting, upon Barré's computation, of two battalions English; three of Hanoverians: upon paper, 2400. The Spanish account speaks of 400 of the latter deserting. God forbid this should be true! Draper writes that, with infinite perseverance, he has succeeded in putting and keeping himself upon good terms with the general; but that he is the only man in the island who is so, reckoning as well the army as the inhabitants. Barré, who has been in the island, speaks of Fort St Philip as being excessively strong; the garrison covered every where in a surprising manner; that the fault of it, if it has any, is that of being overworked; the souterrains so intricate, that a man must have a better head than the governor to understand them.

“This morning (Wednesday,) I received yours of Saturday, September 29. As to all that concerns my adventures in the family, and the footing I am upon, I must be as concise as possible; there would be no end in giving the details; and, as these are things there is no danger of my forgetting, there is no occasion for it. What I fill my letters with, in preference, are anecdotes concerning persons, places, number, weight, and measure, which, relating to persons I have no personal acquaintance with, and therefore making but a faint impression, might be lost, if they were not quickly consigned to paper; temporary ones more especially, as, for example, the foregoing. The greater part, however, are inevitably lost, either on account of their being but imperfectly heard (for my hearing is, in reality, very dull,) or but imperfectly related; the relaters having their reasons for not being perfectly explicit, or, in short, but imperfectly remembered. A disadvantage I labour under is, the want of power to cross-examine. A thousand considerations intervene to limit the exercise of this power, which, however, I do exercise, at least as much as is agreeable to the deponents; the fear of being troublesome; the fear of galling them, by obliging them either to give an answer, apparently evasive, or to betray any thing which would subject them either to disrepute, or some other inconvenience.

“Suffice it that I tell you, in very general terms, that with Dunning I could have no communication; there was no time for it, except a joke or two, which the devil tempted me to crack upon him, immediately upon his coming in. With Lord Camden I had but little, for reasons I will tell you at large; with Miss Pratt, who is a charming girl in every respect but beauty, pretty much.

She has given me a sketch of Miss F— in crayons, which she was two days about ; it is not ill done, considering, and has some resemblance. With Mrs Sturt, who is a good, fine woman, at the age of forty-two, after bearing eighteen children, fourteen of whom are alive, I had a little flirtation, but left her after seeing a little more of the ton of the family, which I did not like. With Sturt I had some general conversation ; but saw nothing about him that made him very interesting to me. With Barré, although we have few ideas in common, I am upon terms of some familiarity, owing to the good nature and companionableness of the man. Dunning's health seemed not so much amiss, notwithstanding the fatigue he underwent at Bristol ; he had got up a good deal before that happened to throw him back ; and, the morning he went away, he told me he had already recovered himself to a considerable degree. All these are heads for you to examine me upon : as such, I set them down without further particularity.

"As to my health, it is still but so-so ; but I promise myself something from the ease and comfort of Thorpe, and something more from the winter, which seems to agree best with me. For a long time I had no notion of riding out, because my lord did not ask me ; but at last I found out that his reason for not asking people to ride out with him was, that all he rides out for is to superintend his workmen, which takes up all his attention for the time, and is rather sitting on horseback than riding ; since that, I have taken heart of grace, and ride out almost every day, before breakfast, independently of casual excursions in company. As to the Duke of Bedford's being an Opposition-man, I understand as much from Lord Shelburne.

"I desire no reflections upon Miss Mercer ; it is the greatest satisfaction to me imaginable to hear of handsome girls falling in love with ugly fellows. Alas ! poor Clark ! commend me to them and the St Pauls, with whom I please myself with the thoughts of spending a comfortable day or two ere the month is out."

"Bowood, Monday, 17th September, 1781.

"Relation of an overture made by Lord North to the Rockingham party for a coalition, in the summer of 1780, as given by Lord Shelburne to Mr W. Pitt, on Sunday, September 16th, 1781, after dinner—present, Lord Chatham, Mr Pratt, and J. B.

"It was introduced with some little preparation, as if in compliance with a request made on some former occasion. Lord North, meeting his cousin Montague upon the steps of the House of Commons, went up to him and said, he was glad to understand there was a disposition among his friends to coalesce ; that, if that disposition were real, he would authorize him to propose such terms as the court meant on their part to insist upon. That, however indelicate it might sound in his mouth, yet it was necessary he should say, that, at all events, he must be continued where he was : that the case was the same with respect to Lord Sandwich. Or, if it should happen that the king could be prevailed with to give up Lord S., which he could not vouch for, he was sure it could not be done upon any other terms than that of a very honourable provision being made for him. That, in this case, whoever should come into the Admiralty, it must not be Admiral Keppel : that Charles Fox could not be received, at least immediately, into any of the high and confidential offices, such as that of Secretary of State ; but that, as to any lucrative office out of the great line of business, such as that of Treasurer of the Navy, there would perhaps be no objection ; that after the length he had gone, and the offences he had given, it could not be expected that his majesty should be immediately reconciled to the idea of a confidential communication with him ; but that such a place as was suggested might serve him as a place of probation, and that it would give him opportunities of smoothing the way to a more perfect reconciliation.

"Thus far I am perfectly clear, not only as to the facts, but as to the colouring. This being reported to Lord Rockingham, he returned an answer of himself, without consulting with the party ; my recollection is not clear as to the stipulations contained in it, but I think he stood out for Keppel, and insisted that the Duke of Richmond and Charles Fox should be secretaries of state. In all this, it does not appear that any thing was said about Lord Shelburne. Upon Lord Rockingham's communicating the offer and the answer to the Duke of Richmond, the duke blamed him for including him in such a proposition ; whether as meaning that he would not serve the king on any terms, or not on those terms, I did not understand. The duke intimated, at the same time, that there 'were other persons' (meaning, as I understood, Lord Shelburne himself,) with whom, considering such and such things, it would have been but decent to consult. It seemed to me that the information of this negotiation had come to Lord S., first from the Duke of Richmond ; though it seems as if the matter had afterwards been the subject of discussion between the former and Lord Rockingham. The interpretation put upon Lord R.'s answer, whatever it was, is a matter of contestation between him and Lord S. Lord R. calls it an absolute rejection of the offer, and a virtual refusal to treat : Lord S. considers it as an acceptance of the treaty, and thereby as a sort of treachery, or, according to the footing they were then upon together, at least a violation of amity towards himself. Pitt or Pratt asking Lord S. what it was that in all this business Lord R. was expecting for himself, the answer was, Nothing that he ever heard of ; clearly nothing, unless, perhaps, it might be that he had Ireland in view, on account of the advantage it might give him in thwarting the Absentee Tax ; but this was not pretended to be any thing but surmise. Was not this very creditable to Lord R. ? From what I have heard of him, since I have been here, I am disposed to entertain a good opinion of him : I have heard a good deal against him in the way of general disapprobation ; but as to any grounds for it, I have heard of none, but what appeared to me to be either inconsistent, negatory, or unintelligible. Being asked what was to have been done for Burke, he answered that he was not clear; that certainly he was not to have been neglected, but that there was something of an inferior negotiation, in which he was more particularly concerned. The terms were so ambiguous, that I could not distinguish who were the parties, with whom he was meant to be represented as having been negotiating; whether the ministry, or the people of his own party; or even so much as whether he was himself a party to this under or interior negotiation, in which, in point of interest, he was represented as being concerned. There is a prodigious deal of ambiguity in the general tenor of Lord S.'s language on party subjects; whether genuine or affected I cannot be certain: I rather believe it genuine; because I find it the same on subjects in which party has nothing to do. As to the negotiation above mentioned, it is scarcely necessary to add that the demands on Lord Rockingham's side being such, no reply was given.

"In Burke's pamphlet on the affairs of Ireland, at least in one of his late pamphlets, if I do not mistake, he tells us that Lord Rockingham had not apprized anybody of his determination to apply for the audience he had about Ireland with the king. Lord S.'s account of that matter is, that about one o'clock on that day, Lord R. came to him, to take his advice about it, mentioned his determination to demand the audience, but that he wished for Lord S.'s advice about what he should say; and to know, in general, whether he approved or disapproved of it. Lord S. observed to him, that it was too short a warning by much, for taking a step of so much importance; for, considering what it was then o'clock, they should not have more than half-an-hour to deliberate upon it. I am not certain whether it was not that Lord R. wished Lord Shelburne to go with him; which ever was the case, he confessed to us that, from reasons regarding his own reputation, he declined taking a part either way, on a sudden. Considering the importance that it might appear to be of to the nation, that the king should hear what information Lord R. had to give him, he, Lord S., did not care to have it said that he had put his negative upon it; and, on the other hand, there might, for aught he could satisfy himself about on a sudden, be other reasons, which he did not state, especially why it might not be advisable to him to be known to have concurred in it."

"Bowood, October 7, 1817.

"Yours of the 29th September, I think, I acknowledged in my last, which I believe was dated Wednesday, the third instant; since then, nothing very particular has occurred in this place. That same day, I think it was, came Hamilton (of Payne's Hill) and his wife, from Bath. Lord Shelburne sent his carriage for them, and sent them back yesterday. Hamilton has been giving his assistance in laying out the grounds here. He is an old man of seventy-five or seventy-six, and is, besides, very much afflicted, at times with the stone, but this time he was very cheerful and alert. There came, at the same time, a Mr Tonge or Tongue, who has no connexion with them, but, as it happened, came and went on the same day with them: an insipid, insignificant man, who lives at Bristol. I could perceive no other bond of connexion than the circumstance of his once having rented a house about a mile from Lord Shelburne's, which his lordship has just pulled down.

"On Thursday, came General Johnson, a neighbour of Lord Shelburne's: he is equerry to the king, and has been in waiting. He is an old man; is deaf at times; and has got the nickname (so I learned by accident) of 'Old Sulky;' he travels in a leathern conveniency of the same name. The account he gives of Governor Murray, quadrates very exactly with that which Barré was giving, and, being a government man, may the better be depended upon. He has a son there, to whom, he acknowledges, Murray has been very kind; so that there does not appear to be any thing of passion to corrupt his judgment.

"Since my last, I have received a letter from Q. S. P.,* at Bath, in which (blessed be God therefore) he tells me there will be no occasion for me to go to Oxford; for that C. Abbot has no competitor, and looks upon himself as sure. I had asked him about the price of woollen cloth, which, I had heard from Barré, was as cheap there as broad cloth in London, viz., 18s. Q. S. P., upon inquiry, confirmed that idea; and, in the overflowings of his affection, offered me a coat of it as a Bath present: so away go I on cock-horse to-morrow morning, to be measured for it. I shall return in the afternoon.

"A day or two ago I received a letter from Sam,† dated Catherineburgh, and Nigriaghill; the bad news it contains is—that he has lost a portable barometer, and gold to the value of £13 or £14, by the breaking of a phial of quicksilver by the overturning of a trunk. The good news—that the model of his plane-engine is finished, and succeeds to the satisfaction of everybody; the engine itself would have been finished, but for a vacation of six weeks, which the workmen have on account of the harvest; the time for which, in that country, being very short, requires as many hands as can be mustered. I wait only for Parson Townsend, to quit this place. I cannot think what has become of the man; he leaves me in an awkward predicament. He was to have been here on Wednesday. There is now nobody but Miss F— and Colonel Barré. Adieu. I send you a frank for Davies."

CRAMBAMBULI FOR NEW YEAR'S DAY, 1841.

BY A BURSCH OF THE UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

OLD year, good by ! with bumpers glowing,
Around thy couch of death we stand !
Thy coming once, as now thy going,
We chanted, joining hand in hand !
In draughts of punch we welcomed thee,
And, pledging, sang Crambambuli !
Crambimbambuli, &c.

Faithfully through thy short life by thee,
 Warm-hearted Burschen, firm we stood ;
 Nor in thy hour of death wilt fly thee
 Although thou wert not over good.
 But still thou gav'st some moments bright,
 For which here's thanks in punch to-night !
 True Crambimbambuli, &c.

Sometimes our hearts did nearly fail us,
 You let such jilts upon them seize !
 Sometimes an empty purse did quail us,
 No cash to pay for our degrees !
 But now 'tis over, we'll forget,
 Nor for such fleeting sorrows fret !
 But drink Crambambuli, &c.

Freely we grant thou hast had troubles
To bother thee abroad, at home !
British flare-ups and Yankee bubbles,
The Kirk too in a froth and foam !
And monarchs at their ancient tricks,—
Egyptians blowing up like bricks !
Without Crambambuli, &c.

But go ! for here comes thy successor !
 Shout out, ye Burschen ! shout out, Hail !
 For our Princess, new born (God bless her !),
 Of candle see he brings a pail !
 But ammunition for the kings,
 And grog for us he also brings !
 The true Crambambuli, &c.

New year, come on ! we gladly hail thee,
Our glasses lifted up on high;
Nor shall our cheers a moment fail thee
If with good luck our fates you ply :
Be good to us, and we will be
As kind, as fond, as true to thee !
With Cramblimbambuli, &c.

Bring out life's bowl to brew the measure,
New Year ! which thou for us hast planned :
Pour in the spirit strong of pleasure,
With wisdom's water make it bland,—
Love's lemon with joy's sugar link,
The punch is made—we drink ! we drink !
This grand Crambambuli, &c.

Here's to the Queen, may joy attend her !
 May Heaven her counsels sagely guide !
 Here's the Princess, may God befriend her !
 And rear her up her country's pride !
 Here's to the girls, heart-stealing elves !
 Here's Alma Mater and Ourselves !
 And our Crambambuli, &c.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF LUDWIG VAN BEETHOVEN.

FROM RECENT SOURCES.

MORE than thirteen years have now passed since the death of the great composer Beethoven ; and until lately, beyond a few scanty notices, no attempt had been made to preserve a record of his remarkable existence. The memorials of men of genius are among the most precious of their legacies to the world : they give an additional value to the works by which they have become known ; and in some cases furnish an interpretation, without which portions of these must ever remain enigmatical and obscure. This appears to have been, in no small degree, the case with Beethoven ; in whom many other circumstances were united to attach a strong interest to the personal history of his career. He was the immediate successor and rival of the two great composers who had raised instrumental music in Germany to a point which it was thought could not be overstepped. While their fame was yet in its zenith, he had compelled their admirers to acknowledge in him the presence of another, and some thought, a greater power than theirs. Whether his boldness was admired or condemned, it was impossible to regard it with indifference ; and as he continued to pour forth work after work, each surpassing its predecessor in grandeur and originality, those who had disputed his pretensions became silent, or were no longer heard amidst the general acclamation. Before his career was closed, Vienna had learned to boast of him as the third glory of an era already illustrated by the names of Haydn and Mozart.

To the interest belonging to an achievement like this are added others, hardly less active, of a personal nature: the affliction (of all that can befall a musician, the hardest to endure) which was known to have vexed his latter years; the solitary manner of his life; the exaggerated rumours which got abroad of the gloomy energy of his character, and the eccentricity of his habits; and the hardships of poverty which were reported to have aggravated the burden of his last illness, and to have hastened his untimely death;—all these naturally sharpened the curiosity which always follows the history of those who have become eminent in word or deed. For some time there was reason to fear that this curiosity would be wholly disappointed; or satisfied in part only, with such scattered notices as could be given by those who, like Seyfried and Ries, had come but temporarily in contact with him. He was never married; lived from his early youth at a distance from his birth-place; had few intimates at Vienna; and appeared to have left little beyond his imperishable compositions, to preserve his memory after death. There was, indeed, one person from whom a biography of Beethoven might have been expected,

This was his townsman and friend, Stephen von Breuning, who had, like him, removed to Vienna, and had continued there, throughout life, the intimacy of earlier years; and, surviving him, was named his executor. He was a man of good talents, a member of a learned profession, (Hofrath,) an amateur musician of considerable skill, and had proved himself the warm friend and judicious counsellor of the great composer on many trying occasions. From him, therefore, a satisfactory biography might have proceeded; but this hope was unfortunately defeated, as Von Breuning survived his friend only two months.

Rochlitz, the editor of the Leipzig Musical Journal, it is said, was then solicited to undertake the task, and was offered the use of the papers left in the executor's hands; but declined it on the ground of ill health, which compelled him to abstain from all new labours of composition at the period in question.

We have alluded to the casual notices which have been published on the subject of Beethoven. The most important of these appeared at Coblenz in 1838, from the joint contributions of Dr Wegeker, and Ferdinand Ries the favourite and most distinguished pupil of the composer. Dr Wegeker, rector of the university at Bonn, and the husband of Von Breuning's sister, had been the companion of Beethoven's early years, and remained afterwards in friendly correspondence with him; and the records he has collected, although scanty, have the merit of being cordial and authentic. To these were added the reminiscences of Ries, referring principally, of course, to the period of his own tuition at Vienna. They are fragmentary, and chiefly occupied with the subjects in which his private interests were engaged; but appear, on the whole, to be faithful and friendly, with as much insight as can be expected from the observation of a mere youth, such as Ries was at this period. He is accused by Beethoven's professed biographer, Schindler, (whom we shall presently have to mention,) of exhibiting his master in an unfavourable light; but the anecdotes which he relates, although some of them portray singularities of character certainly to be lamented, do not want general confirmation from the very statements which Schindler himself has published.

These, with the exception of some foolish and false articles in biographical and musical dictionaries, and the fragmentary essays, of little authentic value, added by the Ritter von Seyfried to an edition of Beethoven's Studies, were all that had appeared on the subject, until lately, when a complete Biography was announced from the pen of Anton Schindler, a professor of music, who had been a pupil and companion of Beethoven's during the latter years of his life. This circumstance gave him many advantages; and in the interval which had passed since the death of the composer, there had been sufficient opportunity to collect whatever could be gathered from other quarters to complete the work; while the lateness of its appearance seemed to remove many obstacles to the full declaration of circumstances in which other persons, now also departed from the scene, had been concerned. In his preface, the author professes to have availed himself of all these favouring circumstances; but it must be confessed that the result attained is far from satisfactory. The narrative is hasty and meagre, leaving intervals in the most important stages of the composer's career almost wholly blank; there is a want of plain speaking in the account of his dealings with others, and of the treatment which he met with at their hands, which it is difficult to excuse; and of those personal details, so precious in the biographies of eminent men, the notice is scanty and colourless. That the biographer was unable to comprehend the outlines of so colossal a subject, is not certainly a matter of censure, however it may be to be lamented; but we cannot forgive the want of diligence, or observation, which has left but few records of the daily life and conversation, the fragments of which are so interesting. How often, on such occasions, must the reader regret the want of an observer at once curious, minute, and affectionate, like our own Boswell,—than whom no contributor to the store of really living knowledge and insight has been less justly appreciated.

Yet amidst all the disadvantages of these imperfect and feeble surveys, it is impossible to mistake the presence of a figure more vast and imposing than is often presented to the eye of the observer; or to overlook the fact, that there are here "etiam disiecta membra poetæ." Through the obscurity and distance of the picture, an appearance, austere, melancholy, and commanding, rises, like the vision of a second Prometheus, stricken with lightning from above, and fettered to the unyielding rock, but still invincible in hope and endurance, and irradiated with the light gathered from heaven, and imparted by his hands to the sons of mankind!

It is the purpose of the present essay to offer, from the sources above indicated, a sketch of the career of this extraordinary man; and, as the works in question (although a translation of Schindler's Biography has lately been announced) are not generally known to English readers, the attempt will perhaps be received with indulgence. We cannot suppose that any apology is needed for the subject. In the case of an ordinary musician, indeed, it might appear unlikely to interest any but professional readers; but Beethoven's name belongs to that select company of masters, whose stature raises them above the limits whereby the mere technicalities of the various arts are distinguished; and exhibits them as the chosen of the earth, to the general reverence of mankind. It is known in all lands to which the knowledge of civilisation has penetrated; and is already recorded, αρχαία ἔστιν αὖτις, in the same register which bears the name of a Shakspeare, a Leibnitz, or a Michel Angelo. These are the lights of our species; their actions and lives are significant and instructive to all, whatsoever may have been the particular form in which the genius bestowed upon them was manifested.

We shall not here attempt to introduce any critical description of Beethoven's musical compositions. It is sufficient for our purpose that they have, by universal consent, taken their place amongst the masterpieces of the art : the only question respecting them being, whether they are, or are not, of their several kinds, absolutely the most perfect and genial compositions hitherto produced. This is a question which will always remain open to dispute, so long as one star differs from another in brightness, but does not affect their place in the firmament of the highest art, which is, in the meanwhile, illustrious and unchangeable. Nor is it a matter of regret to us that any technical dissertation is here unnecessary. Of all hopeless endeavours there is none more fruitless than the attempt to suggest, by words, an idea of the peculiar characteristics of the musician's excellence,—none which is more liable to degenerate into mere rhapsody, or to lose itself amidst the dry bones of a pedantic display. For those who have heard and felt the great works of this master—quis enim non novit Alcin?—the attempt would be superfluous ; and to such as have yet to know them (if they have ears to hear, and minds to understand,) we would only say, "Go and learn for yourselves." The spirit which animates the creations of the musical artist cannot, by any process of conjuration, be drawn into the circle traced by the pen of the writer.

Were it permitted, in the partial view which is all that this life exhibits of human destiny, to question the mysterious decisions of Providence, the history before us might seem especially fitted to suggest matter of wonder and despondency. A believer in the old faith of astrology must have decided that some evil star was in the ascendant at the birth of Beethoven. With strong affections, generous and elevated feelings, modest and temperate in his wishes, and singularly blameless and pure in all moral relations, he was, nevertheless, throughout life in no respect to be called fortunate, save only in the abundant and rare gift of his singular genius, which, assuredly, must have been a compensation for many afflictions. But even this, during the latter half of his life, was embittered to him by the deafness which gradually excluded him from all social enjoyment, and at last made him unable to feel, except in imagination, the effect of his own sublime compositions, many of which he never heard executed. His childhood was saddened by the strictness of a dissipated and selfish father ; his youth was a period of hard labour and many disappointments ; in manhood he was beset by the sordid and unfeeling interference of his two selfish brothers, who plundered his moderate earnings, and estranged him from his friends. His adopted child, the orphan son of one of these brothers, repaid sacrifices, and a generous kindness almost more than paternal, by shameful misconduct and ingratitude. The fruits of his genius, which delighted the world and enriched others, afforded him little beyond a scanty maintenance ; and the infirmity which impaired, and at last destroyed his hearing, attended him to the grave—a melancholy and insulated being, after a long torment of twenty years, during which he was condemned to chafe, like a lion in a cage, with the consciousness of powers to surpass all that he had yet accomplished, and the feeling that his fatal misfortune rendered their thorough exercise impossible. His eyes were closed by a stranger's hand ; and it was reserved for a society of English musicians to minister to the last necessities of the dying composer whom Germany now numbers amongst her greatest men. When to this it is added, that amidst such accumulated distresses his courage never sank, and his genius continued to the latest moment as clear and energetic as in his better days ; that he never was tempted to degrade his art for purposes of gain, but strove to the last with unflinching enthusiasm to realize the ideal of beauty and poetical truth, which he disinterestedly worshipped for their own sakes, and loved, as the one cherished light of his troubled life,—we have surely here the elements of a story no less dignified and tragical than any which has been told in our times. And if we learn that, amidst so much endurance and strenuous endeavour there were asperities and sallies of temper which those around him were made to feel, it is rather a matter of wonder that, in this respect only did he appear to yield to the many buffetings which his evil fortune had doomed him to bear. We shall, therefore, proceed to trace the outline of his career with the consideration and sympathy due to one who gave so much to the world, and who received from it, in return, little beyond its afflictions—a bare existence, and a solitary grave !

How it fares with the history of older worthies, we may judge by the readiness with which fables are invented and scattered abroad, even when the subject belongs to our own times. M. M. Fayette and Choron declare, (and other musical and biographical dictionaries have repeated after them,) that Beethoven was a natural son of Frederick William the Second—a monarch who never saw Bonn until long after the mother had given birth to this child, having herself never left the town for a day during the whole of her married life. A Dutchman, of the name of Marsdyk, claims him as a countryman, on the strength of an absurd tale of his birth having happened at Zutphen, in an inn frequented by wayfaring musicians, to which class the story presumes his parents to have belonged. In truth, however, Ludwig van Beethoven (whose family, as the name implies, came originally from Holland, although for three generations settled on the Rhine) was born at Bonn, on the 17th December, 1770. His father and grandfather were both musicians, and in the service of the Electors of Cologne : the latter as a bass-singer and conductor, and the father, Johann van Beethoven, tenorist in the Prince's chapel. His mother is described as "a gentle and pious being ;" and he was wont to speak affectionately of "the patience with which she treated his stubbornness." The grandfather was a composer of some skill, and highly reputable in conduct : "a little vigorous man, with amazingly bright eyes ;" and although he died three years after Ludwig's birth, he was always remembered kindly by Beethoven. Not so the father, Johann van Beethoven, who was dissolute in his habits, and treated his son with great harshness,—compelling him to labour unremittingly at the piano-forte ; not, as it appears, from any regard for the child's talent, but in order that he might soon become able, by his earnings, to contribute to the support of the household, impoverished by the father's loose and idle life. Ludwig had two brothers, both younger than himself—Carl and Johann, of whom mention will be made hereafter.

Such education as a free school in those days afforded, "reading, writing, and some little Latin," was granted to the child for a short time only—for his cares were destined to begin early ; and, as music offered the only prospect of a maintenance, he was allowed to study little else. We find him, at a very early age, already giving musical lessons in the house of the Von Breuning's—a circumstance to which all the happiness he enjoyed, while he resided at home, was owing. Hither he fled from the miseries and severity of his own dwelling ; the family, which was cultivated and highly respectable, became attached to the boy ; his pupils grew into companions, and the mother, a widow, treated him like a parent, and alternately encouraged and controlled him, as the waywardness of his temper exhibited itself in despondency or recklessness.

We find many traces of this motherly kindness, which must have been invaluable to the neglected boy. Wegeler tells us—

That he had, from his earliest years, an excessive repugnance to giving lessons in music. Madame von Breuning would sometimes urge him to go to the house of the Austrian Emissary, Count von Westphal, and continue his lessons there. Thus counselled and observed, he would set out "ut iugiter mentis assellus," but many a time turned away at the very door, and running back to her, would promise to give a double lesson on the following day, protesting that now he could not bring himself to it. Nothing but care for his mother would have induced him to go on teaching—certainly not his own indigent condition.

The notices of his boyhood are scanty ; but traits like the preceding, and others scattered here and there, indicate an early development of the character which belonged to him through life. The interest he excited in others, and the control exercised by his few friends, prove how soon he began to display a genius which attracted, and a waywardness which required their care. It is hard to say how much of the latter was due to the wretchedness of his home : We are inclined to believe, that the inequalities of disposition which beget, in after life, a resistance to social constraint, and provoke the hostility of the orderly and commonplace, are, in most cases, the fruit of some misfortune in the early history of the subject, and spring from a source of bitterness in childhood.

In music, at all events, Ludwig made rapid progress. His first instructor, indeed the only one from whom he can be said to have learned any thing on the piano-forte, was an ingenious man of the name of Pfeiffer. The organ he was taught to manage by Van der Eder, the court organist ; and the elder Ries, a musician of great excellence, the father of Ferdinand Ries, who became afterwards Beethoven's most distinguished pupil, gave him instruction on the violin, an instrument on which, however, he never was very proficient. At a later period of his career, at Vienna, he learned composition under the celebrated Albrechtsberger, after having frequented, without any benefit, the tuition of Haydn. Whatever else he may have acquired by observation and self-discipline, the above appear to be the only names which can be properly cited as his teachers ; and with none of these were his studies of long duration.

Through the influence of his excellent friends, the Von Breunings, (to whom, indeed, he owed the most of his early culture in every respect,) he obtained the assistance of Count von Waldstein, a liberal patron of the arts ; by whose means we find him in 1785—when barely fifteen years of age—nominated, by the Elector Max Franz,* as supernumerary organist in his chapel—an office honourable for so young a musician, but affording only a scanty emolument. The Count von Waldstein was, indeed, his kindest, as well as his earliest patron. To him he owed the means of support while advancing in his profession, and subsequently his removal, from the narrow cares of his father's house, to Vienna. Perhaps, without this early and appreciating help, the genius of the youth, deprived of access to higher models of his art, and bowed down by ignorant drudgery, might have wasted itself in the obscurity of his native town, and given no audible sign.

In this new situation, the youth took early occasion to display his talent, although in a manner sufficiently whimsical and characteristic :—

It is usual, in Catholic choirs, to sing, during Passion-week, the Lamentations of Jeremiah. These consist, as every one knows, of short passages of four to six lines, which it was customary to chant in a kind of plain song, yet with a certain observance of rhythm. The chant consisted of four successive notes, on one of which the singer was to pause, while the accompanist (the organ being disused during Passion-week) executed a passage or voluntary on the harpsichord. This service falling one day to Beethoven, he asked the singer Heller, who prided himself greatly on his science, if he might try to put him out ! which he undertook so to do, that the singer should neither be able to detect him, nor to recover himself when once led astray. The challenge was accepted ; and at a suitable place, by a cunning deviation from the proper key, still continuing to strike the true key-note, he completely puzzled the singer ; who, after in vain trying to recover the key, was forced at last to come to a full stop, amidst the mirth of the bystanders in the choir. Heller was greatly incensed, and made a formal complaint to the elector ; who reproved his young organist with good humour, and forbade him to execute any more strokes of genius of this kind.

We see that already, in this wilful eccentric fashion, the genius was beginning to make itself apparent.

He also began to compose ; but his notions both of the theory and practice of the art were naturally confined. Some variations, which he had written on a theme of Righini's, gave rise to a remarkable instance of his rapid apprehension.

He had as yet heard no eminent piano-forte player ; he had no idea of refined expression in the use of his instrument—his style was rough and harsh. An excursion with the orchestra of the elector to Archaffenberg, gave him an opportunity of hearing Sterkel, a celebrated performer of the time. His style was very fluent and delicate, and, as Father Ries described it, a little womanish. Beethoven stood at his side, listening with the keenest attention. Beethoven was then asked to play, which he declined, until Sterkel intimated some doubt whether the composer of the variations above-named could himself execute them readily. Hereupon Beethoven sat down, and played not only these (as far as he could remember them, Sterkel having mislaid his copy,) but added a number of others, fully as difficult; and, what amazed the bystanders, exactly in the same agreeable manner which he had just heard from Sterkel for the first time. This was a remarkable proof of his facility in acquiring new impressions.

He was still residing at Bonn when his mother died, in 1787; thus breaking the only tie which made home dear to him. At this period the pressure of extreme poverty was added to his distress; and he was thankful to receive, and never afterwards forgot the kind assistance of Father Ries, who helped him to bear the expenses of his mother's burial. When Ferdinand Ries was sent to him at Vienna, thirteen years afterwards,—

He was much busied with the completion of his Oratorio, The Mount of Olives, which was on the point of being brought out for his benefit in a grand concert. He read the letter of introduction, and said, "At this moment I cannot answer your father, but write you to him, and say that I have not forgotten how it was when my mother died: that will content him."

The care he bestowed on his friend's son, hateful as the task of instruction was to him, proved how warmly this service was remembered. He was wont to revert to his years at Bonn as the happiest period of his existence, poor and laborious as they were, and troubled by the dissipation and rough usage of his father. A melancholy life, truly, in which these were the most tranquil moments!

If not for his own happiness, however, it was at least fortunate for the world, that he was enabled, in 1786 and 1787, to visit Vienna, then the focus of all that was most excellent in German art; and, afterwards, in 1792, obtained from the elector leave of absence, and a small pension, for a permanent study of some years there, under Haydn. Mozart had died the year previously, but in 1786 he had already prophesied, on hearing Beethoven improvise on a theme before him, "This is a youth who will make the world hear of him before long."

At no time was the general tone of musical cultivation, in Vienna, higher or more enthusiastic; and the youth had barely cast an eye on the manifold riches of art which it offered on all hands, when "he vowed to himself, 'Here will I abide, nor again return to Bonn, even were the elector to withdraw his support, and leave me penniless!'"

From this period the progress of the young musician, from the condition of a student to the full development of his powers, and to entire self-dependence as a great and original artist, was rapid and decided. The immediate object of his removal to Vienna, which was to benefit by the instructions of Haydn, appears, however, to have failed, according to Schindler's account.

Beethoven came to Vienna wholly ignorant of the science of counterpoint, and knowing but little even of thorough-bass. With an active imagination, a quick ear, and a Pegasus ever willing, he wrote on cour-ageously, caring little for grammatical rules. In this state he began to study with Haydn; the old master seemed to be always satisfied with his pupil, and let him do just as he liked, but the scholar was far from being equally well satisfied with his teacher; and thus it fell out.

There was an old composer named Schenck, a friend of Beethoven's, a modest man and a profound musician. One day meeting Beethoven as he came with his bundle of music from Haydn's lessons, he cast his eye over the exercises, and detected many faults which Haydn had suffered to pass unnoticed, although he had professed to correct the composition. This led to more examination, and to the discovery of similar oversights in all his former exercises; which aroused the suspicion of the pupil. In fact, it is difficult to account, in a satisfactory manner, for this neglect on Haydn's part. The lessons were soon after interrupted by Haydn's journey to England; nor were they resumed on his return. Beethoven was wont to say that he had learned nothing from him.

After this he studied composition under the celebrated Albrechtsberger, and soon acquired enough of the science to need no further assistance. It was, perhaps, a fortunate circumstance that he was not early subjected to rigorous scientific training; and he appears to have at all times maintained a certain independence of strict technical rules, which, in one of less original genius, might have been fatal, but was with him only a means to the production of new and daring beauties, and graces "beyond the reach of art." It is amusing to note the grand Titanic fashion in which, at a later period, he asserted this royal privilege over the elements of harmony. Ferdinand Ries, when walking with him one day,—

Spoke of two consecutive fifths, in his violin quartett in C minor, which have a striking and beautiful effect. Beethoven did not seem to have been aware of these, and maintained that they were not in the score. As he always had music paper with him, I asked for a sheet, and wrote out the passage with all the four parts. As soon as he saw that I was right, he said, "Well! and who then has forbidden the use of them?" As I hardly knew in what manner to answer such a question, he repeated it once or twice; until at last I replied, in great astonishment, "Why, they are prohibited by one of the first elementary rules!" Again he repeated the question—and when I cited "Marpurg, Kirnberger, Fuchs, all the theorists!"—his answer was, "Then I allow them!" Yo el Rey!

In Vienna the young artist found himself transported, as it were, into a new world. On every side his attention was engaged, and his ambition excited by the masterpieces of great composers; and the society to which his distinguished talent soon introduced him, encouraged him to exercise, in every way, the powers of which he was now fully conscious. Amongst those whose notice urged him onwards, the most distinguished of his patrons was the celebrated Prince Lichnowsky, Mozart's pupil; in whose house he became domesticated, and who fully appreciated, and fostered with a truly noble liberality, his opening talents. From him Beethoven received a pension sufficient for his support, which was to be continued until he should obtain some settled appointment. And this opportune assistance, and the social advantages afforded him by the kindness of the prince and his consort, could not fail to produce the happiest effects in the development of his character and genius. During the first ten or twelve years of his residence in Vienna, it was in this house that all Beethoven's compositions were first performed; the celebrated quartett party,* for which most of his inimitable works of this class were written (which was afterwards known by the name of the Rasumowsky quartett, and, under his direction, established a new era in the school of instrumental performance,) was, during this period, in the service of the prince; and his associates were such as combined with thorough practical knowledge of the art, that refined feeling of its highest beauties which alone can raise it from a mere mechanical display, to the sphere of an intellectual pursuit. The influence of such advantages on a mind like Beethoven's, ardent, imaginative, and full of the purest spirit of poetry, may be conceived;—and their fruits appeared in the compositions which he produced in almost breathless succession, each surpassing the other in novelty and original beauties. His name soon became known as a composer throughout Germany; and, although the boldness of his invention, and the striking flights of imagination which distinguished his works were, at first, to many a theme of wonder and reproach,—the lovers of the art (even those who worshipped most tenaciously the established models) began to discover that another genius had appeared, which promised to equal, if not to eclipse, its greatest predecessors.

Still, amidst the elegance and refinement of the circles in which he now moved, with the applause and admiration that were willingly paid to his admitted talents, he was unable to subdue the robust independence of his nature, or to adapt himself to the graceful conventions which regulate polished society. An impatience of restraint, and the preoccupation of a mind wholly absorbed in his art, disqualified him for the study of its observances; and the vehemence that characterized his genius, was displayed no less in his speech and temper, than in the haughty assertion of a rank which he claimed in right of his spiritual nobility. A temperament of this force and ruggedness could not fail to jar with the elements of courtly life; and there were not wanting many, envious of his rapid distinction, who were ready to aggravate the confusion thus created. The appearance of a being like Beethoven in such scenes, suggests the image of a sinewy Hercules surrounded by the silken inmates of Omphale's palace; disturbing, by his abrupt motions, the harmony of the train, and half in impatience, and half carelessly, hurting the hands that cover his uncouthness with the decorations of the court. The contrast of elements so dissimilar naturally became more prominent, as increasing strength increased his self-reliance; and it gave rise to social embarrassments, which tended to estrange him from many of his admirers, and increased his natural longing for solitude, and impatience of the control of a crowd. That, under such circumstances, the gainful exercise of his profession by no means kept pace with his reputation, will readily be imagined: he remained poor, with little prospect beyond a precarious subsistence, in a position which, to others more worldly wise, would have produced a settled competence.

To these causes of restlessness and discontent were added others, the source of which lay far deeper. With a heart gushing with tenderness underneath its rugged covering, and all its sensibilities preserved by an exceeding purity of life, Beethoven, the object of attention in many brilliant circles, could not fail to be continually in love, and “mostly with noble and otherwise distinguished ladies.” That such attachments could not be happy, we need hardly say; and, although they tended, by estranging him still more thoroughly from any thing low or worthless, to foster the natural aspirations of his mind for the ideally elevated and beautiful, still they perpetually troubled his repose by tempting visions and longings for happiness, which could never be reached. Many of these fair tormentors have been named in the original editions of his works: not a few of the dedications record his devotion to the idol of the day. The Countess Maria von Erdödy is known to have been far from insensible to the passion she excited; and a still deeper and longer attachment existed between the composer and a Countess Giulietta di Guicciardi, the person to whom, apparently, some very fond and melancholy letters, preserved by Schindler, were addressed. At a later period, it appears that, for once, he was enamoured of a young lady in his own rank: the dislike with which he was known to have long regarded the composer Hummel, being, in part, ascribed to the fact, “that both, at one time, were in love with the same maiden; but Hummel was, and continued to be, the favoured one, as he had an appointment, and had not, moreover, the misfortune of being hard of hearing.” We cannot imagine that the greater composer lost much by the neglect of one who could thus be decided; but it is to be deeply regretted that, from one cause or another, he was condemned to be forever a stranger to the household love and care of a wife. To the want of such a kind and watchful influence, many of his later eccentricities, and all the blank desolation of the concluding portion of his life, may certainly be ascribed.

But there was yet another and more fatal enemy to his peace and success as an artist, which was not slow in making its appearance. So early as 1800, at the age of thirty, we find him confiding to his friend Wegeler the approach of a calamity, which he carefully concealed from others, and would fain have hidden from himself. After describing the prospects of employment and distinction in his profession, which then seemed to be opening before him, he writes:—“Yet that envious demon, ill health, has thrown a terrible check in my way: my hearing, to-wit, for the last three years, has been continually growing worse;”—and he goes on to describe the means he had already taken in the hopes of relief, but in vain. It was even then so bad, that

In the theatre I am forced to lean over the orchestra, in order to hear the actors speak. The higher notes of instruments and voices escape me at a short distance : in conversation it is marvellous that no one has yet observed it : perhaps as I am apt to be absent, they account for it in this way. Often I can only distinguish the general sound, but not the words, of one who speaks low ; and yet when people shout, I cannot endure it. What is now to become of me, Heaven only knows ! I have already been often tempted to curse the day when I was born ; but have learned from Plutarch* to practise resignation. If no better may be, I will defy my ill fortune ; and yet many moments will come, in which I shall be the most miserable of God's creatures. I pray you not to breathe a syllable of this affliction of mine to any one, not even to your wife ! Resignation ! a wretched resource, but the only one that is left me !

It will readily be considered why he thus jealously attempted to conceal an infirmity, of all others the most calamitous to a musician. This was one of the main reasons which made him withdraw from general society ; and explains much that, at the time, was supposed to proceed from caprice and ill-humour only. In a paper written by him in 1802, during a serious illness, when he believed himself to be dying, and addressed to his two brothers, this is dwelt upon in a manner profoundly touching :—

My heart and soul were, from infancy, prone to kindly feelings ; and my ambition was ever to accomplish what was great and good. But reflect that, for the last six years, an unfortunate ailment has fallen upon me ; and, after hopes have been successively raised and defeated, I have been forced to contemplate the certainty of an abiding infirmity. Born with an ardent, lively disposition—susceptible of social enjoyments, I was condemned, thus early, to part from them, and wear out my life in solitude. If, now and then, I attempted to break through the prohibition, how bitterly was I then repulsed by the doubly-painful evidence of my dull hearing ; and yet I could not bring myself to say to others—"Speak louder ; shout, for I am deaf !" Alas ! how could I declare the feebleness of a sense which I ought to possess even in greater perfection than other men ! I could not do it. Forgive me, then, if you see me often retire, when I would fain be amongst you. My calamity is doubly severe, because it condemns me to be misjudged. The delight of society, cultivated conversation, reciprocal confidences, are forbidden to me. I must appear in society almost absolutely insulated, and only when it is quite indispensable. I must live 'an exile. When I approach a circle, a burning anxiety comes over me, lest I should run the risk of discovering my condition. It was thus during the past half-year which I passed in the country. What was my humiliation when the person at my side listened to a flute in the distance, or to the song of a peasant, and I could hear neither ! Such occurrences brought me nearly to desperation : a little more, and I had ended my life by my own hand. This only—this art which I love—restrained me. It seemed as though I could not leave the world before I had produced all that I felt I was able to bring forth. Almighty Power ! thou lookest into my inmost heart ; thou knowest that love of my fellows, and the desire to do good, dwell there ! You, my brother men, who shall one day read this, know that you have thought wrongly of me ; and that, wretched as I am, it comforts me to feel that I have yielded to none in doing—in spite of every natural impediment—all that lay in my power to place myself in the list of worthy artists and good men !"

* Seyfried asserts that Beethoven was a thorough master of the Latin, French, and Italian languages. This appears to have been mistaken as to Latin ; but there is no doubt of the eagerness with which he cultivated an acquaintance with the best authors in all languages, either directly or through translations. "He dearly loved the Greek and Latin classics, which he read in good translations ; many of the former he knew as thoroughly as his own scores : the same with Shakspeare. Any companion who was not pretty familiar with these favourite authors, soon became wearisome to him."—Schindler. It will not surprise any one who is conversant with the poetry and imagination displayed in Beethoven's works, to learn that his chosen authors were among those of the highest class of intellects, like his own. His leisure was divided between these and composition,

To a picture so graphic and affecting, nothing can be added by the biographer. We learn from Ries, that this care was so far successful, that he was not aware of the infirmity until after he had been for some months under Beethoven's tuition.

It was in one of our walks in the country that he gave me the first striking proof of his want of hearing—which had previously been named to me by Stephen von Breuning. I called his attention to a shepherd, who was playing in the wood, in a very graceful manner, on a rude flute made of the elder tree. Beethoven could not hear a note for more than half an hour ; and although, at last, I assured him repeatedly that I had ceased to distinguish the sound (which was the fact,) he became extraordinarily silent and gloomy.

From this period, 1800, the clouds began to gather on all sides more darkly around him. The pulses of that earthquake which convulsed Europe, had already begun to vibrate throughout Germany ; and the arts, like scared birds, were about to fly from the approaching storm. Beethoven was a declared republican. "Plato's commonwealth was incorporated with his very being ;" and at such a time—as, indeed, throughout his after life—this peculiarity was another impediment to his worldly success in the Austrian capital. He pursued the opening career of Napoleon with the eagerest hope ; and had composed his majestic Sinfonia Eroica, as a tribute to the First Consul, when the news of his proclamation as emperor reached Vienna ; and the intended dedication was thrown with disgust and disappointment into the fire. Nor was he reconciled to his former idol, until after his tragic end in St Helena had expiated, as he thought, the crime of rising on the ruins of the republic. From the period of the empire, he appears to have cared little for the politics of the day—preserving, to the last, the sturdy independence of his own opinions, which were, perhaps, founded on little knowledge of real life, but cannot be noticed without respect, as they deprived him of all chance of advancement, or advantage, from the court—which, in Germany, is the chief hope of the musical artist.

Without intending to attempt any catalogue of his many works, we may here mention that his grandest compositions begin to date from the commencement of the new century : in 1800, we find him busy with "The Mount of Olives," the Symphonies began to appear in 1803 ; in the following year, also, he commenced "Fidelio," which was unfortunately represented, for the first time, during the occupation of Vienna by the French in 1805 ; and, owing to this circumstance chiefly, was wholly unsuccessful ; the disgust which he conceived from this failure, as it deterred him from resuming the composition of opera, (although in after years he was repeatedly urged to undertake it, when "Fidelio," revised and reproduced in better times, had had its deserved triumph on the stage,) is one of the greatest misfortunes that has ever befallen this branch of the art. Later, he composed his great masses; and the series of his great instrumental works, with solo, piano-forte, and chamber-music, continued in unbroken succession to the close of his life; these, with an exception to be mentioned hereafter, having, to the last, furnished his principal means of subsistence.

His fame, which was now spread throughout Germany, had already brought to Vienna, in an evil hour for his happiness, his two brothers, Carl and Johann, in the hope of bettering their fortunes through his influence and aid. To these unworthy relatives—who appear to have both been mean, selfish, and grasping, in no common degree—the great composer was generously attached; and most of his earnings were allowed, without any reserve, to fall into their hands. But this was not the worst. As his infirmities began to estrange him from society, the elder brother but too successfully, attempted to rule him for his own selfish purposes, and to secure this influence by turning him away from his real friends and patrons. This was, in some degree, controlled by the authority of the Prince Lichnowsky, as long as he lived; but, after his death, the mischievous tyranny of the brothers was almost wholly unopposed. A complete stranger to the practical business of life, rendered suspicious by his growing deafness, and leaning for advice and support on these selfish relatives—who sought only to extort from his labours some profit for themselves—Beethoven was rendered an object of pity to his better friends, and of dislike to many; while his scanty earnings were plundered, and every unworthy contrivance that meanness could suggest was employed to prevent his escape from this miserable bondage. We are told by Ries:—

His brothers took especial pains to alienate him from all his nearest friends; and yet, whatever wrongs they committed, although convicted of them, it needed only a few tears to make him forgive all. He would then say, "He is, after all, my brother;" and the friend was then liable to reproach for his good-nature and frankness.

A characteristic instance or two may suffice. This from Ries:—

Beethoven had promised his three sonatas (Op. 31) to Nügeli of Zurich; his brother Carl, in the meanwhile who unfortunately never ceased meddling with his affairs, having attempted to sell the work to a Leipzig publisher. This gave rise to several disputes between the brothers, as Beethoven resolved to keep the promise once given. When the sonatas were completed and ready to be despatched, the dissension between the brothers was renewed, and even proceeded farther than words. On the following day, he gave me the sonatas to forward immediately to Zurich, with a letter to his brother, enclosed in one to Von Breuning for the perusal of the latter. Nothing can be imagined more elevated in its moral tone, or more affecting for its feeling, than this lecture on his brother's conduct of the preceding day. He first displayed it in all its true contemptible aspect, and then concluded by forgiving him thoroughly, but with a serious warning to change his ill courses.

There appears to have been no bounds to the dirty cupidity of these brothers. Schindler tells us:—

At this time (1806-7,) Beethoven was in the habit of receiving not a few presents,—all of which, however, vanished utterly; and his friends asserted that the "evil genius" (his brother) was active in removing from his reach, not only his well-wishers, but his valuables also. When Beethoven was asked, "Where is that ring, or this watch?" he used, after a moment's pause, to reply, "I know not;" although he knew right well how they had been abstracted, but was unwilling to accuse his brothers of such dishonesty.

This is a topic on which it is hateful to dwell: we hasten therefore to say that Carl, the elder* brother, died in 1815, commending to his charge a son, of whom we shall have to speak hereafter,—a legacy of trouble and bitterness; whereby he doubled after his death the mischief inflicted while he lived. The younger brother Johann was an apothecary, and became prosperous by the composer's aid; yet to the end of Beethoven's life, when sickness and want were gathering around him, the brother's selfishness was never for a moment relaxed, and far from giving, he still attempted to prey upon the failing sufferer, at the very time when he was insulting him with a vulgar parade of his newly acquired wealth. An instance, related by Schindler, must be preserved, for the sake of the contrast between the characters of the brothers which it exhibits.

On New Year's Day 1823, as we were seated at table, there was handed to the Master a card† from his brother, who lived in the next house, inscribed, "Johann van Beethoven, Landed-proprietor (Gutbesitzer)." Beethoven immediately wrote on the reverse, "Ludwig van Beethoven, Intellectual-proprietor (Hirnbesitzer)," and sent it back to the landed gentleman. It had happened a few days before this ludicrous incident, that this brother, speaking of the Master, had boasted, "that he would never advance so far as he (Johann) had done." As may be imagined, Beethoven was infinitely diverted by this piece of ostentation.

It only remains to add, that this sordid "landed-proprietor" survived the great composer, of whose name he was so utterly unworthy.

In 1809, an offer was made to Beethoven of the post of Kapellmeister to the King of Westphalia, which, having still no certain maintenance at Vienna, he was inclined to accept: it was indeed "the first and last opening ever presented to him of a secure subsistence;"—the last, because soon he became, by the increase of his deafness, wholly disqualified for the direction of an orchestra. On this occasion, however, three Austrian princes, the Archduke Rudolph,‡ and the Princes Kinsky and Lobkowitz, "thinking it disgraceful for Austria to

* He had obtained the post of cashier in the National Bank at Vienna; but died in embarrassed circumstances: the widow was a woman of dissolute conduct.

† It is customary in Germany to send cards to acquaintances and friends at this season. Johann had thriven so well in his trade, that he had given up the shop and bought an estate, of which this was the announcement.

‡ A pupil of Beethoven's, and the only one of the imperial family who extended any patronage to him, and this in a manner more selfish than princely. Beethoven's political notions were a bar to all royal favour, which was reserved for other musicians, his inferiors in every respect, allow the great artist, who was the pride of the nation, to withdraw to a foreign land," offered to secure to him an annual pension of 4000 gulden, to be paid so long as he should possess no other fixed appointment, on the condition of his remaining in Vienna. He accepted the proposal and remained. The moderate income thus secured, was, however, in the course of two years, reduced by a fifth, by the financial edict published in 1811, whereby the value of all money was diminished to this extent. Some years later, on the death of Prince Lobkowitz, his portion of the allowance was withdrawn by the next heir. A part only of Prince Kiasky's share was preserved on the death of that prince in 1817; so that, before Beethoven's decease, the pension had dwindled down to about 600 thaler, some £30 sterling. We have dwelt thus minutely on the transaction, as it comprises the whole sum of public acknowledgment that Austria could afford to the composer "who was the pride of the nation!"—about the pay of a lieutenant of cavalry, or a custom-house officer of the second class!

By Seyfried, who saw him about this period, Beethoven is described as

Not exceeding the middle height, thickset, and with large bones; full of bodily vigour, the very image of strength.

Schindler adds to this:

His head was unusually large, overgrown with long matted grizzled hair, which was rarely smoothed, and gave him rather a wild look, especially (which was not seldom the case) when his beard also had grown very long. His brow was lofty and expanded, his eyes brown and small, and when he laughed, quite buried in his head; on the other hand, they started out to an unusual size, and either rolled darting around, the pupil generally turned upwards, or were immovably fixed, whenever an idea had seized upon him. At such moments, his exterior at once underwent a striking alteration, and assumed a visibly inspired and commanding aspect, which, to the bystander, made his short figure appear as gigantic as his mind. Such moments of sudden inspiration often surprised him in the midst of society, or while passing through the streets; and generally attracted the eager notice of all near him.

From Ries we learn:

That he was awkward and ungraceful in his gestures; seldom took any thing brittle in his hands that he did not break;—would frequently upset his inkstand into the piano-forte—tumbled, soiled, and damaged his furniture. And, in short, did every thing that a tidy person ought not to do. How he accomplished the task of shaving himself was always a mystery; but his wounded chin bore frequent witness to the risk he ran in the process.

The anxiety and distress which he had endured had not yet bowed his frame; but the various eccentricities of manner and habit which characterized him, were, to some extent, displayed; and before proceeding to the next and darker epoch of his history, we may as well pause in this interval (between 1809 and 1815,)—which was not marked by any special event beyond the successive production of many beautiful works,—to describe some of these peculiarities, and look into the daily life of this remarkable being.

He was educated a Catholic, but was not punctual in devout observances, although of the truly religious temper of his mind there can be no doubt. One of the most valued ornaments of his chamber was the framed copy of an inscription from a temple of Isis, which he said contained the substance of all high and pure religion:—

"I am that which is.

"I am all that is, was, and shall be: no mortal hath raised the veil that covers me.

"He is self sustained and alone: to him alone all things owe their being."

His love of reading, and the masculine and pure judgment that attracted him to the best writers, have been already described:—his favourite author was our own Shakspeare, a spirit akin to his own. His diligence was untiring; but he was incapable of system or order: "to address himself to a certain thing at a given time was impossible." Hence his dislike of giving lessons; even his dames de prédilection were made to feel how he hated the task; and scolded him for his impatience, but in vain.—The same aversion to constraint made him reluctant to play in society, and his refusals, when pressed, were a frequent cause of offence to his admirers; many of whom, after a journey undertaken for the sole object of hearing him, were compelled to return unsatisfied. As his deafness increased, he would allow no one to be present while he played, if he could avoid it.

His nature combined a singular frankness, with a tendency to mistrust of others, which amounted at last to a positive disease. In his cheerful moments, his spirits were high, not to say boisterous, and his conversation, when he unbent himself, while yet able to take a part in society, was animated, forcible, and abounding in pleasantry and sarcasm. He has been accused of haughtiness towards his brother professors; but this appears to have been often surmised when, in reality, his reserve arose from the consciousness of the infirmity which he tried to conceal. Of his generous dealings with many artists, we have sufficient instances, and some of a characteristic plainness, which thoroughly bespeak the nature of the man. When Moscheles wrote, at the close of a work undertaken at Beethoven's request, and apparently in some anxiety as to its reception,—"Finis, with God's help!"—the master added the energetic comment, "Man, help thyself!"

He rose early, and began to compose as soon as he was dressed. During the morning, he would twice or thrice leave his writing for half an hour at a time, run into the open air, whatever the weather might be, and return with new ideas, which were immediately transcribed. In eating he was moderate and frugal, but most irregular as to the hours of his meals:—his favourite drink was pure water, and his habit in latter years, of frequenting coffee-houses, which he generally chose where he was least likely to be disturbed or stared at, was pursued for the sake of reading the newspapers only—in which he greatly delighted. Although a thorough sloven in his dress—(Frau Streicher found him at one time "without either a coat or a shirt that were fit to wear," and compelled him, greatly to his advantage, to reform his wardrobe)—he was a perfect Mussulman in the frequency of his ablutions; and was continually dabbling in water, in the midst of which process he often became absorbed by some sudden imagination, and stood "in the barest neglige," dripping like a river-god, and utterly unconscious of his uncomfortable position—"murmuring to himself, and howling, for singing it could not be called," as the ideas occurred to him.

In worldly matters he was as helpless as a child; of the use of money he had no notion; and was thus not only at the mercy of those around him, but wasted in a thriftless manner the sums he obtained. This kept him in constant embarrassments. Although never rewarded for his compositions to half the extent they deserved, he would have been maintained by them in comfort but for the little care he bestowed on economy, his liberality to his worthless relatives, and the robbery which they practised upon him, uncontrolled, but not unsuspected. In later years, as his means became more scanty, and sickness pressed upon him, he grew so suspicious (not surely without some reason,) that he would not trust any one, so far as even to pay the most trifling account for him.

He was fanciful and restless beyond all measure as to his choice of a dwelling; perpetually changing his quarters, and for the most whimsical reasons. He had often to pay for three or four at a time,—one had too much, another too little sun; in another the water was bad; and we read of his giving up a country lodging that pleased him "because the baron, his landlord, annoyed him by bowing too obsequiously whenever they met." His summer was always spent somewhere out of town; the fresh air seems to have been indispensable to his existence; and most of his great compositions were designed and fashioned during his rambles abroad, either alone or in company. Need we remind the musical reader of the Pastoral Symphony; in which the fresh spirit of nature, and the life that breathes in woods, and breezes, and running waters, are embodied with an animation and beauty borrowed from their immediate presence? Towards the close of his life his household arrangements became more and more uncomfortable and disordered, and in the sickness and mental distress of his latter years, he suffered all that can be imagined of trouble and neglect, in the solitary condition of a bachelor, infirm, deaf, untended save by hirelings, and utterly ignorant of the simplest economy of household comfort. The picture which is given of his domestic cares and confusions would be almost farcical, were it not darkened by regret that such miserable vexations should have harassed a mind deserving of tranquillity and freedom, at the close of its marvellous and toilsome career.

If we add that, however vehement in his dislikes, and almost capriciously irascible, he was equally quick to forgive, and to recall and atone for the utterances of his passionate moments; that, in a scene where sycophancy was the prevailing and profitable vice, he carried even to extremity the assertion of his rugged independence; that the main-spring of his exertions was a fervent desire to dignify and advance his beloved art, and to render himself worthy of its highest inspirations; and that throughout his career, amidst all the temptations that beset him, he kept his purity unsullied, and was never accused of a base or mean action,—we shall in some measure have traced the outline of a character in which the elements of goodness and nobility, and the gifts of an exquisite genius, were mingled with many flaws and infirmities that may be lamented, but cannot deprive him of the strongest claims to love and admiration. And how few of those who have been endowed and afflicted like him, have left us so much to record with reverence, and so little to conceal or extenuate! We must now hasten to the concluding period of his history.

In the autumn of 1815, as we have already said, his brother Carl died, bequeathing to his care and guardianship a son about eight years old. Writing to Ries of this event, he says,—“that he had expended on his deceased brother, while alive, more than 10,000 gulden to relieve his wants and make his existence easier;” that his widow (which was too true) was “a bad woman;” “the son from that time he looked upon as his own;” and devoted himself to the charge with a zeal and forgetfulness of himself which deserved the best recompense, but only were rewarded with loss, anxiety, and the vilest ingratitude. His first step, as the boy was clever and promising, was to adopt him legally, in order to withdraw him from the evil influence of his mother; this she resisted, and a long and expensive contest at law, most distressing to Beethoven, and in which he met with some mortifications that we cannot stay to relate, terminated in 1820 in the full acknowledgment of his claim. From this time he took the nephew entirely to himself, became a housekeeper for his sake, watched over him like a father, provided him with the means of a liberal education; and during its progress refused more than one invitation to visit England, (where the Philharmonic Society offered him terms most tempting in his straitened circumstances,) in order that he might not lose sight of the youth. As the latter grew older, various irregularities of conduct, and proofs of a passionate and unstable character, distressed his guardian; but his indulgence was extreme,—he warned and forgave. In 1824, the youth was entered in the university, and Beethoven gave up his dwelling in the country in order to be near him,—at the cost of a severe illness from which he only partially recovered. Soon, however, the nephew indulged as a student with more liberty, although he displayed extraordinary talents, became more unsteady and vicious in his courses,—a settled habit of falsehood, neglect of his studies, and a proneness to bad company, daily became more inveterate, and repeated misconduct at length caused his expulsion from the university. This disgrace to his name, this disappointment of his hopes, this ungrateful return for so much love and care, bowed the failing composer to the earth. But still he again sacrificed and forgave; the nephew was placed in an institution for mercantile studies, as the learned professions were now closed to him. The affectionate and thoughtful admonitions which have been preserved in Beethoven's letters to his nephew on this occasion, display him in the most touching and elevated light,—as the kind counsellor, the indulgent father, and the grieved but still enduring benefactor. But these were in vain. A repetition of the same evil courses led to new embarrassments, and to the prospect of a second disgrace from his superiors; to avoid which the wretched youth attempted his own life, but unsuccessfully; and Beethoven had the misery of seeing his adopted son, in pursuance of the Austrian laws, imprisoned as a criminal, and, after a confinement of some duration, restored to his guardian, for one day only, before the fulfilment of the sentence banishing him from Vienna. By great exertions Beethoven succeeded in obtaining a commutation of this sentence, through Marshal Stutterheim, who consented to receive the youth into his corps as a cadet; and, before joining his regiment, he remained for a short time at Vienna, whither Beethoven, sick and worn down with affliction, had hastened from the country to receive him. This was in December 1826; and from this moment, the mortal illness which soon hurried him to the grave, and during which the most heartless neglect was exhibited by his nephew, seized upon him with painful and alarming symptoms. The circumstances, as related by Schindler, are too melancholy and remarkable to be passed over.

"It was not until after some days that I learned his arrival, and the state of his health. I hastened to him; and, amongst other circumstances of the most afflicting nature, was informed that he had repeatedly, but in vain, sent to entreat the attendance of his two former physicians, Braunhofer and Staudenheim; the first excused himself on the ground of the distance being too great; and the other had often promised to come, but never appeared; and, that in consequence, a doctor had been sent to attend him, how or by whom he knew not, who, of course, was quite a stranger to him, and to his constitution. I afterwards heard, however, from the lips of the worthy doctor himself, (Professor Wawruch,) in what manner he had been directed to the sick-bed of Beethoven. It is too remarkable, and affords a striking proof how utterly this man, so dear to his age and to posterity, was neglected, or rather betrayed and destroyed, by his nearest relatives, who owed so much to him. The professor informed me that he had learned from the marker in one of the hotels, who had been brought to the hospital sick, that Beethoven's nephew, while playing at billiards in the café some days before, had requested him to go and seek a physician to attend his uncle, who was ill; and having been prevented by his own ill health from fulfilling the commission, the man begged Dr Wawruch to visit him, which was immediately done. He found Beethoven lying without any medical attendance. So that a marker in a billiard-room must fall sick, and be sent to an hospital, to give the great Beethoven the chance of obtaining medical help in his utmost need!

The nephew set out to join his regiment before the end of December; and, from that moment, it seemed as if Beethoven was delivered from an evil genius, for he became again cheerful, and quite resigned to his misfortune, hoping and expecting a speedy recovery from the care of his physician. His attachment for his nephew was now changed into bitter animosity; and yet, as the moment of his departure from this world drew near, his former feelings returned, and he left this nephew his sole legatee.

Before we pass to the closing scene thus distressingly introduced, it will be necessary to resume hastily the outline of Beethoven's general history from the year 1816, which has been suspended in order that the tale of his domestic troubles might not be interrupted.

His true friend, and patron, the Prince Lichnowsky, had died in 1814. The musical society which he had assembled around him, was transferred, in a great measure, to the palace of the Russian ambassador Rasumowsky—to whom Beethoven dedicated some of his latest and most beautiful chamber compositions. The Congress of Vienna brought hither many distinguished admirers of the artist; and he received, on this occasion, not only flattering testimonials of regard, but also considerable pecuniary gains. This was the last epoch of his appearance in general society: a few years later, and he had fallen, as it were, out of the knowledge of his townsmen, and was brooding over his many troubles in gloomy solitude. His reputation was, however, daily becoming greater abroad; and he was besieged with commissions for musical works: but his chief attention was devoted to the composition of his great symphonies and masses, which were successively performed at concerts—of which the risk was undertaken by himself, in default of the patronage which the court refused him. The gain from these was uncertain and scanty—except in reputation; and the expense of his nephew's education and of the long lawsuit, and repeated attacks of illness, kept him for ever in straitened circumstances, and compelled him to toil unremittingly. He had, in better days, invested a small fund, it is true; but this he was loath to touch—regarding it as his last resource, in case of absolute helplessness—and as a deposit for his nephew. Offers were made to him to compose another opera; but he seemed unable to overcome the disgust caused by the first failure of Fidelio—although, on a revival of this work, it had met with the applause it deserved. On one occasion of its representation in 1823, Beethoven, for the last time, was invited to conduct it in public. During the rehearsal, however, it became evident that his utter deafness rendered it impossible; and the directors of the theatre were compelled to convey to him, with the utmost tenderness, this painful intimation. "He instantly left the orchestra. The melancholy which this mortification produced did not pass away for the whole of that day; and at table he remained gloomily silent." His deafness was now become so confirmed, that his friends were reduced to writing what they wished to convey to him.

His grand mass, completed in 1823, was honoured by Louis XVIII., from Paris, with a gold medal, specially inscribed as the king's present. In 1822 he had been created an honorary member of the Society of Arts and Sciences in Stockholm: invitations to visit England, as we have already mentioned, reached him about this period; while, at home, his consideration began to give place to the new passion for Rossini, who had taken Vienna, as it were, by storm. Beethoven felt this severely, but made no complaint; and continued to pursue his high designs with as much zeal as if they had been received at home with the applause that greeted them elsewhere.

One more event of his professional history must be recorded, for the sake of displaying what meanness can exist in titled patrons. In 1824, a commission, to compose a set of violin quartets, was sent him by Prince Nicholas Galitzin, from Russia, couched in the most flattering terms. The work was undertaken, and pursued with the utmost care. To fulfil the commission, Beethoven laid aside some projected works of the highest class—amongst which was the composition of Goethe's Faust; and the quartets were, at last, completed and despatched. The prince admired them—wrote for explanations of various passages, and at length declared himself perfectly informed, and satisfied. But the stipulated reward was in vain applied for; and the composer remained a loser of his precious time and of the cost of the copyist's labours, and of the expensive correspondence with this pattern of Russian ostentation and meanness. It is proper that such acts should be recorded, for the abiding disgrace of the offender; and the lovers of art will never forgive the author of a deceit which deprived the world of compositions that no one after Beethoven might dare to undertake. This was almost the last mortification which he was destined to experience; for the last fruitless application to the prince was in December 1826, when sickness had rendered him necessitous and unable to continue his labours, never afterwards resumed.

He languished throughout the winter months with no improvement; all his resources were exhausted, excepting the small investment already named; he was too proud to ask for aid at the hands of his neighbours, who had neglected him; and yet his want of money was pressing. In this strait, he bethought him of the former offers of the London Philharmonic Society; and addressed to them, through Moscheles, a request that they would fulfil the design of a concert for his benefit, promising to write a new symphony, in return for this favour, as soon as his state permitted it. The conduct of the English musicians, on this occasion, was both liberal and delicate. They at once requested his acceptance of £100, offering to send more, if required; with expressions which bespoke their respect and sympathy for the great composer.* The reply arrived in time only to soothe the last moments of Beethoven, who was now rapidly sinking. On the 18th of March, 1827, he dictated an acknowledgment, literally from his deathbed. The dropsical symptoms resisted all attempts to relieve him; and he encountered the approach of death with cheerful and religious composure. After deliberately making his will, he received the sacraments of the Church on the 24th. On the same day the last struggle, which was terrible and obstinate, began; nor was he finally released until the 26th of March, when he expired amidst the tumult of an unusually fierce storm, which was rolling over the town as his troubled spirit departed—a close not inaptly resembling his destiny in life. A stranger, or at least a mere acquaintance from Gratz, who had hastened to visit Beethoven before he died, was the only person present in his last moments; his friends Von Breuning and Schindler, who had been in attendance during his sickness, having left the house on some mission concerning the arrangements for his funeral. When they returned, his troubles were at an end! Surely it is no exaggeration to say, that there is a deep tragedy exhibited in this solitary death scene: untended by kindred, unwept by household love, and darkened by ingratitude and neglect: the miserable farewell which the world afforded to one of its noblest ornaments, more cold and blank than it gives to many whose career has only been marked by mischief and disgrace!

Beethoven died at the age of fifty-six years and three months; and now rests in the burial-ground of the village of Währing, at a short distance from Vienna, in the Alster district of the suburbs. The funeral ceremony was attended by more than twenty thousand persons; and in the respect paid to his remains, the citizens of Vienna testified a regret that was general throughout Europe. With him the list of great German composers was closed—nor is it likely that any successor to his place will appear in our day.

The length to which the present notice has run, forbids any further attempt to complete, by general observations, the picture of which the scattered traits only have been hitherto exhibited. We must, therefore, reluctantly conclude, yet not without hope that the imperfect sketch will be sufficient to interest all those who are capable of reverence for the memory of genius, and of sympathy for the afflictions which are too often its portion on this earth. V.

* Some German writers have complained of the version current respecting this gift; the facts, however, are as above stated. They say that Beethoven did not want alms, or, had he needed them, his own countrymen would have been proud to afford them. It is, nevertheless, true, that although not penniless, he was in immediate difficulties; and, with the fear of long sickness before him, rather turned for help to foreigners, who had already evinced their respect for him, than to those by whom he felt himself unduly neglected. They cannot deprive England of the just credit of this becoming act, which Beethoven fully appreciated.

SONNET.

BORN ! the Sun, above yon rugged steep,
Bursts in its first red glory, like a bride
Leaving the pillow of her restless sleep
All bathed in blushes, in the wedded pride
Of bashfulness and beauty ! Soft the air
Comes breathing through these laurels, loath to wake
The ripples of the sleepy rill, or scare

The innocent doves, that infant cooings make
To hail the birth of day. Should sullen wo
At such a time sit on the selfish breast,
While Nature spreads o'er earth a lovely glow
To image and fortell the glorious rest
Of AFTER-LIFE ! Oh, for that scene in vain
I pine ! I would I were a thoughtless boy again !

VIOLET HAMILTON; OR, THE TALENTED FAMILY.

CHAPTER XV.

It was the opinion of Mr James Winkin—the respectable head-waiter of the Crown and Mitre, the principal inn in a certain ancient cathedral city on the great north road—that “the house” had not been so crowded since the irruption of the Highlanders in 1746, as during the passing season, and on the particular night the duties of which were awfully congregating before him. The memory of Joe Crabbe, the dowager-dowager Boots,—who still crept about the stable-yard, getting a bone from the scullion, or picking up a penny for pitching a chance carpet-bag on the top of the night heavy-coach, while the present incumbent snatched his fitful repose,—had no parallel to this season. It was Joe’s firm belief, that the world was going topsy-turvy, and old Jobson, the landlord, making a rapid fortune out of its madness. Not at the assizes, not at the convocation of the clergy, not even in that famous and well-remembered race-week, when the great match came off between Bobadil and the Bishop, had any thing ever before been known to equal every day and week of that season,—when company absolutely overflowed, and travellers, bent on endless quests, crossed, recrossed, and jostled each other; knocked-up the waiters, half-killed Boots, and fairly murdered five pairs of Jobson’s post-horses. Newly coupled doves were returning from Gretna, languidly and at leisure, secretly disappointed that there had been no hotter pursuit; Scotch M. P.’s were going down to keep their constituents in good-humour; and jovial sportsmen, bursting away from courts, counters, clubs, and counting-houses, with the glee of school-boys at a breaking-up, were thus far advanced on their annual progress towards the enjoyment of that saturnalia of fagged, worried, and bored gentlemen,—grouse-shooting on the Scottish moors. “Commercial gentlemen” were, as usual, in full activity, in their periodical transit from Glasgow to Manchester, and vice versa; and there was a handsome sprinkling of Liverpool Lakers, of both sexes and all denominations of Christians, pushing on for a glimpse of “Abbotsford,” and, subordinate to that rampant lion, “Scotland” and the “Highland locks.” All this was only in the ordinary course of events; and several extraordinary were impending on Jem Winkin:—the yeomanry dinner annual, and the bachelors’ ball quinquennial. Besides this, the players were in the town; and though the saints had made considerable head on the sinners, since their last periodical visit, a “bumper house” was confidently expected for the Benefit of Mr Henry Adolphus Fitzwagram, who, though new on the Northern Circuit, had emerged at once, by the mere force of his transcendent and versatile talents, a star of the first magnitude! When young Mr Greenthwaite the draper, son of old Greenthwaite the Quaker, summoned courage to go behind the scenes, and directly put the question to the manager, for the information of self and friends, all warm patrons of the theatre, who Mr Henry Adolphus really was, that functionary was not prepared either to affirm or to deny, directly, that Fitzwagram was not Charles Kean; though he fancied the other conjecture of Mr Greenthwaite as probable; and that Fitzwagram was quite as likely to be a young man of family and fashion, an amateur, whom fondness for the stage had led to assume an alias and the character which he sustained with such éclat.

“It must be so, sir. Why he knows every thing and every body. The palace, the cabinet, the greenroom, the clubs, the hells, the turf, the ring;—the three great worlds, of fashion, literature, and politics, are alike familiar to Fitzwagram,” said Mr Greenthwaite,—“a wonderful fellow, sir!”

“A wonderful fellow!” returned the manager, slightly elevating his eyebrows. “I only wish I could fix him for the circuit.”

“Don’t look for it;—a clear case of escapade, though I have fixed him. Our Shakspeare Club are to have the honour to entertain Fitzwagram to-night to a farewell supper . . . Fought shy; but I nailed him, on condition—you must not be affronted—that we were to be rigidly exclusive. Fitzwagram said, when pressed, ‘I cannot decline the invitation with which the rising spirits of this venerable city,—the juvenile patrons of literature and the drama, of whom you, sir, are the envoy,—have honoured me; but I must make a distinction:—no salary-payer, no man of properties, for the private society in which I unbend!’—Gad! he’s a high fellow; but we don’t think he can be Waterford after all:—he is too accomplished, too clever for that idea . . . Can he be a Berkeley or a Lennox, think ye? But you are not affronted by Fitzwagram compelling us to exclude you?”

“Not a whit,” replied the manager, “we poor strolling managers must not take amiss the airs of the stars. I am but too proud, Mr Greenthwaite, when I have the good fortune to engage an actor whose abilities come up to the ideas of my generous patrons in this venerable city and vicinage. Besides, I believe Mr Henry Adolphus Fitzwagram will indubitably open and unbend much more graciously when freed of the restraint of my society.”

“You are to be congratulated on your good fortune, sir: a decided hit.—A universal genius; and such accomplishments! fencing, dancing, singing, the piano,—farce, tragedy, comedy, all seem to come alike to Fitzwagram. And at Penrith he gave, I am told, such a lecture on Phrenology! All the Quakers attended,—sly way of seeing and hearing Fitzwagram, eh? But come now: there’s a good man! who really is he? I shall be silent as the grave,—only one’s private satisfaction.” The manager smiled significantly, shook his head mysteriously, and replied, "How can I, sir, tell what I have no right to know, whatever my private suspicions may be? But of this much I am convinced, Fitzwagram's name will be yet heard of in histrionic, or else in some other annals."

"I thought so," returned the gratified young draper.

The town was furiously divided on the respective merits of Mr Fitzwagram and Mr Edward Belville, the old favourite of the circuit, who had, for seven years, done tragedy and genteel comedy to every body's content, until had appeared the transcendent genius, the star, who shone more brilliantly off than on the boards, as those, like the fortunate draper, admitted to his private society affirmed. Greenthwaite was the furious leader of the Fitzwagramites; and was that night to preside at the supper, which he was to do the choice spirits of the town the honour of accepting, provided it was very, very select,—no one present save those he named and approved.

As Greenthwaite stood at the door of the Crown and Mitre, farther unfolding his ideas to Jem Winkin, as to the arrangements for the party, the proper distribution of the wax-lights ordered—for he had heard Fitzwagram pronounce gas-lamps "intensely vulgar"—and the icing of the champagne, and the lobster salad—a handsome equipage from the south drew up, to add to the crowding and confusion of the caravansary; and a handsome young man, with an air of distinction, not lost on the experienced Jem, assisted a fair slight girl to alight, with care and tenderness which at once told their history. Not for Gretna; for there was no haste nor perturbation as the lady was conducted in; Jem, meanwhile, leaving Mr Greenthwaite on the steps, and leading the way to his best parlour, in honour of the handsome couple and his own honeymoon ideas. A rapid glance at trunks, hat-boxes, and umbrellas, revealed nothing as to the name and condition of the new arrivals; and to interrogate either the postilion or footman required some little time and address: so Jem, in virtue of his unerring instinct, as a waiter of fifteen years' standing, while he summoned the principal chambermaid, whispered—"Honeymoon jaunt—no doubt of it—lovely young creature; you may give 'em one of your best chambers, Missus Hannah—pay handsomely at such times."

The sovereign princess of comfortable repose in the Crown and Mitre, under which hundreds of her majesty's fatigued subjects nightly disposed their wearied frames—the sole empress of sheets, towels, and wash-hand basins, was equally experienced, and less enthusiastic than Jem Winkin; and not to be as easily done out of a "best chamber," as he had out of his best parlour, without any thing like due cause shown.

"Own carriage?" inquired she coolly.

"Es—handsome landaulette—Long-acre built—stylish turn out: servants, harness, and every thing."

"Own cattle—pair well-matched beautiful bays—blood to the ear-point."

This was so far satisfactory; yet, in spite of the excessive over-crowding, Hannah had still a few secondary chambers to let for the night; and she continued—

"Lady's maid?"

"Not a bit of one."

"Humph! No. 159 may do. Boots!—the luggage to 159," cried the lady of the keys. The want of a lady's maid having lowered her ideas of the guests several degrees, and mentally exalted their sleeping apartment two stories.

"No, it won't; won't, I tell ye," said Jem. "They're the right sort: that's their servant coming along the passage. . . . Letters—the Post-office—right opposite Sir . . . but Tom will go. Fly, Tom! letters—Charles Herbert, Esquire—Mrs Charles Herbert—Boo—oots!"

Boots did not fly: but he went at his own time; and found letters—a whole half-dozen of them—addressed, as if by men of business, simply to Charles Herbert, Esquire; and one, in a lady's hand, to Mrs Charles Herbert, Post-office, &c., &c. Jem—in taking a passing look of the envelopes, before carrying them to the gentleman—was somewhat disappointed to find neither "Honourable," nor any patrimonial title;—not even the impress of a coronet, on any one seal; yet he persisted in his original belief, that the new-arrivals were "of the right sort"—and on their marriage tour; though he afterwards learned, from the servant, that that happy event had taken place some months since. The young people had been rambling about in Wales, in Derbyshire, and last, at the Westmoreland Lakes; and they expected to be here joined by the gentleman's mother, on their way to Scotland. The servant went to eat his dinner, while the luggage still lay about waiting the fiat of the landlady, to whom James appealed. Boots was often distracted by a divided allegiance to the rival potentates of the bar; though he generally obeyed the sovereign de facto—which, at present, seemed James—"the master" being away at Newcastle to purchase horses. James was an old and faithful servant of the establishment, who had perseveringly fought his way from ostler's aide, through all gradations of public service, until he had reached his present responsible office. His word went far. Although, in general, a very obliging person, and bound to universal civility by the threefold ties of natural disposition—the hope of immediate reward—and the expectation that old Jobson—rich, and gouty—would retire, some time soon, and leave him the goodwill—he had never been amicable with the head chambermaid—a late importation from the Bath Road—who now, tossing her head, repeated—

"A plain Mister, and no lady's maid! I say, 159: if I am to be interfered with in this way—dictated to in my own department—the sooner, ma'am, you look out for my successor in office " said the indignant lady of the bed-chamber.

"The gentleman's mother is expected in her own carriage to-night," said James. "They may stop some days with us, if made cumfutable. She is a widow lady of large jointure, with a handsome house at the West End; and keeps" (her crowning glory) "a full establishment of servants." The young lady is a niece of the Earl of Tarbert, and has a great fortune."

"Where are they last from, James?" inquired the portly landlady, as if his report were to settle the dispute; "from Lowther Castle, or Brougham Hall, or any where?"

"This morning from Keswick, ma'am—lunched at Penrith—a handsome supper ordered, to be in readiness when the other lady's carriage arrives."

The landlady, to whom Keswick was "nowhere," was not quick in her response; and her jealous aides hung each on the lips which decided victory.

"I think they know the Bishop, and are perhaps to visit at Netherby," said James hesitatingly; and he muttered in an under voice, as if in atonement to his conscience, "At least the gentleman spoke of a bishop, and the lady inquired about the 'Netherby clan.'"

"The Bishop, James!" cried his mistress, "send cook to me. . . . Your best spare chamber directly, Mrs Hannah; game, blackcock—fresh—I mean fresh dressed—patties—apricot tartlets—jellies—stay—my own keys!" and the landlady, moving in quick time, repaired to those extra-extra stores preserved in her own sacred keeping places, for grand and rare occasions, repeating "The bishop!" while the chamber-maid, darting glances of detection of a lie and fiery indignation at her triumphant foe, also moved off to obey.

The supper ordered was hastened by the gentleman, with the addition of mulled wine and biscuits; for the young lady, on reading her letter, found that the expected friend, who was crossing the country from York, had been detained by an accident to her carriage, of no alarming nature to herself, but which would delay her for a day, till it could be repaired.

Meanwhile, the waiter having donned a white neck-cloth, brushed out his whiskers, and, according to the modern practice of fashionable English gentlemen before entering a room, combed out his hair with his fingers, in honour of the lady within and his own charms, assisted Mr Herbert's servant to lay the cloth; placing himself at supper, directly behind that gentleman's chair, and, consequently, opposite the imagined bride, in virtue of the ancient privilege which permits a cat to look at the king. Before quitting the room, but after snuffing the four wax lights, set in the best silver branches, and placing the decanters in parallelograms, James, looking at the lady, and respectfully addressing the gentleman, took the liberty to hope that "the lady would not be disturbed nor annoyed by the party assembling in the twin-parlour—all highly respectable young gentlemen of the town, who were that night to give a farewell supper to Mr Fitzwagram, the famous play-actor, who was a-going to America."

"I see there are only sliding-doors between us," said Mr Herbert,

"Yea, sir; sliding oak-pannels—our large dining-room when we have the county gentry at the races, or their honours, the judges."

"And a very commodious and handsome one," replied Herbert, thinking more of the languor visible in the beautiful face on which he tenderly gazed, than of the splendid and convenient dining accommodations of the Crown and Mitre.

"There will be catches, and glees, and toasts, and speeches, sir; and all that sort o' thing—Beg pardon, sir—for the freedom, sir—by the young gentleman; and, if it would be any amusement, sir, to the lady, sir:—beg pardon! When we have such parties, ladies are often spectators, sir,—just here, sir, where the pannel fits into the map of Yorkshire, sir—the Miss Lowthers, sir, and Lady Brampton, sir, and the Honourable Missus Faskarlie—I've seen 'em all having a peep!"

"Thank you," said Herbert. "If the lady should not be curious, perhaps I may. . . . if the company are not private?"

"O Lord, sir!—most happy, I am sure, if you'd do 'em the honour to drink a glass of wine with them, when Fitzwagram gives 'em a benefit. It's quite a thing, sir, in this town to-night.—Ten thousand pardons, sir!—But I know, gentlemen travelling like to see what is a-going on, sir. . . . The negus is just a-coming, sir,—Missus Jobson mixing it herself."

"Thank you," said Herbert, as both attendants retired,—Mr Herbert's man utterly horrified at the assurance of the waiter, which he charitably attributed to vulgar north-country breeding.

The young strangers, who had caused such commotion in the house, were glad to find themselves alone.

"You are not well, Violet;—either you are cold, or you have taken cold," said Herbert, now leading his wife to the sofa, which he had drawn close to the fire he had ordered. "This rambling and boating have been too much for you. . . . My mother will scold me for not taking better care of you, dearest one,—and I deserve it."

"I wish she were here to do so," replied Violet, in a languid tone, yet with eyes brightly smiling her grateful thanks. "Then, you are tired of me already;—in one little three months, Violet, long-ing for a third in our social parties."

"Don't fancy I shall incur our mother's censure of spoiling you longer, Charles," said Violet, laughing. "A little wholesome contradiction, called the assertion of independent judgment, will now be a pleasant variety for us both."

"Saucy rebel against legitimate authority! Don't you deserve to be well punished for this?" And the gay young husband proceeded to inflict the gentle punishment which, hitherto, had not been very violently resented.

"Herbert! dearest Charles! don't, pray—let me alone. I am so frightened, nay, I shall be affronted with you."

"Don't what, little fool?" said Herbert, laughing. "Are you offended?"

"Gentlemen coming into the next room. . . . Only an oak board!—and, I am sure there are voices there that I know, too. Hark!"

"Nonsense!—So it is not kissing, but being caught, you fear?—Fie, Violet! Yet, the dews of heaven never fell softer on the rose-buds. Let us kiss and be friends, however!"

"Dear Charles, are you quite well?" cried his wife, who almost feared the champagne had taken speedy, if evanescent, effect on his brain.

"Perfectly well. But what is the matter?" And now indeed the alarmed Herbert had a delicate duty to perform, in kissing away the fast gathering tears. "Violet, my own love, have my spirits been too boisterous for you; you are surely ill,—nervous? I wish you would go to bed before the noise begin. I wish my mother were here to nurse you."

"I believe I am nervous; . . . but I like no nurse half so well as yourself, Charles." And the flattering preference was repaid by a repetition of the original offence, not this time resented, though more gentlemen might be overheard coming into "the twin-parlour."

"Not my mother?"

"No, indeed."

"How proud you make me;—not old Marion?"

"Nay, you love to tease."

"Then you do prefer her nursing to mine?"

"Oh no, no. . . . What a fool you make of me. . . . But, Charles, there is one thing . . ."

"Well, love? But tell me, and never mind those gorgon-Gryphon letters, which seem basilisks to you."

"When our mother comes to-morrow, Charles . . ."

"What then, love? Why hesitate, why blush?"

"We must be sage, you know,—not giddy and indiscreet; remember we are old married people, now almost three months, and these raptures . . ."

"Almost three! fled like a bright short day. . . . And 'these raptures,' must they give place to lectures? and is this your first attempt in that line? Must I then try to seem to love you less?"

"I won't humour you by chiding. And there, I declare, is the man with his negus already." And Violet, like a guilty thing, started from her husband's clasp, and planted herself demurely, leaning on the mantel-piece, on the other side of the fire. The waiter,—it was not Jem Winkin,—quietly placed the rummer on the table, and went away. "Sit down, pray Mrs Charles, opposite me, to a quiet conjugal tête-à-tête. But first pledge me in this hot spicy liquor, to the waning of our honeymoon, since you warn me that it disappears to-night, with my mother's appearance."

"And another long era of happiness begins."

"So I fervently hope and believe; and not less bright, dear love."

"Not less sweet and serene; the sober certainty . . . But do keep your own side of the house, pray, or I shall certainly run away,—and, to spoil my quotation—fie! . . . And the gentlemen in the next room! There!"

"Hang the gentlemen in the next room!" said Herbert, laughing. "But you must sit down, and any where you please, at least till you have sipped your negus, my mother's old-fashioned remedy for chills taken on the water; or, Violet," and he looked earnestly in her eyes, "has your cold not come by post?"

There was some reason for the question, as, ever and anon, her eyes wandered, and pensively fixed upon the unopened letters strewed upon the table, while her thoughts involuntarily glanced back to the last bright and fleeting period of her young life, and forward into a future, which already looked troubled and dark.

"Not for us," was her secret reflection, as she recalled the contents of Mrs Herbert's late confidential letters to herself,—“but for her, born and nursed in the bosom of affluence and refinement, to whom luxury has become absolute necessity:—loving, united, together we can brave any fortune, and extract purest happiness, dearest pleasure, from our affections, and the exercise of our faculties. But for her!”

In this depressed mood, arising from a cause which she was not yet permitted to reveal to her husband, Violet now allowed herself to regret every thing, save only her marriage. That alone, the source of her pride and happiness, was never to be repented by her; and Heaven avert that another might ever repent! As she mused, Herbert, having silently watched her for some minutes, approached, and, unchidden, sat down and drew her towards him, kindly trying to cheer her depressed spirits, which he now again affected to impute to fatigue, as his former hint had disturbed her.

"Can I leave you alone to vex yourself reading over all those ugly letters—Gryphon's, and that one from Lord Tarbert's agent, and that from Mr Cryppes' solicitor. What a dowry of trouble and vexation I have brought you, Charles."

"Hush, Violet, lest I be angry with you. I must begin to try if I can chide, if you will be unjust to yourself—unkind to us both. I am going to smoke a cigar; and—Hark, the bonny Christ-church bells! 'The gentlemen in the next room' do reasonable justice to what the Cryppeses did so masterly, you remember."

Violet could not attend to the singing. She was wrapped in her own agitating thoughts; and, pressing the hand that fondly clasped hers, she at length found utterance:—

"Do you remember one lovely evening, Charles, long, long since now, in Mrs Herbert's garden-alcove, in Regent's Park, that we were alone, talking of our marriage, and that I tried to talk prudence. It was but talk, I fear."

"And I, perhaps, was singing, or rather feeling what I durst not say—

'Ah, wha could prudence think upon,
And sic a lassie by him!'

"But you were so often talking of prudence and delay, and I was so unwilling to listen, that I cannot precisely remember;—and, ah! these evenings they were all so lovely!"

"This was one in particular," faltered Violet, looking fondly in his eyes; "when you said . . ."

"Oh, tell me what, then?" urged he more earnestly.

"It was—'I could live upon your breath!'"

Herbert's face brightened. He well remembered the moment when he had first inhaled rapturous life from the sweet breath on which he hung. "Yes, dearest, I well remember—and I am not ashamed; was it not a love-inspired sentiment? I feel its power now. What were life without you—?"

"But, Charles . . .," gently remonstrated the lady.

"But nothing, Violet, . . . Why torment yourself, and disturb our new-born bliss—for is not this but the birth-day of an eternal happiness?—with doubts and fears, for which there may be, can be, no just cause."

"And leave you to bear alone what ought to be our mutual cares and anxieties, while I am only to be caressed and deceived for my good—the sharer of your joys only. Unkind Charles! this is to be but half a wife:—this imperfect confidence—this want of reliance, of entire sympathy distresses me more than could the worst ills my fancy paints:—were my only grievance redressed—if the heart that is my own gushed forth to me in pain and sorrow, as it overflows in happiness . . ."

Herbert looked excited, yet pleasure glowed in his eyes, while he said—"If you would promise me not to be annoyed;—yet if such be your sovereign pleasure, I fancy I must not dare to resist your wish. . . . The delight of fretting over things seems to do ladies good."

"Things that concern those we love. Yes, surely, the greatest imaginable to me—to share your whole heart, Charles—not one dark corner hid from me."

"Well, slip your black draught, and let me see you safely to No. 169, or where is it? I mean to have a cigar, and a glass through the boards, from those merry souls, while you undress; and to-morrow you shall be bored to your content, with Gryphon's legal despatches."

Content, almost light-hearted, and smiling brightly at this arrangement, the happy young wife was led away.

If prudence had not urged the immediate union of Herbert and his bride, neither had wisdom—poverty in the back-ground, joining in chorus—lifted up her potential voice against it. The documents so singularly recovered, which established Miss Hamilton's legal claim to a handsome, if not a large fortune, had satisfied the remaining scruples of Mrs Herbert, the only friend deeply interested, that if not rich as riches are reckoned by the standard of the English ancient nobility and gentry, or even by that of English commercial wealth, they would, with Violet's good sense and simple tastes, have enough for the easy means of comfortable living, and for the real enjoyments of refined life. Mrs Herbert, besides, entertained a fond, proud, real mother's flattering opinion of the capacity and attainments of her step-son; and the reasonable expectation, that a yet closer alliance with her friend, the Earl of Tarbert, through a marriage with his half-niece, would not narrow Charles' prospects of—all that he required—an introduction into public life through the earl's patronage. Spite of his early embarrassments, arising more from a generous imprudence than personal extravagance, when his affairs were finally adjusted, she was persuaded that a handsome reversion would remain from his own patri-mony; and though her fortune was tied up, and for ever disposed away from the family, a circumstance of which she now thought with bitter self-reproach, her income was ample; and her generosity as boundless as her affection for "both her children." Thus she now named them; and in her conduct, and even in her heart, she made no distinction between her son, and that sister-daughter, who, coming in the place of a hundred frivolous female acquaintances, had dignified her feelings, and doubled her enjoyment of life, by giving her one friend in whom her faith was perfect—one domestic companion, of her own sex, with whom her sympathies were entire; for they, without jealousy, worshipped the same fortunate man. The union of the lovers was, therefore, the seal of her own happiness; she gained a daughter, and kept her son.

But mortal pleasure, what are thou in sooth!
The torrent's smoothness ere it dash below.—

The first intimation of danger came from Lady Laura Temple. It was not in her own power to make the restitution to Mrs Herbert which her pride and her sense of justice equally dictated. Nay, there were grave doubts, from the nature of the absurd settlement, whether Lady Laura could ever possess the right of disposing of money vested in several trustees, of whom her father was one and Sir George Lees another, for the behoof of her younger children, without respect to who the father of said children might be. Lady Laura was indeed clearly entitled to dispose of the income of this property when, on the death of Mrs Herbert, it should accrue to her. But this was a distant view, and she had perfectly comprehended the dilemma, when she made, as she imagined, that happy compromise with her father, which led to his conceding the claims of Miss Hamilton without opposition. But whatever might have been the real wishes of the earl respecting his half-niece, neither was he a free agent. It was found that he had people of business and also creditors, who must be consulted, and, in particular, one provincial broker, Mr Stokes, who, having advanced very large sums to rescue him from bad and dangerous hands, now claimed or assumed the sole direction of his affairs. It was not a fortnight after the joyful marriage of Herbert and Violet, ere Mrs Herbert, alarmed and vexed, apprized Lady Laura of the unexpected turn which the affair had taken, and that the earl's people of business were prepared to resist to the utmost the claims of his niece—that, in short, a suit had been unavoidably commenced, in which Mr Charles Herbert, and his wife, were the prosecutors, and the defendant, the Right Honourable Dudley Temple earl of Tarbert. Nor was this the only vexatious affair; for the same prosecutors were also compelled to become defendants, in an action to recover damages, brought by "Professor Cryppes, Mus. Doc., against his late pupil, Violet Gabrielle Hamilton, otherwise Violet Gabrielle Herbert." The parties were, in the meantime, in the height of their honeymoon bliss, travelling leisurely, as pleasure or inclination dictated, through some of the most beautiful scenery in England. Their affectionate, anxious mother was most reluctant to disturb the joy of the young pair; and, though she was at last obliged to forward letters of business to her son, Care could not long survive in the bright presence of Rapture, even had Charles been of a disposition to cherish the churlish guest.

Yet Herbert's communications with his solicitor, Mr Gryphon, gradually became direct and frequent; and so much was involved in the issue of one of the suits—for he could not speak of the prosecution of Cryppes, without ridicule and contempt—that it was not possible to banish it wholly from his thoughts. If the lawyers of the earl—for that noble person constantly disclaimed all share in the affair himself—were able to set aside the claims of Violet, the young couple, left entirely dependent on Mrs Herbert, or nearly so, might, in case of her death, be involved in serious distress, which Herbert felt it was wise and manly to look at once in the face, and to provide against;—and this was to be his first duty immediately on returning to town. Had he been aware of the apprehensions entertained by his mother, and her East India friends, for the solvency of a great house in Calcutta, in which the bulk of her fortune was placed—and which she had confided to Violet—he could better have appreciated those feelings of extreme uneasiness which his wife, as bidden by their mother, hid in her heart, though she could not believe that concealment was either well-judged or justifiable. And, now that her husband had promised to keep no painful secrets from her, she resolved to solicit Mrs Herbert to allow her to treat him with the same candour and confidence.

CHAPTER XVI.

In the meantime, Herbert having attended his wife through the long and labyrinthine passages and stairs of the Crown and Mitre,—with tenderness and gallantry which excited the lively admiration of all the peeping chamber-maids, and convinced the skipping young waiters that the "handsome couple" in No. 16, could not have been married above a week at the most,—returned to his cigar and the newspaper, to spend the permitted quarter of an hour. But several hours elapsed before he joined his sleepless and anxious partner, who, but for very shame, would long before have risen and alarmed the house, or have gone herself in search of him. It is now our purpose to account for Herbert's long absence, and that first transgression against domestic rule, to which there had been some temptation.

While Herbert smoked, mused, and scanned the London newspapers, he, at the same time, drank in the mellifluous sounds of the amateur glee-singers on the other side of the oaken pannels; and learned, from the grumbling tones of some of the party, that they were still without the effulgence of the star of the night, and the more substantial comforts of supper; which was now becoming a matter of some interest, as early dinners were the old-fashioned, frugal habit of the town.

"Fitzwagram has to wash the paint from his face, and throw off his stage-clothes. Don Felix to night—and super-admirable! though tragedy is his forte"—said Greenthwaite the chairman, anxious to preserve good humour. "But here he comes: quick—Glorious Apollo! strike up!"

It was a false, if flattering, alarm; and Greenthwaite's neighbour, Mr Sturt the ironmonger, a middle-aged citizen—a candidate for the dignity of alderman, and, of late, more of a politician than a dilettante—though he had seen the day—now growled exceedingly. He had come out rather against his will, and, moreover, had dined at one o'clock.

"Draw Fitzwagram out in the political line, Greenthwaite," said Mr Copper the young watch-maker, and vice-chairman. "The fellow, sir"—addressing Sturt—"is up to every thing, and every body, in London—man, woman, and baby. That row, and pulling of caps, between the queen"—but here the discourse mincing treason, died away into an unintelligible whisper; though Herbert was left to conclude that the other belligerent was the queen-dowager. "Fact, sir," continued Mr Copper, as the ironmonger growled unbelief. "Women, as Fitzwagram remarked at the time, are pretty much the same every where, when they get hold of each other's caps, and into a real passion—palace or fish-stall 'all one.'"

The position of Herbert, with his cigar in his mouth, and his legs tilted, Anglo-American fashion, on each side of the stove, was too luxurious to permit curiosity to get the better of laziness; so he was contented with what he could learn of palace anecdote without moving nearer. "No one must cross-question him," continued Copper, "or he bolts at once—a high, fractious chap; it must all come of his own side."

"Humph!" said the ironmonger, speaking in the natural language, or, perhaps, in that of a people in the interior of Africa, named the Sow-Sow nation. "Sits up all night, and lies a-bed all day; no one ever yet saw the face o' un on the pavement in sun-loight: a queer customer—squints like dinkins."

"A common habit of men of genius," said Greenthwaite, "to 'consume the midnight oil.' And that cast of the eyes—what effect it gives to his Shylock! Then the expression of Fitzwagram's face is so decidedly intellectual! What are mere physical advantages?"

"Ay, ay," grumbled the ironmonger drily, and measuring, with the tail of his sly eye, the sixty-five-inches length of his friend—

"Remember, sir, Garrick was a dwarf; and the husky voice and stunted figure of Kean."

"That creater had an eye in its head like a toa-ad," said the ironmonger, excited by the remembrance of his own play-going days—"There was real stuff in yon little body."

Passing whiffs of the savoury cookery, for which the Crown and Mitre was renowned, at least within its own precincts, now ascended the stairs, and whetted the impatience of the company. Mr Greenthwaite, on the principle by which a skilful manager propitiates the impatient and angry gods, called for more music; for the abbey clock struck ten, and the ironmonger, rising in wrath, threw a crown on the table, as his share of the bill, and swore he'd "be danged if he'd wait another minute for face of man." Greenthwaite and Copper interposed between him and the door, and ere the "Chough and Crow" had fairly taken wing, "Glorious Apollo" once more struck up, and loud and long-continued plaudits announced to Herbert the arrival of the illustrious guest. The bustle of the waiters, and the clanking of dishes drowned the explanations and apologies, save that Mr Fitzwagram had found London despatches at his lodgings which he was obliged to answer in course of post. "And, gentleman," he continued, in a hollow theatrical whisper, "you may look out for news!"

"By the gods of the Greeks!" ejaculated the solitary smoker, rising half laughing, "but I suspected as much! Jack's alive! Here is news for Violet and Marion!" and he advanced to the partition.

"News!" respectfully re-echoed Greenthwaite, who was now installed in the chair, Mr John Quintin Cryppe, alias Henry Adolphus Fitzwagram, on his right hand, the ironmonger on his left, and a large turkey smoking before him.—"What have we got here?" said Jack, clapping his glass to his eye, and looking round—"Turkey, goose, and bustard!" And Mr Copper the Vice, who at once apprehended the joke, was convulsed with laughter, as he explained to his neighbours who was goose and who was bustard.

"Foreign or domestic, sir," inquired the ironmonger, who had more self-assurance than the younger men, probably from his late experience of great ones in the town-council and in electioneering matters.

"Foreign and domestic," was the pithy and emphatic reply, which produced quite a sensation. However, supper was to be despatched, and Fitzwagram did ample honour to the entertainment; praised the cookery as wonderful for the provinces, and sent his compliments to Mrs Jobson and her cook. Greenthwaite was too evidently absorbed in the honourable but onerous duties which awaited him to attend to mere trencher-filling, in which the ironmonger officiated; and at length King, Queen, Duchess of Kent, Queen Adelaide, Duke of Sussex, Army, Navy, and "all the rest of the royal family," having been rapidly swallowed, Mr Greenthwaite rose, bumper in hand, to propose the toast of the night; and Mr Fitzwagram modestly veiled his face with his hand, allowing himself merely a vista, between the third and fourth finger, through which to survey the company, while the orator, on his legs—or rather see-sawing from leg to leg, like her majesty's government—with equal modesty and humility, first proclaimed "his entire and utter unfitness and unworthiness to discharge the great and important duty which had devolved upon the humble individual before that honourable company."

After several more of the same kind of deprecatory flourishes, which the ironmonger in a gruff aside called "all bam," he fairly launched out into a harangue which glanced from heaven to earth, and threw a sweep-net over the "Roman Roscius," Shakspeare, Garrick, the great Columbian lion-ueller, to whom "he of the bean-stalk" was but as a dwarf; and the "Centaur Ducrow." Mr Copper remarked, in a whisper, to the critics at the bottom of the table—the top being given up to the wealth and respectability—that this was inapt to the occasion, as Fitzwagram was devoted to the legitimate drama, and not to be classed with Ducrow and Van Amburgh. The orator, however, recovered this slip, if it was one; and having borrowed a certain work from the Town library, went through the whole bead-roll of eminent British actors, and wound up the peroration by placing Fitzwagram infinitely above them all, as, "him, gentlemen! who, to the classic purity and *statuesque dignity and grandeur of a Kemble, the fire and passion of a Kean, the massive majesty of a Macready, added the cordial hilarious brusqueness of a Sheridan Knowles!"

Thunders of applause, in which Herbert joined gaily, followed this burst of eloquence; glasses were emptied and replenished, and down sunk Mr Greenthwaite, leaning back on his chair, and wiping the perspiration from his brow, and up rose Mr Fitzwagram, murmuring, indistinct, heavy-breathed, "overpowered," "the very humble individual before them," "so impressed," "so overwhelmed by the honour just conferred upon him, by the respectable, the enlightened, the intelligent, the accomplished assembly he had the delight to see around him; the élite of an ancient city, long distinguished for critical taste and acumen in matters relating to the drama; for audiences, whose approbation was at once a sure passport to that goal of every histrionic aspirant's ambition,—the London boards!" Loud applause!—the company were almost as proud of their town as of its citizens.

"Impudent dog!" thought Herbert, who now fairly dragged forward his chair to the slit in the partition, where the map of Derbyshire afforded a full view of the room and the company,—a circle of ruddy, beaming, hilarious John-Bull faces, all turned to the eloquent Fitzwagram, which it was really, to a man of social feelings, comfortable to look upon. Herbert had placed another chair to accommodate his legs, lighted a fresh cigar, and disposed himself so as to see and listen at his ease; as the chamber-maid entered the parlour,—the identical Mrs Hannah—an over-dressed good-looking woman, with the faintest tinge of rouge giving lustre to her black eyes, many strings of coral beads incrusting her white neck, and long cork-screw ringlets, through which gleamed longer gold earrings. The lady started, or affected to start; but stood her ground while offering to withdraw, until she had explained that, fancying the parlour unoccupied, she had stolen in for a peep of the star and the company. The gallantry of Herbert could not baulk so harmless a purpose. Nor did she remain long to tax his politeness. The glance of a minute, during which Herbert closely watched the changes of her face, so far as he could see it, satisfied her and him; and, curtsying, she withdrew in some haste, as if afraid of being detected in her peeping propensities.

Many more speeches were made, and toasts drank; but Herbert was more amused by the green-room anecdotes, with which Fitzwagram crammed the chairman, and astonished the ironmonger; who sat with a face of strange perplexity, hearing of Taglioni's bust, which was not quite what it should be; and Madame Vestris' legs, which were absolute perfection; and the suspicious liaisons of Miss —, which made Mr Sturt shake his head,—and, for the sake of the morals of young Greenthwaite and Copper, beg rather for another comic song, as of better moral tendency than such perilous stuff. Fitzwagram's comic songs and comic imitations, fairly, in the ironmonger's opinion, eclipsed his tragedy—but this the younger men would not allow; yet the imitations of Charles Mathews were so good, that Herbert himself laughed aloud in his concealment, and the ironmonger was nearly choking. Most of the company had now dropped away, but a few staunch hands and choice spirits crowded the closer round the chairman and Fitzwagram; and Copper proposed "the health of Charles Mathews, Esquire, and the comic stage!" which at once called Fitzwagram to his feet to return thanks; which he did, according to the flat newspaper report, only, "in neat and pointed terms."

* So afterwards printed in the Tory county paper.

"Ah! I ought to do my best for poor Charley," said the eloquent actor, receiving the compliments of his audience, as he sat down, with a nonchalant yet gracious and patronizing air. "He is a good boy, Mathews.—Ay, many a time and oft have we together heard the chimes at midnight, since we first gave each other black eyes at Eton—ay, and at Ivy Cottage made up the quarrel over mince-pie, and the least tiny drop of champagne, that charming Mrs M— thought good for boys—ay, ay; I grow an old man."

"He was at Eton, you remark," said Greenthwaite, aside to the ironmonger, eager to catch the slenderest cue that was likely to unravel the mystery of Fitzwagram's incognito. "Capital school, Eton," continued Greenthwaite; "the first men in the country are bred there."

"Eton, did I say!—what a blabbing blockhead I do become, when set down among choice friends. No such thing, I assure you—not Eton, nor yet Harrow:—I was bred nowhere, gentlemen; I am the Wandering Jew,—the Man in the Moon,—that mystery in an Iron Mask, found in the Bastille, écad."

"In the brazen visor, Jack!" was said in a hollow voice, which seemed to proceed from a portrait of the late Lord-lieutenant that hung overhead; and which Jobson had got liberty for an itinerant artist to copy from that in the Town Hall, in part-payment of a long bill.

"Who speaks?" cried the chairman, firing at the insult offered to the distinguished guest, and rising to his feet; while Jack, alias Fitzwagram, also rose, looked round uneasily, and buttoned his coat, as if instinctively preparing to bolt, while his friends stared at each other.

"Dem'd impertinent jest,—some of those scamps of under-waiters for a trick, I fancy."

"I'll put them to death without benefit of clergy," cried Greenthwaite, seizing Fitzwagram's sword-cane,

"Bah! not worth while," said the great man, recollecting himself, and resuming his chair; and matters of greater pith and moment soon made Herbert's boyish exercise in his old and boyish acquirements in ventriloquy be forgotten. From the interior of the Palace, Fitzwagram had got into the Cabinet Council; and his mute audience, now become small and select, appeared fully to appreciate his whispered, mysterious confidences,—not made, however, until each had vowed perpetual silence.

"Fitzwag knows all those high fellows," Mr Greenthwaite was heard to remark.—As the night wore away, and familiarity increased, the draper had gradually dropped, first the ceremonious Mister; then the final syllable of the great man's surname; until, under the full pressure of two bottles, the appellation diminished to Fitzwag and Fitz. But he still appeared fully sensible of the value of the rare and sacred information confided to him,—even when it began to ooze out as the wine flowed in.

"'Pon my soul I saw the letter—addressed Burke Barker, Esq., Baker Street.—He gave me Barker's autograph,—show it you to-morrow; does all the dramatic criticism,—knows the thing and the actors so well that he does not care whether he sees the play performed or not. Has more freedom of style without:—But an awkward thing happened —"

"Why, Barker the famous editor! do you really know him, sir?" respectfully inquired the admiring Copper. "What a cutting up he gave the blues in his paper, at our last election. What a fellow that! what a pen he wields!"

"With help." Was the sententious reply of Jack, delivered in a tone which made Herbert smile; though he was now becoming anxious that the party should break up, as he wished most particularly to say two words in private to their illustrious guest, and did not wish to draw the attention of the company, or even of the sage James Winkin or his myrmidons, to the circumstance, by a formal message.

"I wish you saw some of those London whelps of the press, gentlemen," resumed Mr Cryppes, grandly. "No man is, you know, a hero to his valet."

"Fitz knows all those dons," hickuped Mr Greenthwaite, now considerably cut,—but more proud than ever of his great friend and himself.

"Familiar as my garter," responded Jack, who now lighted a cigar, and lolled back in his chair with an air of ineffable enjoyment and superiority.

"I say, Fitz, my boy," ventured the chairman, prompted by the importunity of the inordinately curious Copper, and rendered audacious by the condescension of the lion of the night, "do, pray, tell us—we are only friends here—that capital thing D'Orsay said to you about young D'Israeli, or something. It was a rum go, that."

The President of the Shakspeare Club, it was to be feared, was becoming forward and vulgar. Mr Copper frowned upon him severely, while Fitzwagram, not in the least discomposed, replied:—

"Ah, poor dear D'Orsay!—Mirabel, you mean; we say Mirabel, now. I know no D'Orsay, save the dentist. But Mirabel! the finest creature that breathes, though, alas! he ages apace:—

All that's bright must fade,
The brightest still the fleetest!

as the countess whispered to us one day in her yellow boudoir, when the count made his accost, after a whitebait dinner at Greenwich or Blackwall—I really forget where we had been,—which had somewhat deepened the incipient crow's-feet."

Copper and Greenthwaite exchanged admiring glances.

"But you shan't, Fitz, my boy, get off without that capital story," said the latter.

"It isn't fair, gentlemen, to tell tales out of school. I am mum. I shall get huffed with you, Greenthwaite, my good fellow, if you have either eye or tongue for what falls from a friend in confidence. I remember, now, it was neither at Lady B.'s—a great many Lady B.'s in the peerage, you know—nor yet at the Athenæum, Mirabel let drop that pearl of wit, but at one of the celebrated Professor Cryppes' famous musical parties, which turned the head of the town last season, and at which all nations were represented by their regular ambassadors."

"—Any thing to the family party in Newgate for running away with Stokes, the Warwickshire banker's daughter?" inquired Copper; but Fitzwagram did not hear.

"Bulwer and a few more men," he continued—But there was a cross fire from the ironmonger—"What came of that business?" he inquired; "anybody hanged for it yet?—sarve them right!"

"—Bulwer and a few more men came straight from dinner at the club; but Sir George Lees, who had been on an election committee, was obliged to go home to dress—"

"The member for Wolverton?" inquired the ironmonger.

"Ditto—he went home, as I was saying . . ."

"Which he won't long be," rudely interrupted the ironmonger. "A rat, and a fellow of bad morals."

"When was that found out, pray," asked Jack, sharply, and in a voice full of meaning,—“since he *rat*ted, as you, sir, term the thing?"

"The Stokes' connexion have resolved to oust him, for the countenance he has given to the blackguards engaged in the abduction of Miss . . . (if Juliana could have heard herself called Miss!) I had that at the first hand—from the traveller of Stokes Brothers, wire manufacturers, in this very room, where he gave a few of us a supper on his last journey. They will spend ten thousand on it, but they will have Lees out, a Stokes in, and bring the vagabond Cryppes to justice."

"You are a politician, my good sir, I perceive," said Fitzwagram, squinting arrows and death at the fair round stomach, with good roast-beef lined, of the ironmonger; at least, as Jack's oblique glance appeared to people of ordinary vision.

"No, sir, I am no politician; I am here to enjoy good fellowship and discuss the drama and the fine arts, and—hang politics—eh, Greeny?"

Mr Greenthwaite nodded and smiled entire approbation.

"Hang swindling vagabonds that would run away with a young girl, sir, against her own and her parents' will, for her cash, sir,—for her cash!" spluttered the ironmonger, who felt strongly. He had daughters himself, two of them,—one of whom, with a portion of £1500, he might have bestowed on Greenthwaite, had the dilettante draper been more steady; and he had eaten salt, if not with the Messrs Stokes, yet at their expense; he was, besides, a very honest man, barring that he was unable all at once to grant country customers the full benefit of those reduced prices of Birmingham and Sheffield wares, which filled him with horror and unfeigned alarm for the safety of the British Constitution!

Mr Cryppes, notwithstanding his philosophy, was not perfectly at ease under this unlooked for inflection. He merely took his cigar from his lips to attempt a diversion, and to repeat—"I detest politics save in the gallery of the house when a friend's motion is on; or, with the Times in my hand wet of a morning, over my café chassé. As O'Connell remarked to me one morning that Sheil and I went home with him,—after he had floored Stanley,—to partake of a noggin of smoked whisky-punch, screeching hot!"

"O'Connell, sir!" shouted the admiring ironmonger.

"Yes; I presume you have heard, in these northern parts, of such an individual?"

"Drink whisky punch with Mr O'Connell!"

"Why, ay, man; and yet the stars have not fallen on my head. What do you take me for, now?"

The ironmonger was past speech; yet in his eye there was shrewd questioning. The statement of Mr Fitzwagram might have been quite correct; and many a strange playfellow Mr O'Connell must have encountered in his long bustling day; yet our friend Jack was not perfectly easy; he, besides, hated cross-questioning; and he gave a new turn to the subject by repeating—

"Ay, whisky punch—punch of poteen—darling little name! Whisky, gentlemen and friends," and he sung jollily,

'Which came from a still,
Sung under a hill,
Where eye of guager saw it not!"

Know Dan O'Connell? Perhaps I don't know him.—Ask him."

Jack looked prodigiously knowing; and, after a pause of mingled consternation and admiration, he proceeded more quietly.

"When I was, last season, at Darrynane Abbey—where a few rollicking boys of us made a run up from Killarney—ah, Greeny, my dear fellow! I see you are slyly taking notes: well, write Darrynane—not *Derry*nane, as the Cockneys have it: a trifle, to be sure; yet such things, as Croker says, mark the difference between bipeds;—when I was last with O'Connell at his seat—by the way, Greenthwaite, would you like a letter of introduction to O'Connell, when you next run up to town for your winter fashions?—Pray, remind me of it to-morrow—”

“When you were last at Derrynane, sir?” said the now half-envious ironmonger, who saw no right that Greenthwaite, so much younger a man in years, and of lower standing in the corporation, had to get, before him, introductions to great men. He recalled the speaker to the question, “But ain’t that Croker a danged Tory? Tell us of O’Connell—Croker’s no go. . . . You would have lots of politics, of course?”

“Devil a bit of it;—hunting, like Nimrods, all the morning, and carousing all night; with interludes of the ladies, waltzing, and Irish melodies, for us young fellows. Dan and the priests generally stuck by the bottle. Rint-day was not come round; and in London and Dublin O’Connell gets a stomachful of political blarney. Besides, we differ in sentiment: Mr O’Connell is a good Catholic—all my eye!” and Jack touched not his eye, but his wry, or as he called it, Italic nose. “I am a devoted Churchman; we, therefore,—differ, but amicably.”

“You are against Repeal, I daresay?” said the ironmonger, earnestly.

“Repeal!—you shall hear. The morning I left Darrynane, O’Connell and Prince John—Bruen and I call him the Pretender—”

“Bruen?—ain’t he a Tory that fellow, sir?” said the ironmonger.

“Bruen! perhaps it was not Bruen. It might be O’Ferrall, or O’Callaghan, or Fitzmaurice, or ——. I can’t remember half their dem’d Milesian names; and when not absolutely certain, on points of fact, I am apt to be even superstitious in my scruples.”

“Nothing like it, sir. Tell truth and shame the devil. Said I right? An Englishman’s maxim.

. But where was I? O! on the road to Tralee. Emphasis on the last syllable—Tralee, Greenthwaite. The Saxons bamboozle Irish names exactly as they do Irish interests. We were at a turn of the road—‘Halt,’ cried Dan, drawing bridle opposite an old dilapidated farmhouse—‘There, Fitzwagram, my dear fellow,’ said he, addressing me, ‘there stands the humble home in which the Liberator was born; and in which my grandmother—blest be the place of her rest!—rared twenty-two childre.’ Bless his rich Munster brogue! for it flows from his lips like honey and oiled butter.”

“Hold your gab, if you please, Dick, and let the gentleman tell out his story,” cried the ironmonger, who being a politician, was now really interested.

“Nay, if I am to be interrupted?” said the speaker, drawing up stately.

“Keep a small check-string over your fancy,

Greenthwaite, my dear fellow; you are a good creature, but—green.” The ironmonger chuckled, and Jack went on:—“Daniel don’t want feeling I assure you, gentlemen. ‘Tis said he is altogether a humbug; now, I don’t think it above half; his sentimental vein is not altogether affectation. We had allowed the party to outride us; O’Connell pretending to give his favourite garron Paddy, or Padroon, or something, a breathing, that we might, ere parting, have a private chat. My notion is he wished to win me; but never mind that. ‘When I look on that humble mansion,’ said Daniel, ‘on my brave boys cantering before us, think on all that has passed, and gaze on my own lovely green land, that shall yet be—

Great, glorious, and free,
First jim of the earth,
And first isle of the say!”

“Ay, ay! that’s him, sure enough!” cried the excited ironmonger, his eyes radiantly twinkling. “You may know O’Connell any where by that rhyme;” and Jack continued—“‘When I look out on those sparkling waves,’ said Dan, ‘yet to bear to our ports the rich commerce of every land; and on the shamrock-clad turf of my own Emerald valleys’—Soh, ho! King Dan,” interrupted I, “you old dog, you would have Ireland all your own then!”

“‘Cod, O’Connell must have been ‘nation mad,’” said the ironmonger, hitching on his chair, leaning his arms on the table, and, on them, the broad, beaming face turned admiringly to the speaker.

“Not a bit of it, sir,” continued Jack, coolly; “instead of flying into a passion, he began solemnly to protest—‘No, Fitzwagram! let me but see my lovely and beloved country free.’ . . . Sheer humbug! O’Connell ought to have known I was not quite so innocent. I stopped short at once, reined in my animal, and said, with some firmness—for, hang it, I was in earnest,—‘Mr O’Connell, you are an old man; and I am, though young in years, not quite a greenhorn. Know, then, sir, that in this Repeal humbug I cannot countenance you!’”

And Mr Henry Adolphus Fitzwagram knitted his brows, looked fierce, and slapped the table, till all the decanters and glass chimed in chorus with the truly British sentiment.

“To his beard!” and the questioner looked up with an expression of face half-comic, half-sheepish, but so exquisitely ludicrous and John-Bullish, or gullish, while he said—“May I believe you, sir?” that Herbert involuntarily smiled.

Jack answered the singularly simple question by an awful frown; and the enthusiastic Greenthwaite, fancying his friend insulted, took up the subject.

“Believe! yes, sir, you may believe!” He seized his empty glass. “It is thus one man of great soul dares to speak to another . . . Waiter! Jem Winkin! a bottle of claret, and cha—arge it to me.”

Thus encouraged, the imaginative Cryppes crowded sail, and told lie upon lie, "thick as the leaves in Vallombrosa." It became tiresome at last.

"The scapegrace will waste the whole night: not another ten minutes shall I dally here, if he should hang for it," thought Herbert; and, fortunately, the call for more wine raised the ironmonger, who was a staid family-man, and already much too far beyond good "shop hours." Cryppes seized him by the button.

"You must hear how Dan and I parted. . . . I took a firmer tone: 'There must be truce with the angry boy, O'Connell,' I said. 'Stanley, to be sure, is a sour crab, but a fellow with both pluck and bottom; ay, and of a good old stock, too. I like him!'—Now, what do you suppose, gentlemen, Dan answered?"

But no gentleman durst hazard even a guess of the reply which such audacity must have drawn forth from the insulted "Liberator;" though the ironmonger, coming to his wits, as he surveyed the "queer customer" before him, fancied it might have been kicking; and the simple and half tipsy Greenthwaite, gazed intently on those compressed lips, which alone could reveal the mystery, and fancied he had never before seen Fitzwagram so great; not even in Iago, in which he had backed him against the old favourite of the northern public, Mr Belville, and the entire county palatine.

A long pause followed, ere Fitzwagram, with a total change of expression, breathed, in a hollow sepulchral whisper, "Why, demn the word, as I am a gentleman!" and Herbert, from his lounge, burst into loud, uncontrollable laughter at the irresistible goose-looks of the astonished surrounding group. Fitzwagram, hearing the sound of laughter, started to his feet, suspecting some peeping, smiggering waiter, behind the sliding doors, and flourishing his sword-cane, exclaiming "A rat! a rat behind the arras! Dead for a ducat!"—he pushed aside the boards, and Herbert was scenically revealed, stretched on his substitute for a chaise longue. Mr Greenthwaite began to bluster; but Jack himself seemed quite taken aback; till Herbert, without moving a limb, coolly said, "When your friends are gone I have a word for you, sir,—nay, you don't stir from this;" for Jack moved away, then halted, and changed colour. It was but for an instant. Jack Cryppes, the intrepid, the undaunted, whose distinguishing quality, like that which Hazlitt attributes to his fat namesake, was in all circumstances, "a masterly self-possession," made a speech which told on both sides of the house:—"Mr Charles Herbert—an old chum," he whispered, drawing Greenthwaite aside, "Knows all my family,—intimately;—leave us, pray."

"I feared so," replied the sympathizing, yet curious Greenthwaite, "the grand-looking fellow I saw arrive with a lady to-night. Will he peach?—give you up to your friends? What can we do for you, my dear Mr Fitzwagram?"

"Nothing, nothing my dear fellow,—yet stay; keep out these dem'd police, or Mayor's beaks, if Herbert has informed on me. . . . Perhaps Jem Winkin might let me off by the back way

"I'll make him!" responded the loyal and enthusiastic Greenthwaite, going off.

"Cautious my dear friend. . . . I think you collected the bill just now. I fear I have forgot my purse in changing my stage clothes—a small douceur to Jem might be useful. Oh! a thousand thanks—just five pieces—not a stiver more; and be sure you put me in mind of them to-morrow. By the way, will you and Copper dine with me?" Jack bore a conscience; or rather he was on honour; for he might, at that moment, have had the whole twenty pounds collected to pay the Shakespearean supper.

Meanwhile the ironmonger also had learned, or partly guessed, how matters stood with the unfortunate gentleman. His yeoman blood rose, and though he could not approve of a young man's deserting his home, his duties, and his estates, to go about with vagrant players, no one, he swore, should be allowed to lay a hand on Fitzwagram against Fitzwagram's will. He would go to the Mayor—he was almost an alderman himself. He could put in bail—he could issue out a writ of Habeas Corpus;—no d—d aristocrat should seize O'Connell's friend, Fitzwagram, and force him to be a nobleman, or man of estate, against his inclination.

Mr Fitzwagram was highly gratified by these assurances; but he was not afraid. He had been playing truant, he confessed, but he would be forgiven; and his new friends at last agreed, on his entreaty, to leave him; but resolved to take a glass of beer in another room, and be at hand,—Copper, who was a boxer, swearing that no officer of the law should enter the Crown and Mitre that night save over his body! Our two old acquaintances were thus left alone, the sole occupants of that large and now opened dining-room.

"A glass of wine, Mr Herbert?" asked Jack, in a rather uncomfortable tone, and helping himself to Greenthwaite's untouched claret.

"I have taken my wine," replied Herbert coldly.

"Done the Cumbrian flats!" Jack whispered, putting on his most insinuating comic leer—his John-Wilkes' face; but Herbert, who had often admired that roguish leer, gave this time no token of approbation.

"I take it for granted, Mr Cripps—"

"Gad-a-mercy, my dear sir, no surnames in public rooms, I beseech you."

"I take it for granted, sir, that you are really going off to America, and by the Liverpool night-coach. It will be up within the hour."

"Perhaps you think I had better?" said Jack, anxiously, looking on an enemy, as he now feared. "I rather think I shall—. . . . Heavens and earth, Mr Herbert, what can a poor sinner in my place do? Had my father bred me a draper, like that little pert Greenthwaite, or got me into holy orders—"

A slight smile, in spite of himself, wreathed Herbert's lip at so preposterous an idea; and on such faint encouragement Jack proceeded—

"If you could only figure the degradation and actual misery I have endured since I have been exiled from London—cut off from my resources, banished from my friends. . . . There is some fatal disorganization in British society, Mr Herbert:—the false position into which men of talents and acquirements, formed to be the ornaments of society, are too often forced by untoward circumstances: the false medium, sir, which interposes between genius and its rewards— . . . ”

“No nonsense, Cripps.—What cant is this you have been learning on your travels?—What has this philosophy to do with the villainous, unmanly scheme in which I found you engaged in Kent? By heaven, I can scarce forgive myself for conniving at your escape once already!”

“Do you really think so, Mr Herbert? . . . Now, do you know that frolic never struck me in this light before. . . . I would rather have married the little girl myself, than have had such a racket about it—though, after the splendid creatures you have seen, and I have adored . . . ”

“One of them in this house, I suspect,” interrupted Herbert. “No fooling, Mr Cripps; believe me, your affairs don’t admit of it—even if I had a taste for nonsense. There is a woman here whose presence bodes you no good. Do you remember the beautiful waiter-girl in ———’s chop-house, whom you admired some five years since?”

“Hannah White! You don’t say so?—then, by Jove, I am sold! But I did not ruin that girl—upon my soul, no, Herbert—Mr Herbert;—and I offered to get her an engagement at the Surrey. But she was always a mercenary creature—would take no advice,—would go to service.”

“I am not curious,” said Herbert, drily; “that woman has seen and recognised you, as I did her.”

“Cursed ungrateful jade! but what need I say? my own sister has deserted me. The Barkers, sir, have conspired to keep me from London,—a brother’s poverty is a stain on their rank and fashion. Polly will not even answer my letters; but by —,” and Mr Cripps looked horribly malignant as he vowed destruction to his iron-hearted sister. “If you could but guess what I have endured, Mr Herbert. Yon solemn or conceited asses here to-night,—they are absolutely men of refinement, compared with the coarse, brutal, bacon-bolters I have encountered,—rich knaves, who have wives and families, go regularly to meeting, and have their beef and pudding every day, while a man of talents and education— . . . I have, to be sure, seen something of life,—the social antipodes of the world, I may say.—But this cursed woman—what do you advise, Mr Herbert?”

“Why, unless you wish to see the world also at its geographical antipodes, Jack, you will be off without delay. There is my cloak and cap,—the window is not high,—drop from it when you hear the horn, and climb the night-coach. I wish to give you one more chance for repentance and amendment of life.”

Jack was somewhat touched. His voice softened, his eyes moistened, as he watched Herbert counting out ten sovereigns, neat ten—for Herbert no longer told his gold by handfuls—and he said, “Its dem’d hard for a man to amend his life upon an empty pocket, Mr Herbert. I am not justifying all my youthful follies; and in this lark,—this affair in Kent, that she-devil, my sister Polly,—fancy her refusing me a guinea in my utmost need, and her, as I see by the Satirist, dashing away at Epsom in ermine and jewels, like a duchess, with that blackguard Lees. She has behaved like a fiend to the fondest of fathers, and the most affectionate of brothers;—let Barker look to it: she may next play him a trick.”

“Nor am I—but that woman—all those dem’d women—this unsettled life, it has changed my milk to gall!”

“Vastly fine, Jack! but to business,—that woman will give you up to-morrow to the authorities, as sure as she rises:—there is the pecuniary temptation,—and there is revenge.”

“Save for the fear of betraying herself,” said Cripps, who in his own mind had already run over the charges for and against him, and he continued, “But she will be ready to damn herself to ruin me, and get that wretched fifty pounds . . . I must off—Thanks for the loan of the cloak. Oh! really I am ashamed, Mr Herbert. Ten pieces; and I believe there was some trifle between us before. The horn! hist,—softly with the window. God bless you, Herbert! you are a noble, generous fellow, and will die a secretary of state,—I say it. I shall get up slyly behind, and look like a regular trader—. Good by; my respectful compliments to your lady. Ah, you are a happy fellow, Herbert! Do, when you go to town, drop in and let the poor old governor and my mother know something of their scapegrace. Let them try, above all, to get me back to London. I shall die out of London.”

Jack’s escape, owing to his own coolness, was managed with great ease: wrapped in Herbert’s cloak, and with Herbert’s travelling-cap pulled over his brows, he dropped from the window into the street, climbed the coach unseen, and was gone!

Herbert cautiously shut the window, lighted his chamber-light, and first bethought himself of what “his lady” must be thinking of his absence. “But I will carry her Jack’s compliments;” was his thought, as, with a lightened heart, he ascended the stairs,—Jem Winkin rushing before him with a candle.

BY A TEMPLAR.

"THERE is nothing," says a venerable joke, hereditary in many families, "so like a cat looking out at a window as a cat looking in." He must have been but a skin-deep observer who first invented this smart saying. No one thing in the world differs so much from another as looking out and looking in. Any judge of feline physiognomies, who would take the trouble to observe, instead of merely repeating the remarks of others, could not fail to notice a marked difference between the expression of countenance in a cat looking out of a window and a cat looking in. Suppose for a moment that it is a larder window. The cat looking in sees a chop, or a dish of cream, or a fish; no sensible cat would look out until she had tasted the dainties.

It is a benevolent dispensation of nature that we are allowed, in most cases, opportunities both of looking in and looking out of the window. We are at first on the outside, and are tempted with the appearance of the inside; and then, on getting in, we have an opportunity of looking out. Looking in occasions a restless dissatisfied feeling which yet has something pleasing in it; looking out is accompanied by a full-fed, tranquil sort of sentiment—a satisfactory feeling that we have got what we wanted, blended with a sort of melancholy conviction that we have nothing more to look forward to; which gives a philosophical dash to our appearance.

We are all either looking in or looking out. The lover looks in, and the husband looks out. The private individual who dabbles in politics looks in, and the member of parliament, or political agent, looks out. The young haunter of the theatre looks in, and the actor looks out. The middy looks in, and the yellow admiral looks out. How different are the in-lookers and the out-lookers! How different do the same things appear to them! In the one predominates an idealess anticipation of fine emotions, which must be vastly delightful, but of which he can form no conception. The other is of the "knowing ones:" he has a proud consciousness that he knows this, and can do that. When we look in, we are as in a dream; when we look out, we are—wide awake.

After all, it is a dangerous experiment getting in—although it cannot be avoided. If we do not make the attempt, we are nevertheless sucked in by the metaphysical whirlpool which we call life; and the first peep behind the scenes of the world is as repulsive as the first peep at the canvass and pasteboard reverse of the scenes on the stage. The other side looked much finer. We wish ourselves back again; but, like Sterne's starling, we "can't get out." There is nothing for it but bustling about and drowning thought with action. We are awakened to the great truth, that activity is happiness, and that wherever we are we must make our own comfort.

The difference between the raptures of the lover and the calm certainty of married bliss, is not greater than that which exists between the feelings of the young dabbler in politics and the old habitué. We do not speak of the difference between the partisan, or follower in the cry, and the statesman, or leader of the pack. They differ in kind; the one is very rarely, if ever, transformed into the other. Our talk is of him who is beginning his career, as all begin it, by shouting and hissing at appropriate times; and of him who, after passing through the various grades of—keeping the door of a sanctum, keeping watch over the sheets of a petition exposed for signature, canvassing a district, having his name put pro forma on a large committee, being drafted into a select committee,—may be considered as having served his time, both as apprentice and journeyman, and commenced a full-blown,—it may be, a trading politician.

It is a strange trade that of politician, and yet with many it is undoubtedly a trade. How they manage to subsist by it; in what scrambling, skeldering way they contrive to pick up a livelihood by it, after many years' patient observation, still baffles, we confess, our comprehension. Providence, we are told, feedeth the young ravens, and we suppose Providence, in like manner, cares for these jackdaws: for jackdaws in human form the far greater proportion of them are. They have, in general, no regular employment. A commissioner-ship, or sub-commissionership, drops now and then into the mouth of one of them, or a county-canvass affords a parliamentary agency, or something or another turns up just as the last guinea earned by the last job is melting. They must preserve, like Daddy Ratton, a "kind of a conscience," or at least the external appearance of one: otherwise, they could not be trusted, and their occupation would be gone. Nay, to do them justice, most of them do retain a spark of the enthusiasm of their youth,—for men are drawn in to be trading politicians, as men are drawn in to be players, by a sort of misdirected poetical feeling,—amid all the callousness superinduced upon their souls by the tear and wear of their avocation. They are a sort of "honest rogues." They would indulge in the luxury of a conscience, if they could afford it. There is a perpetual struggle going on in their inner man between the jobber and the gentleman. The internal perturbation is revealed in the appearance of the outer man: a sort of sheepish bashful look contends with an affectation of easy self-possession. A trading-politician is rarely seen in perfect repose, although it is his cue to affect it; you see he is not propped up by the entire complacency which wealth or rank alone can give. And yet, equivocal in appearance as they are, and living in a manner from hand to mouth, your trading politicians have their claim to belong to the class of gentlefolks recognised. Nay, on the strength of their precarious means, they have even been known to marry and beget children.

Tho' constantly on poorth's brink,
They're sae accustom'd wi' the sight,
The view o't gies them little fright.

And buirdly chieft, and clever hizzies
Are bred in sic a way as this is.

Few of the numerous clubs in the metropolis are without one or more members of this class, and the political clubs swarm with them. Indeed the invention of club-houses has been a great blessing to the bachelor portion of them : raising them from the rank of led-captains, or mere tavern or green-room haunters, to something like that of independent gentlemen. There they have always luxurious apartments, which are their day-home—books, writing implements, and newspapers—for their annual subscription. Nobody need know where they sleep. The club-house is the best address they can put on their cards. As rests, they must wear respectable apparel, and they may take a meal at the club whenever they can raise sufficient cash. They are thus not so entirely dependent upon their party or political patron as they used to be, and can make better terms for themselves : we do not merely mean, exact better pay—they can insist upon being treated better than mere menials.

The trade of politics, like most unincorporated trades, or what, to borrow a term from Burns, may be called "out-lying" trades, has no regular training or apprenticeship. Each man takes it up at his own hand. It is indeed, like the stage, a profession to which many betake themselves, less because they have a peculiar talent for it, than because they have failed of success in some other, or others, that they have tried. In the provinces, after a man has been six times bankrupt, or a dozen times rejected when candidate for the office of parish schoolmaster, or when he is found incapable of settling steadily to his loom, he is generally set up as editor of a newspaper. In the metropolis, a large proportion of these and analogous classes, —briefless barristers, young Oxonians and Cantabs bred to no profession, medical men to whom no sane patient would intrust himself, attorneys endowed with a redundant appetite for sociality, and the like, turn trading-politicians.

A steady club-goer has ample opportunities of studying various individuals of this species. Other members are regular in their movements,—have their stated periods at which, like the planets, they reappear. The banker, who inhabits the West End, visits his club on his way home from the city, after business hours ; and during session the Member of Parliament looks in about the same hour, on his way to the House. The bachelor-annuitant is sure to be found of a winter evening in his wonted seat at the chimney-corner, with his little table and candle, his book, magazine, or newspaper. The provincial member, when in town, must be sought at meal-times. The married members, if found there at all in the evening, must be sought in the card-room, or among the young devil-may-cares in the smoking-room. To meet any of these classes, we must keep their times. But the trading politician is Looking in and Looking out times innumerable in a day. Now it is to write a letter, now it is to keep an appointment, now it is simply to see who is about. Go at what hour you please, you are sure to see one or two ; though it would be impossible to predict, before hand, the precise individuals. Most like are they to meteors, in their unanticipated approach, their rapid transit, their fussy zig-zag motion. As it draws on to the hour of post, a number of them may be generally found congregated in the writing-room dashing off voluminous despatches,—a flock, we would have said, but the term is inapplicable,—they are rarely gregarious. They recognise each other by instinct, and form a bowing "how-d'ye" acquaintance, seldom an intimacy. It is rare to see them hunt permanently in couples.

The tribe is divided into two great families,—the flash men and the men of business. The former have in general been originally young men of some pretensions to personal appearance, with a knack for making a pretty speech, or turning a smart lampoon, who, in the excitement of some election or popular movement, have been absorbed into the vortex of politics. The latter have most frequently been lawyers who, owing to dulness of parts or want of steady application, have failed in attracting clients, and thus have been fain to take up with those precarious political jobs, for which their well-employed brethren had no leisure. The former are accustomed to deny their calling, to affect being above their business. The latter are ostentatiously secret, and ploddingly regular even in their idleness.

There is, for a specimen of the first class, Mortimer. He has had a university education, and professes to be eating his terms at one of the Inns of Court. He dabbles in the newspapers ; that is, he writes for several provincial journals, sometimes gets a chance cast of employment from a London paper, and has been even known to get a contribution accepted by a magazine. It is difficult, from his conversation, to learn whether he is paid for his literary exertions or not ; he seems divided between a vanity which prompts him to brag of how much he can make by his pen, and a vanity which prompts him to pretend that he only writes for his own amusement. He affects the elegant scholar and profound thinker ; is deep in political economy and the science of human nature ; half courts, half patronises eminent merchants and manufacturers, as sources of information or political engines ; publishes pamphlets, and looks out for commissionerships. He is divided between his boyish ambition of teaching and leading the world, and his necessities, which make him a political tool. He is too poor and too idle to live without occasional jobs, and too vain to be faithful even to his employers. He is a specimen of political high life below stairs ; a valet who has a soul above brushing coats, and dreams of a seat in the carriage. He flatters himself that he is only in a state of probation ; that the day will come when, from the grub-state of a political tool, he will emerge into the butterfly existence of a parliamentary speaker. He flatters himself that he impresses others with his own ideas of his talents. He will one day make an attempt to set up for himself, fail, and subside into a grumbling drudge. He is one whom heaven hath cursed with just enough of want of principle and cleverness to be able to give himself check-mate.

Cob is quite a different sort of a man. He learned the routine of business in an attorney's office. Nature has given him enough of imitative propensity to acquire the forms of law, but not enough of reason to know when to apply them. Yet he has that commonplace solemnity of word and look, and that steady periodicity in his daily occupations, which pass muster in the eyes of many for business talent. He has a ponderous look about him, so adverse to every notion of levity, as to pass muster for solidity of parts. He is beautifully unscrupulous: he will do or say any thing. If wanted to make one in a quadrille, he will walk through it with the dogged resoluteness of a thief marching to the gallows; if asked (by any one from whom he has expectations) to perform the most menial office, he undertakes the task promptly and without wincing. He is a regular newspaper hack, less for the direct emolument, (though at the end of each week he duly tenders his account and pockets his earnings,) than for the opportunity it gives him of spreading the reports his employers wish to have believed. He will not only say any thing they wish him to say; he will father the lie when exposed, and bear the brunt of public execration with the tranquillity of a martyr. He has also a great reputation for holding his tongue. These qualifications have got him the run of the government offices, and that reputation gets him the patronage of editors. He pockets money with both hands. The publisher pays him for procuring the stories which he is rewarded by their authors for promulgating. He knows where his talent lies, and is contented with the sphere of action for which nature formed him.

Cob and Mortimer, however, are mere beginners in political trading. The old experienced adepts—that is, the more successful—are of a higher order of tacticians—of a wider experience. But their portraiture must be the task of another day.

MIDDLE TEMPLE, December.

LITERARY REGISTER.

The City of the Magyar. 3 vols., with Plates.
London: Virtue.

SUCH is the title which Miss Pardoe, who appears fond of out-of-the-way names for her books, has assumed for her late travels in Hungary, and the account of her residence in its capital. She does not dally on the road: in the first paragraph we are whisked to Vienna, and set down in Presburg during the sitting of the Diet, when all the political aristocracy of Hungary were assembled in that city. Miss Pardoe, though not an inexperienced traveller, seems at this time to have been accompanied by her mother and other friends. On the very day of their arrival, they accepted the invitation of some of the Magnates, to whom they had letters of introduction; and the first thing with which they were struck was "the extreme beauty of the women." The most beautiful women seen in the circles of Vienna are Hungarians. The Jewesses of Hungary are also remarkable for their beauty. Some of their social usages are as worthy of admiration as their beauty, at least, in a country where conscientious mothers may be heard to complain—"We cannot find leisure to attend to our children for idle morning visitors."

The social arrangements of the Hungarian fashionables, like those of the Viennese, appear to me to be the most rational in the world. No morning visits, by which the idle and the désœuvré contrive with us to fritter away the time of their more busy friends, are countenanced among them. No lady receives company before the dinner-hour, which is usually two, or at the latest, three o'clock; and better still, the hostess is punctual, the repast is served at the given moment, and at five the guests are at liberty to take their departure, in order to fulfil their evening engagements, leaving the lady of the house to enjoy the same privilege. Then commences the gaiety of an Hungarian day; visits are paid, new engagements are entered into, the promenades are crowded, and the streets are alive with equipages hatening to the public gardens, the theatres, or the salons de reception.

Two o'clock appears an early hour to receive dinner visitors, where people have any thing better to do; but the Hungarians are very early risers.

Miss Pardoe appears to have bestowed the utmost pains in seeing and hearing, reading, and gathering information, through every possible channel. She had good introductions, was hospitably received, and went everywhere, where a single mite could be added to the sum of her knowledge of the country, and, by consequence, a useful page to her book. She visited churches, convents, theatres, picture-galleries, promenades, prisons, public institutions, the courts of justice, and whatever promised any advantage to the traveller. By these means, she has drawn together a vast amount of agreeable, and, so far as the surface of Hungarian society is concerned, useful information, untainted by prejudice, or by party spirit, which she earnestly disclaims.

Of a country where every thing, beyond our own hearths, is accomplished through the agency of money, and nothing by personal service, love, sympathy, and the divine charity which they inspire, the English, nevertheless, like to indulge the warmer feelings of humanity, in contemplating the gentle and pious ministrations of the Be-guines and Sisters of Charity. From a visit to the convent of the Brothers of Mercy, where there were sixty beds for patients, Miss Pardoe repaired to the convent of the Hospital Sisters.

There was no affectation of concealment on the part of the three nuns who came forward to welcome us. They greeted the gentlemen by whom we were accompanied with calm politeness, and led the way along their exquisitely-kept corridors, with a self-possessed and quiet demeanour, more effective against impertinence than a thousand veils.

Nothing could be more perfect than the order of every thing around us ; and we felt no disposition to smile even at the waxed saints or tinselled virgins which crowded the thickly-set altars.

The ward contained thirty beds, the whole of which were tenanted ; and there was an air of at-home-ness in the arrangements, despite the wan and melancholy looks of the patients, which would at once have proved that the hand of woman had been there, even had not half-a-dozen of the sisters been moving among the sick like ministering angels. I looked at them all attentively, and I could not detect the slightest expression of sourness or irritation on their countenance ; and their whispers were so soft and low as they bent over the uneasy couches of the sufferers, that it was impossible to doubt that theirs was really the service of sympathy.

I have always loved the Beguines in every Catholic country through which I have passed ; and the Hungarian sisters did much to deepen the feeling. The very appearance of these nuns was enough to inspire respect. They were so neatly attired ; the profusion of linen which relieved their heavy dresses of serge was so pure, and smooth, and spotless ; their manner was so gentle, their courtesy so spontaneous, and their smile so meek ; while there was, moreover, such an honest pride in their mode of explaining to us all their humane and beautiful expedients for solacing the sick, that it was difficult to believe that they had mistaken the true path of worldly usefulness ; and that they would have conduced more to the good of their species by mingling in the toil and cares of domestic life.

The aspect of the hamlets and villages of Hungary augurs well for the condition of the people, if Miss Pardoe's observation, on her journey from the capital to Trenschin, be of universal application. There are, she says,

Few countries in which the hamlets are so cheerful in appearance as those of Hungary : the houses are externally of the most scrupulous cleanliness ; the whitewash is continually renewed, and the window-frames are generally painted in bright green. The doors are set deeply into the walls, in order to throw off the rain, which in these mountain-districts pours down like an avalanche ; and the receding arches being neatly formed, give a quaint and comfortable look to the dwelling. A peep into the interior is equally promising ; the white or chintz curtains at the windows, the coverings of the beds, and the cooking utensils are all bright and cleanly looking ; but I never ventured on a closer examination, having received a hint of caution not to be disregarded, in seeing the maternal or fraternal care with which members of the same family, seated on the sunny side of their cottages, relieved each other after the Spanish fashion, of certain uncomfortable colonists.

Miss Pardoe gives a full and very interesting account of the Hungarian Diet. She was in Presburg during the sitting of the chambers, into which, at least into the lower chamber, as in France and America—we had almost said wherever representative government prevails, save in England—women are admitted, and decorum in manners and dress is preserved. The galleries were crowded with ladies, some of them the wives and daughters of the first nobility. Theoretically, the political institutions of Hungary are free, though their efficiency is counteracted by a variety of causes. The Hungarians enjoy one privilege which our Radical constituencies will envy : the deputies, or representatives of the counties, must vote as their constituents direct, though it should be against their own judgment. In Hungary, the higher and richer nobility are generally found enrolled in the Opposition or Liberal party ; the Tory Members of the Diet, the unpatriotic Hungarians, being generally found, as might be expected, among the placemen of Vienna and the officers of the emperor's household. Miss Pardoe gives as minute an account of the leading Members of the Diet, as Miss Martineau did of the Members of Congress at Washington ; but, unfortunately, British readers know and care much less about them, than they, it seems, do about England and English politics.

The Prince Palatine, the Archduke John of Austria, uncle of the emperor, is the perpetual President of the Diet, and, according to Miss Pardoe, the highly popular Viceroy of Hungary. Miss Pardoe was honoured, by a special command, to wait upon his Imperial Highness ; and, during the interview or audience, he spoke of "Travellers' Tales," and cautioned her against rashness and prejudice in judging of a country whose transition state had been unfairly represented through hasty and prejudging observation. She has profited by these hints ; and there is no bounds to her admiration of the venerable German Prince, the Father of Hungary, who graciously gave them.

Miss Pardoe describes individually the more considerable cities of Hungary, and gives rather a liberal allowance of letterpress to the inundation at Pesth and the criminals in the jails,—considering that we have as abundant and rare specimens of the latter at home as need be desired, if there were any one to visit the jails and tell us of them. Players and singers, too, are pretty much the same everywhere, so that slight notice might suffice ; but the gipsies, in a country considered native to them, and the beggar or rascal nobility, are novel and appropriate features. Among the privileges of the fruitful lower branch of Hungarian aristocracy, is the right of passing tolls free. One day, in passing over the bridge of boats which connects Pesth and Buda, Miss Pardoe saw a ragged lad asserting his right to the toll-keeper, as the scion of nobility, to pass free ; while the latter pointed to the heelless stockings and ragged jerkin of the young Graf. Instead of replying, the young noble, with an air of dignity, ordered the toll-keeper to take his hand from his collar, and not stand longer between the wind and his nobility. The functionary now looked grave and doubtful, as if he had presumed too far ; and the young noble was recognised by a peasant passing, who, while he paid his kreutzer, saluted the young Graf. "It was really broad farce," says Miss Pardoe, "to see the respectably-clad, comfortable-looking toll-keeper offering those apologies to the offended noble, who, at length, graciously raised his tattered cap, in token of magnanimous forgiveness." Like our own nobility, those of Hungary are exempted from imprisonment for debt ; and, accordingly, the Jews are careful never to take the personal security of a magnate. Christians should be equally prudent, especially in countries where "all men are equal in the eye of the law." In Hungary there is no disguise. The peasantry are styled the "wretched tax-paying multitude," and there is no talk of equality before the law. This is honest.

Funerals are oddly managed in Pesth. Crowds of females attend in full dress, of the gayest colours. A funeral is a party of pleasure.

Miss Pardoe gives a wonderfully clear and an ample account of the condition of the peasantry, social and political ; and of the agriculture, commerce, and internal resources of Hungary. For information on these topics, she acknowledges, in the preface, her obligations "to several distinguished individuals," whom she is not permitted to name. We regret that she has not followed the archduke's advice, and visited the castles of the rural nobility, and told us of their domestic life ; which would have been of more value than the catalogue of the semi-barbarous Esterhazy treasures ; yet, taken as a whole, her work is entitled to great praise ; and as it cannot be accounted invidious to compare an author with herself, we may frankly say that we consider this, by many degrees, the best book which its author has yet produced.

NEW ANNUALS.

The Juvenile Annual.

If stories must be written to illustrate prints, instead of the good old practice of prints being designed and engraved to illustrate stories, the publishers of the new-fashioned and very pretty gift-books ought, at least, to consult, and give some scope to the taste and judgment of the literary artists, in their selections. But whatever pictures may be laid before Mrs Ellis, the editor of "The Juvenile Annual," she announces her determination to render the work for which she is responsible, "as much an historical work as the plates will admit;" and also, that it shall be of enduring usefulness ; not a mere toy of the year, but fitted for a place in the "Juvenile Library." She, moreover, confesses, that had circumstances admitted, she would often rather have talked of the shepherds and flocks of Bearn, among whom she has been sojourning, than have described feudal castles. In the meanwhile, The Annual gives a pleasing variety of prose and verse, which, we have a notion, the juveniles will relish quite as much as the history with which they are threatened, and of which they have here some striking specimens, interwoven with the descriptions of An Old English Hall, Lochleren Castle, and Mount St Michael.

The Drawing-Room Scrap-Book.

Mrs Howitt may now, in her second year, be presumed to have fairly entered upon her duties as the literary successor of Miss Landon. Most unlike, these ladies, whether in the original structure of their genius, or in their course of mental culture and discipline, yet each fulfils her function : the one, the lofty and brilliant charmer ; the other, the delightful companion and affectionate instructor.

No one can furnish a more rich and varied pictorial banquet than the publishers of this Annual ; and to their pictures, it is the business of Mrs Howitt to attach verses. If we do not always find her so much at home as in past days, while amid the sweet and simple domestic scenes, and heart-suggested themes of her spontaneous choice, her genius yet finds scope in this less congenial walk ; and if she shall add but little to her modest fame by this new work, she must yet contribute largely to the enjoyment of her readers.

Because the Scotch are, as Mrs Howitt remarks, "very national ;" and also because the lines connected with a good engraving of Lawrence's unsatisfactory portrait of Lord Brougham are among the finest in the collection—albeit they never once mention his Lordship's name while celebrating his country,—we shall copy them out as a not unfavourable specimen of "THE DRAWING-ROOM SCRAP-BOOK for 1841."

Oh, mountain-crested Sootland !
I marvel not thou art
Dear, as a gracious mother,
Unto her children's heart !
I marvel not they love thee,
Thou land of rock and glen,
Of strath, and lake, and mountain,
And more—of gifted men.

Oh, wild-traditioned Scotland !

Thy briery burns and braes
Are full of pleasant memories,
And tales of other days !
Thy story-haunted waters
In music gush along.
Thy mountain-glens are tragedies,
Thy heathy hills are song !

"The dowie dens of Yarrow,"
"The Annan-water wan,"
"The deep mill-dams o' Binnorie,"
Where sailed "the milk-white swan ;"
The lovers' bloody meeting
On "Fair Kirkconnel lea :"
We sing them to the slumbering child
We cradle on our knee !

Land of the Bruce and Wallace,
Where fiery hearts have stood,
And, for their country and their faith,
Like water poured their blood ;
Where wives and little children
Were steadfast to the death,
And graves of martyr-warriors
Are in the desert heath.

Land of the social virtues—
Where the tiller of the sod
Saith to his lowly household,
"Come, let us worship God."
Where the lowly shepherd readeth
His book within the glen,
And the poorest dwellers of the hills
Respect themselves as men.

Oh, mind-ennobled Scotland !
I marvel not thou art
Dear, as a gracious mother
Unto her children's heart !
I marvel not that all the world
To thee admiring turns :
Thou gavest birth to Walter Scott,
And unto Robert Burns.

Oh, land of moor and mountain !
Of barren wastes of stone,
Of treeless straths and trackless wilds,
I love thee as mine own !
I love thy mournful mosses,
Where sounds the plover's wail ;
And the savage mountains girdle round
The dwellings of the Gael !

I love the gray mist hovering
O'er rocky isle and shore ;
I love the castle gray and stern,
The strength of days of yore.
Thank God, we are one people,
With but one heart and aim !
For my bosom hath a warmer pulse
To hear Old Scotland's name !

To a beautiful little vignette, Auld Robin Gray, Mrs Howitt has written some tender, critical, or commendatory remarks ; and to a splendid beauty, whose portrait forms the frontispiece to the work, and whom she has christened Katherine Airie, verses of a somewhat ambitious cast. In The Bridal Eve, she has caught no mean portion of the spirit and melody of her lamented predecessor :—

She'll be a Bride to-morrow !
The village is astir ;
Old dames, and men, and maidens,
They talk of nought but her.
They look upon the sunshine,
And speak the morrow fine ;
For the bride shall have good luck, they say,
On whom the sun doth shine :

And the laughing, brawny ringers,
Are drinking to the peal
With which, upon the morrow,
The old church-tower shall reel,
In honour of the bridal !

She'll be a bride to-morrow !—
The guests are thronging in ;
And the grave, punctilious father
Is busied 'mong his kin.
With a brave old English welcome,
He maketh them right glad,
As if than of these kinsfolks
No other thought he had.
But he thinketh on the dowry,
All counted out in gold ;
And he thinketh on the bridegroom's lands—
Those manors rich and old,
Which dignify the bridal.

She'll be a bride to-morrow !—
Like Christmas flowers in bloom,
The stiff, brocaded, maiden aunts,
Sit in some inner room ;
And the portly mother, sweet accord
Of grace to all doth show ;
And, like one greatly satisfied,
She moveth too and fro :
White roses, bridal favours,
She knoweth where they be ;
And cake-piled silver baskets,
All under lock and key,
To come forth for the bridal.

She'll be a bride to-morrow !
There's gladness in her heart ;
And, with her gay bride-maidens,
She sitteth all apart :
No thought of after sorrow
Hath shaded her young brow ;—
She liveth in the joyfulness
That is but tokened now ;—
The yet more joyful morrow,
With bashful, blissful sighs,
And he, the handsome bridegroom,
Looking love into her eyes !
Oh, happy be that bridal !

These are sweet, and they will be favourite lines. A few lingering relics of L. E. L. are still embalmed in the Scrap-Book. One affixed to the portrait of a missionary's wife, who, for aught that we can recollect, is that of her kind and candid friend, Mrs Fletcher, (Miss Jewsbury of Manchester,) will be prized as among the last, if not the best, of Miss Landon's compositions. Coming to us now, as is here finely said, "like the scent of the violet, after it is withered."

THE MISSIONARY'S WIFE. BY L. E. L.

Not through the quiet shadows of our vale
Have I pursued thy path
Not where the violet rises on the gale,—
Not where the green fields in the summer shine.
White was our little dwelling, all around
Were kindred, ancient friends, and countrymen ;
Not often did it know a ruder sound
Than when the childlike brook laughed through the glen.
We left our country, and we left our home,
For other, stranger lands beyond the sea,—
Thou, at the bidding of thy God, to roam,
Strong in thy faith ; and I to follow thee.
The wild woods heard our voices, and the name
Of the Redeemer,—till that hour unknown ;
Praises and prayers amid the desert came,
Stirring its depths with their eternal tone.

Has not the rosy morning heard our hymn,
Heralding in the labours of the day ?
And when the twilight's purple shades were dim
Our tasks were closed with words that praise and pray.

Be this the omen of all coming time,
To spread THY WORD from rise till set of sun,
Till the One God be known from clime to clime,
And the great work of Christian love be done.

"The Drawing-Room Scrap-Book for 1841" has a fair number of the portraits of distinguished men, selected so as afford variety. As a poet, Aikenside—a statesman, Brougham—with a soldier, a physician, and several historical pictures, and numerous fine landscapes. It is attired in rich crimson silk and gold, and will, no doubt, be glittering on many English and American tables even before this notice is abroad.

Moore's Poems. Volume II.

We are glad to find that, in his prefatory notices, Mr Moore is becoming rather more communicative. Many of the poems (which are now, for the first time, properly arranged) are connected with his visit to Bermuda and North America, some forty years since ; and his recollections of that period furnish a text for many pleasant anecdotes of his tour. He accompanied Mr Merry, then the British Ambassador at Washington, and attended him when his credentials were delivered to Jefferson, whom they found sitting with General Dearborn and a few more officers, and all in the same homely costume, comprising slippers and Cannemara stockings,—in which array Jefferson received Mr Merry, "much to that formal Minister's horror." Nor are we sure, but that, at that period, Mr Moore himself might be somewhat shocked at the coarse and careless garb of the man who drew up the Declaration of American Independence. His friends, during his stay in the states, were of the Federalist or Anti-Democratic party : and he acknowledges that he imbibed some of their prejudices. Indeed, he confesses, that he was for the moment sceptical as to the soundness of the Liberal creed. Mr Moore subsequently visited the Falls of Niagara, and some of the Indian tribes. He gives, with an account of them, the history of that universal favourite, "The Canadian Boat Song." If Mr Moore be the author of any national poetry, or any of the hitherto anonymous splendid "Rebel" lyrics of the era of 1798, there is as yet no trace of them among his acknowledged juvenile poems ; and it is indeed highly probable, that his muse was always nearer of kin to the Greek Anacreon than to the Teutonic Körner, or yet the Gallic Beranger. The volume is embellished with the most dainty and delicate devices, somewhat in the style of Stothard.

Legendary Tales of the Highlands. By Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, Baronet.

These volumes form a Sequel to Sir Thomas's amusing or romantic HIGHLAND RAMBLES. The design is the same, and so is the frame-work ; the Dominie, Clifford, Grant, the Sergeant, and the AUTHOR, being still the dramatis personæ—or interlocutors. Some of the Legends, or Tales of Highland chivalry, are of goodly length ; and these abound in romantic incident, and traits of the olden times, when the king held court at Snowdon or Holyrood. But there are several sketches of a homelier and more mirthful kind, which will find not less favour in many eyes. The Scotch can still sympathize with the distresses of Sergeant Archy Stewart, ludicrous as they may appear in the eyes of "civilized men wi' breeks on their hinderlins," as Bailie Jarvie says. For our own part, so much do we enjoy the early trials and adventures of the brave "Shon Smith," the sergeant of the Old Black Watch, that we are extremely uneasy lest his mongrel, uncouth, but expressive dialect should frighten southern or even lowland readers. And without that rich dialect these adventures would be deprived of much of their gusto. John's first adventures would make a diverting and laughter-moving little after-piece; graced moreover by the warmth of heart, and generous feeling in which those amusing absurdities are usually deficient. When Sir Thomas has fairly started his game, the ardour of the chase sometimes leads him too far. He is not content with running it down; he must out-run it, or run it over. This holds of John's marvellous escapes, and Morag's more wonderful adventures. In Morag's case, too, he is fairly chargeable with the worse fault of culpable homicide, aggravated by breaking the heart of honest John, through the death of his sweetheart.

Dacre of the South; or the Olden Time: a Tragedy in Five Acts. By Mrs Gore.

If movement and passion be the life and soul of the acted drama, Mrs Gore has been completely successful in this play, at least so far as one of the uninitiated may pronounce in the closet on the effects of the stage. The opening scenes of "Dacre" are full of vivacity; and the reader is at once plunged into the heart of the action. The age is the latter years of the reign of Henry VIII.; and its subject is historical. Thomas Fynnes, lord Dacre of the South, suffered death when a very young man, less for the crime with which he was charged, than because his large estates tempted the insatiable rapacity of the king and his courtiers.

To give a mere outline of the drama would convey any thing rather than a just idea of its beauties. The main incident seems defective,—Dacre taking the guilt of murder upon himself to screen his friend, the betrothed of his sister, and hoping to elude the penalties of the law because he is a peer of the realm, has influence at court, and is dreaded by the king. But failing this blemish, the play is finely wrought up, and contains many of the nobler elements of tragic interest. It breathes, moreover, in the trial scenes, and those in which the baseness, servility, and rapacity of the courtiers are exposed, a generous spirit of independence and liberal sentiment; and is, altogether, a thoroughly English drama in spirit and in details.

The Gipsy King, and other Poems. By Richard Howitt.

The principal piece is a fine descriptive poem; and the miscellaneous verses show that this member of the family shares in the genuine talent which distinguishes the name of Howitt.

Pelham, or the Adventures of a Gentleman.

Sir Edward Bulwer's popular novel has been published by Mr Colburn, uniformly with the editions which Messrs Saunders & Otley have lately published of "Rienzi" and "Maltravers." The new feature is a preface, in which the author gives excellent and manly advice to young authors, and literary aspirants of all kinds, to every word of which we can cordially subscribe. In running over the leaves of "Pelham," we are reminded of its beauties and of its faults; and the worst of them is not the affectation of puppyism—for that is a common lure to catch vulgar readers. What a satire on aristocracy is Pelham's mother; and what an excuse for the juvenile heartless profligacy of the race of Pelhams, is having been cursed with such mothers! Her letters to her son ought to form the appendix to those of Lord Chesterfield.

Wild-Flowers from the Glens. By E. L. L. Dedicated to the Queen Dowager.

These are romantic love-stories, and curious fairy legends, of which the locale is the wild scenery of the County of Antrim, named the Glynnes. They present many pleasing traits of rural manners in the north of Ireland; and will be much admired by the young and gentle-hearted.

The Child and the Hermit. By C. M.

This is an attempt, by an English lady, to continue, in an English spirit, Mrs Austin's translation of the exquisite German tale, The Story without an End. This she does pleasingly and successfully, and in a style which is better adapted to juvenile readers than the German work; and yet we have heard of young children understanding,—or having that glimmering, twilight perception, which nourishes imagination—the Fairy Queen and the Pilgrim's Progress; not the bare narrative, but the double meaning; the allegory and the facts. The Child and the Hermit is, however, a very sweet production. It is Barbauldish in tone; and it is neatly and tastefully embellished. How much more worthy of the choice of those who select for the young, is such a little work as this, or another, now before us, entitled—Tendrils Cherished, or Home Sketches, than those half-comic, half-satirical, slang productions, with cuts to suit, which are about as wholesome for the expanding moral and imaginative faculties of children, as gin and cayenne would be nutritious to their growing bodies. There is, however, a dash of sermonizing in Tendrils Cherished, which does not heighten its usefulness as a juvenile work.

Analysis of the Bible with reference to Social Duties. By R. Montgomery Martin.

This is a valuable little manual of Biblical precepts, on the various duties of life, arranged alphabetically:—as on Almsgiving; Anger; Brotherly Love; Charity, Children, Conduct, &c. It will be found a desirable book to keep lying at hand for reference.

Baronetage of the British Empire.

A tabular work, zealously maintaining the honour and dignity of the baronetage, and the privileges of the order.

SERIAL WORKS.

M'CULLOCH'S GEOGRAPHICAL and STATISTICAL DICTIONARY. Part VIII.

THE PICTORIAL SHAKESPEARE. Part XXVII. Twelfth Night; or, What You Will. [We have twenty-six illustrations of this single play—all good, and several rare and admirable—and a rich fund of annotation.

PAMPHLETS.

DR POOLE on the ROYAL LUNATIC ASYLUM and HOSPITAL of MONTROSE.

ANNUAL REPORT of the GLASGOW LUNATIC ASYLUM.

ANNUAL REPORT of the DUNDEE LUNATIC ASYLUM.

ANNUAL REPORT of the NORTHAMPTON LUNATIC ASYLUM.

[The last three publications are pamphlets, the first is a volume. We rejoice to say that each of them bears satisfactory evidence to that progressive improvement in the mode of treating insanity medically, but especially morally, which we at intervals have had the satisfaction to notice in this Magazine.]

POLITICAL REGISTER.

GREAT BRITAIN is engaged in three wars—two of which have originated from our constant habit of interfering with the internal arrangements of other countries; and the third because we insist upon poisoning the subjects of a large empire, in spite of all the efforts of their government to prevent it. It is not of the least consequence to Britain whether Syria is ruled by the Sultan or by Mehemet Ali; and, at all events, we have no more right to engage in the quarrels of these potentates, than they have to attempt to settle the question regarding the North-eastern Boundary between the United States and our American colonies. But it is probable that if these wars go on as successfully for the British arms as they have hitherto done, no general effort will be made to put an end to them. A victory, is a victory whether it be obtained over disciplined European troops, or over half-armed, half-starved, and undisciplined barbarians; and the glory attending the massacre of men, women, and children, and the sacking of towns, is, it must be admitted, much the same whether the scene be in Europe or Asia. Although we were allied with the Russians, Austrians, and Prussians to wrest Syria from the Pacha, we had, as usual, to do nearly the whole work ourselves. Of nineteen ships of all sorts at the siege of St Jean d'Acre, fifteen were British, three Austrian, and one Turkish; and, as far as we have noticed, throughout the whole campaign, neither the Russians nor Prussians have given the slightest assistance. Of all the European nations we, surely,—as being the most remote—are least concerned in these eastern quarrels; yet, although we affect to interfere in them for the preservation of the general tranquillity of Europe, none of the European nations think proper to give any efficient assistance, but let us incur all the expense, and encounter all the danger.

The war in Syria was virtually terminated by the taking of St Jean d'Acre, on the 4th November. This city, which is situated twenty-three miles north-west from Jerusalem, has long been considered the key of Syria. It was famous as a place of strength during the crusades; in 1799 the Turks, aided by two ships of the line, under Sir Sydney Smith, defended it successfully against Buonaparte, who made no fewer than eight desperate assaults on it between the 28th March, and 21st May, during all which period the trenches were open. On the late occasion the bombardment lasted for only three or four hours; and partly from the heavy fire of the ships, and still more from the explosion of the principal magazine of the besieged, by which 1200 to 1300 men were killed, the garrison was so weakened that the survivors evacuated the town during the night; and, at daylight next morning, the British, Ottoman, and Austrian flags were seen displayed from the citadel. A more horrid picture of the atrocities of war has seldom been exhibited than on this occasion. Of a garrison of 6000 men, 2500 are said to have been killed on the spot; about 2500 prisoners were taken; 1000 may have escaped from the town, only to be slain, or captured and exposed to every insult by the savage mountaineers. The fortifications were almost completely destroyed, a great part of the town reduced to ruins, and hardly a single house escaped without injury. The loss of the British was only seventeen killed and thirty-six wounded, and very little damage was sustained by the ships. Twenty thousand shot, almost wholly thirty-two to ninety-eight pounders, were thrown into the town in four hours—the Princess Charlotte alone firing above 4500 shots, or, during the three hours she was engaged, one broadside every two minutes, for eighty-six times. The shocking spectacle the town presented the day after the bombardment, is described in many of the private letters, but, of course, kept out of view in the official accounts. Corpses of men, women, and children, blackened by the explosion of the magazine, and mutilated, in the most horrid manner, by the cannon shot, lay every where about, half buried among the ruins of the houses and fortifications: women were searching for the bodies of their husbands, children for their fathers. Several days elapsed before the bodies were removed; and such was the stench from their putrefaction, that there was every risk of some pestilential disease being engendered, which would enshroud the living and the dead in one common tomb.

The rapidity with which Acre has been taken by the British, is to be attributed, in a great measure, to the blowing up of the magazine, and the great injury thereby sustained; to the great weight of the shot used; and to the precision with which they were thrown. During the earlier part of the siege by Buonaparte, the heaviest guns used were only twelve-pounders; his battering train having been taken by Sir Sydney Smith, and employed in defending the town against the assailants. The immediate result of the taking of Acre was the surrender of Jaffa, and the submission of Mehemet Ali to the terms dictated to him by the four powers. He does not seem to have yielded, however, till Commodore Napier threatened to lay Alexandria in ashes—a threat which caused a revolt to take place in that city. The terms imposed on him were, the withdrawal of his army from Syria; the restoration of that country and of the Ottoman fleet to the Sultan. On the other hand, the Pacha is to have guaranteed to him, by the five great powers, the hereditary succession to Egypt; so that, after all, the “integrity of the Ottoman Empire” has been seriously invaded, by permanently dismembering from the dominions of the Sultan one of the finest of his provinces. The truth is, that any attempt to save the Ottoman Empire is hopeless. Through the vices of its own system of government—and particularly the overwhelming influence of a bigoted and selfish priesthood, the bane of every country—Turkey is going rapidly to decay; and, although our national vanity may be flattered by our successes in Syria, these successes will be of no permanent value to the Sultan, while they exhaust the resources of Britain, and prevent them being applied in internal improvements. The only lasting effect of this war will be to add to our taxation, and increase our national debt.

In the north-west of India the war is carried on with various success; and it appears now to be certain, that unless we are prepared to station a great force in Afghanistan, all the lives we have sacrificed, and all the money we have spent, will go for nothing. Major Clibborne, who was proceeding to relieve Captain Brown at Kehan, where he was surrounded by the Murrees, has been defeated with great slaughter, and the loss of the whole of his artillery and baggage. In consequence of this disaster, Captain Brown has been glad to capitulate on condition of obtaining a free passage. At the date of the last accounts, the fortress of Quettoh was threatened by Nusseer Khan with 1100 Beloochees. General Nott, followed by Major-General Brooks, was on the advance to recapture Khelat. In Koistan, a party under Sir R. Sale has been repulsed, with the loss of twelve killed and several wounded; among the former was Captain E. Connolly (Sir R's aide-de-camp.) To compensate for these defeats, Brigadier-General Dennie, with a body of 1000 men, defeated Dost Mohammed, on the 18th October, at the head of 8000 or 10,000 men. Five hundred of the enemy were left dead on the field, Mohammed was severely wounded, and all his baggage and the only piece of artillery he brought to the field, viz. a sixteen-pounder, were taken. We had in this engagement a specimen of the reliance which is to be placed on our Afghan allies; a company of them which had been organized, armed, and drilled by Captain Hopkins, and which ran away immediately afterwards to Dost Mohammed, having acted, on the part of the enemy, as light infantry, and attacked our troops with great spirit. It is not by such forces as we have stationed in the north-west of India,—mostly sepoys, and withal, inconsiderable in number,—that a country like Afghanistan, containing fourteen millions of people under no efficient government, and consisting of eight or ten distinct tribes, Indians, Persians, Tartars, Affghans, &c., &c., 1000 miles in extent from east to west, and 900 from north to south, is to be retained either in subjection or even in amity. It is not, therefore, remarkable that a farther demand for British troops has been made, and that 10,000 men are now in course of being shipped from Britain to the "far east," whence not one in ten will ever return. That is, perhaps, the concern of those alone who choose to enter into a profession which renders it an indispensable duty to murder every one whom the ministry of the day chooses to consider an enemy: but we see no reason why the peaceably-disposed citizens of this kingdom should not only be made the abettors of massacre in every quarter of the earth, and involved in wars which they cannot prosecute with honour, nor retire from without disgrace,—but also made to suffer by excessive taxation in their own persons,—to forward projects they utterly detest and abhor. It appears that the lowest contract which government has been able to make for the transport of the troops from Britain to the East Indies, is £14 to £15 a head; and who can say how many thousands more will be required, to support the forlorn hope of British troops and sepoys which is now perishing in petty skirmishes, and in the attack or defence of miserable forts in Afghanistan, for no national, honourable, or defensible object.

The opium war, which we have denounced from the outset, does not go on with much spirit, though in China, as elsewhere, our character for military courage, perhaps we might say, for animal ferocity, at least when contrasted with Asiatics, is not likely to suffer. One would have thought, that in a quarrel such as we have chosen to make on the opium question, it was the incumbent duty of our government to punish, as far as lay in its power, those who were in its opinion the real delinquents. The whole cause of dispute, as is well known, arose from the Chinese being too eager to favour our merchants in their attempts to introduce opium, and from the efforts of the Chinese government to put down that trade. Instead, however, of making an attack on Pekin, or as near it as circumstances would permit, in order to terrify the rulers of China into submission, or even on Canton, where the confiscation of the opium of the British merchants, and the other acts which have led to the war with the celestial empire, took place; we have commenced hostilities on an island pretty equally distant from both cities, and the local governor and inhabitants of which are as innocent of giving any offence to the British on this or any other occasion as the people of Iceland. The place chosen for attack was the island of Chusan, or as more generally spelt on our maps, Techeuchan (in long. 121°. lat. 30°). On the 4th of July, General Burrell, with three ships of war and three transports, arrived in the anchorage of Chusan harbour. An attempt was made that evening to obtain the surrender of the island without bloodshed; but as no arrangement could be come to, and the Chinese next morning indicated a resolution to resist, the ultima ratio regum, a fire of round and grape shot was resorted to, which soon drove the Chinese from their forts and war-junks with great slaughter. Troops were landed, and an assault on the capital of the island, Ting-hae-heen, was resolved on for next day, and preparations made for battering down the walls. Meanwhile shot and shells, "for the purpose of trying the range," as the official account has it, were thrown in, which occasioned great slaughter among the unoffending inhabitants. During the night, however, the Chinese troops, and nearly the whole of the inhabitants, evacuated the town, and the British entered it next morning without resistance. The whole loss on the part of the British in this affair was one man wounded. Yet, notwithstanding the cheap price at which an island as large as the Isle of Wight, with a capital, the walls of which are five miles in circumference, was captured, the most frightful excesses took place. According to one account, "notwithstanding strict orders had been issued to respect private property, the sailors were allowed to leave their boats and plunder the town. In a short time they had reduced it to a perfect wreck, wantonly destroying what they could not carry off."

Great quantities of a liquor called Samshu were found in the town, and the soldiers got so completely intoxicated that they had to be carried into the ships by whole companies, and almost regiments, in a state of insensibility. The Indian Gazette furnishes a more frightful picture of the excesses committed: "The troops were then landed,—the British flag hoisted,—and a more complete pillage could not be conceived than then took place. Every house was broken open—every drawer and box ransacked,—the streets strewn with fragments of furniture, pictures, tables, chairs, grain of all sorts;—the whole set off but the dead, or the living bodies of the inhabitants who had been unable to leave the city from the wounds received from our merciless guns. Some were lying with one leg shot off, others with both; some with wounds from thirty-two pound shots in their bodies, and others, the bones of whose legs and arms protruded through the flesh, occasioned by the severe wounds they had received. For two days the bodies were allowed to lie exposed to sight where they fell,—their swelling and the accumulation of flies, the weather being intensely hot, at last rendered them disgusting: they were buried on the spot. The plunder ceased only when there was nothing to take or destroy." This is the cost at which the bauble called military glory is obtained! Let our tea-drinkers reflect on these horrible details of the sufferings inflicted on a people of a remote island, who never gave offence to the British, and most of whom never heard of our existence; and consider whether their favourite beverage is not too dearly purchased by so much human wretchedness and misery.

Immediately upon the occupation of the capital, General Burrell assumed the title of Governor of Chusan. M. Gutslaff, the missionary, who accompanied the expedition in quality of interpreter, was appointed chief magistrate; and there seems no doubt that Chusan is henceforth to be reckoned a British settlement, and another station for our Lords John and Lords Charles speedily securing a fortune and a liver complaint! The island, it must, indeed, be admitted, forms a very desirable object for robbery. The principal city is well fortified, is easily defensible, and the soil fertile. The island is situated at the mouth of one of the great Chinese rivers, the Ningpo; at no great distance stands Nanking, formerly the capital of China, and still a large and populous city; and, by means of rivers and numerous canals, it commands an easy water communication with a great part of China. If we are, therefore, to rob the Chinese of part of their territory, this island is probably as desirable as any other place which can be pointed out.

FRANCE.—The success of the British arms in Syria stimulated, in an extraordinary degree, the war faction in Paris. Their suspicions were roused that, in her operations in that country, Great Britain was actuated by a spirit of aggrandizement; and some apparent ground was afforded for these suspicions, by some of our Tory papers advocating the establishment of an Anglo-Syrian Empire, for the purpose of at once supporting the Porte in case of any attack from Russia, and of shutting out from the European nations the route to our Indian Empire. Lord Palmerston has, however, it is reported, assured the French Government that Great Britain has not the slightest wish nor intention to keep possession of any part of Syria; and it is more than probable that any such attempt would occasion a European war. The address, in answer to Louis-Philippe's speech, at the opening of the Chamber of Deputies, led to a discussion nearly unprecedented for length and violence. On the 23d November, the draft of the address was read by the president to the chamber, amid repeated and violent interruptions from the Gauche. On Wednesday, the 25th, the debate began, continued all that week, was resumed on Monday the 30th, and closed on the 3d December. On the 4th, the paragraphs were separately taken into consideration, with the amendments proposed on each; and the final vote was not taken till the 5th, when the address, though not till remodelled, was carried by 247 to 161. It is obvious from the debate, as well as from other occurrences, that a strong desire for war pervades the French; and, modified as the address was, the majority would have been less considerable, had not Dupin asserted that "France, in the state of an armed peace (paix armée), and confident of her strength, would watch over the balance of power in Europe, and would not suffer any attack to be made on it." He added—"that not only would France maintain its liberty of action, but, besides, her 500,000 troops gave her the means of carrying her wishes into effect." Guizot expressed his entire concurrence in these sentiments. The funeral of Napoleon afforded another opportunity of showing the eagerness of the French for war. A body of 2000 students joined the procession, and indicated their feelings by cries laudatory of Thiers and insulting to Guizot; with which were, from time to time, intermingled shouts of "Down with the English." In consequence of the warlike preparations making, and the hostile spirit manifested in France, Germany is bristling with arms, and it only requires a spark to involve all Europe in war. Meanwhile, one of the ordinary results of war, and preparations for war, has been exhibited—increase of debt. Russia has already borrowed £4,000,000; the French funds are sinking rapidly; and a loan of from £6,000,000 to £10,000,000 must be contracted immediately. Our own funds have also fallen; and it is far from improbable that our government will also require a loan; for we suspect that the additional taxes, lately imposed, will not yield so much as was anticipated.

THE CORN-LAW AGITATION.—FREE TRADE.—Notwithstanding the efforts of the Corn-Law League, the land-owners do not seem in the least alarmed; as we may judge from the eagerness with which land is sought for, and the high prices given for it. We have before us a list of eight different estates and farms lately sold in England. The soil of several of the farms was by no means of first-rate quality, though certainly capable of improvement; and there were no circumstances tending artificially to raise the value of the land. The total amount of the purchase-money was £214,000; and the number of years' purchase, under deduction of land-tax alone, which each property brought, was as follows:—two twenty-nine years, one thirty-one, one thirty-two, two thirty-five, and two thirty-seven; which will yield considerably less than three per cent. on the purchase-money, while five per cent. can easily be got at present on unexceptionable security. Whether these high prices are to be attributed to a confidence that the aristocracy have the power to maintain the starvation-laws against every attempt to remove them, or from a belief that their removal would not permanently lower the value of the land, it is difficult to say; but whatever may be the cause, we hope the efforts to get rid of those obnoxious laws will never be relaxed till victory be obtained. Two very competent witnesses examined before the Committee of the House of Commons on the import duties, Mr J. D. Hume and Mr M'Gregor, declared their belief, that the burden of the Corn and Provision Laws, was greater than all the State Taxes put together. One of them estimated the burden at double the amount of the government revenue. At least fifty millions a-year may, with great safety, be put down as the sum which the keeping up of a single monopoly costs the people. Of this sum, only a small portion, not more than a fifth, according to Mr M'Culloch's calculation, goes into the pockets of the land-owners, the other four-fifths, that is to say, forty millions a-year, are thrown away on the cultivation of the bogs, heaths, and sands of the landed aristocracy, instead of being profitably invested in manufactures, for which double the quantity of corn could be obtained from the cultivators of the rich soils of Europe and America.

The Anti-Corn Law Association actively continues its agitation. During the Autumn, their lecturers have addressed large audiences in numerous towns and villages in England and Ireland; and except in places beridden by the aristocracy, they have been cordially, and indeed enthusiastically received. The effect these lectures must produce, in opening the eyes of the ignorant rustics, and small shop-keepers in the country towns, cannot be over-estimated. Another efficient measure is in the course of organization—the getting up of a determined opposition to every candidate for a seat in the House, who does not pledge himself distinctly to a repeal of the Corn Laws.

THE SCOTTISH DISSENTERS.—The ministers of that great body of Scottish Dissenters, comprehended under the names of the United Associate Synod, and the Relief Synod, have, at last, taken up a position in relation to the Non-intrusion party in the Established Church, and the Whig Administration, which would seem to be one of armed neutrality, if not of determined hostility. The other denominations of Dissenters are comparatively small in point of numbers, yet we presume that they also will concur in the views of those to whom they are knit by the fundamental principle of Voluntaryism, religious freedom, and equality of civil rights, without respect to religious opinion:—and some of them have done so. A meeting of a metropolitan Central Board of Dissenters, instituted some time since, was lately held in Edinburgh, and attended by delegates, lay and clerical, from many of the Scottish towns. The resolutions adopted by that assembly, and its general objects and means of accomplishing these have since been elaborately expounded in a formal manifesto, published under the sanction of the Board.

It has not surprised us that this decided step is taken; but that it has been so long delayed. The Movement has originated with the clergy, and it is guided by them; though influential laymen among the Dissenters have heartily concurred in its objects. It now remains to be seen whether the Dissenters will answer to the helm as promptly and steadily as the Catholics under their priesthood; the English yeomanry under the Tory clergy and Tory landlords; or as the well-drilled constituencies of certain towns have hitherto done under their Whig fuglemen. If so, the consequences at the first general election must be very serious to the present Ministers; nor do we see how these unfortunate gentlemen, fairly jammed in between the horns of the Bashan Bull of Non-Intrusion and the now exalted horn of Voluntaryism, are to avoid being gored. They cannot now propitiate consistent Dissenters, although they were so inclined. They have injured and insulted them in what is past; and, for the future, they are unable to give them any reasonable ground of hope. And the test which the Dissenting clergy, or the Central Board—laity and clergy—propose for them, makes it compulsory that they should recant past misdeeds, as well as promise better behaviour for the future, and keep their promise.

But this meeting of delegates we consider less important for the resolutions adopted, than for the temper and spirit indicated. In this respect it was the parallel of the great Grey Gathering in Edinburgh, seven years since, when the steady, fair-and-go-softly amblers found themselves quite unable to check the bold riders. There was speaking "away from the question" that gave much offence on the platform, and which has been sharply rebuked even by those ministerial prints that advocate Voluntaryism, but which was received with rapturous delight by the assembly. None of the clerical speakers—and all the speakers were clerical—attempted to palliate, or sought to screen the delinquencies of the government, and particularly of certain of its Scottish members, towards the Dissenting body. All their special grievances were recapitulated, and dwelt upon even bitterly; but an allusion to matters equally pressing and as momentous, made by one of the ministers, who seems in advance of his brethren (the Rev. Mr Marshall of Kirkintilloch,) was anxiously checked, as not merely out of place, but decidedly worthy of condemnation. This gentleman spoke of the Chartist agitation, and the alarming discontents of the unfranchised masses. We regret that his opinions on the principle of representation are not perfectly clear. He thinks that a limited franchise might do very well if the people would only be contented to believe so. But they will not, and they ought not; and, like Sir Robert Peel in granting the Catholic claims, Mr Marshall argues that the suffrage must be conceded, because it is most dangerous longer to withhold it. Mr Marshall appeared to consider the views of his reverend brethren unexceptionable so far as they went, but too narrowly-based to prove efficient even for their immediate objects; which in substance, are, first to show that the Scottish Dissenting clergy are no longer to be ill-treated by the Whigs with impunity, or as they have been, in the case of the Highland schools, over which they have no control, and by their pointed exclusion from the chaplaincy of jails and the Bible-board; and, secondly, to curb the Non-intrusion party in their struggle for what Dissenters consider mere priestly domination. Excellent objects, no doubt; yet such as any Tory in the country might support, provided he were also a Voluntary.

The Dissenting body is henceforth to manage for itself in registrations, in testing candidates,—that delicate process!—and in every thing connected with the exercise of the franchise. They are, in short, to throw off the yoke of the Whig diques, and to act for themselves.

TRADE AND MANUFACTURES.

The Select Committee of the House of Commons upon Import duties, has collected some valuable information, showing the pernicious effect which high import duties have on our trade and manufactures, and on the welfare of the country in general. J. D. Hume, Esq., who has been thirty-eight years in the Customs, and eleven years at the Board of Trade, considers that, in a general and national view, no national measure could be more beneficial than removing all protections, prohibitions, and restrictions. He states that the effect of all protections is to lessen the efforts of the protected to compete with their rivals. Of this he gives the following instance:—At the time of Mr Pitt's commercial treaty with France, the great import was French broad cloths. Our own cloths were formerly protected by high duties, and they were of a very inferior character. But as soon as the manufacturers of this country felt the stimulus of foreign competition, they set themselves to work; and the result has been that, up to a certain point, the English make cloth better for the price than the French do, and consequently we have retained our trade. The duty upon foreign woollens, at present, is 15 per cent., and we do not import more than £100,000 worth in the year, while we annually export nearly seven millions worth of our own woollen manufactures; showing that we can now compete with foreigners in neutral markets. Mr Hume also explains the cause of the depression of the Spitalfields silk trade after the war. That depression arose, not from competition by Lyons, but by the people of Manchester commencing the business; and, so far from there being a decrease of the British silk trade, by a reduction of the duties, in two or three years afterwards, double the quantity of raw silk was consumed in Britain than formerly. Very great improvements were also made in the machinery. The result of the competition was, that the price of silks was greatly reduced, and the wearing of silk came into much more general use than it had ever been before. Mr Hume expresses a confident opinion that monopoly, however secured, prevents all efforts at improvement; and that every branch of our manufactures, in which we are able to stand competition, has been injured by protection. Mr Hume is supported in his views by Mr Porter and Mr McGregor; and the committee, in the conclusion of their report, state, "that they have thought themselves warranted in reporting their strong conviction of the necessity of an immediate change in the import duties of the kingdom; and, should parliament sanction the views which your committee entertains on these most important matters, they are persuaded that, by imposts on a small number of the articles which are now most productive, the amount of each impost being carefully considered with a view to the greatest consumption of the article, and thereby the greatest receipt to the Customs, no loss would accrue to the revenue, but, on the contrary, a considerable augmentation might be confidently anticipated. The simplification they recommend would not only vastly facilitate the transactions of commerce, and thereby benefit the revenue, but would, at the same time, greatly diminish the costs of collection."

In the manufacturing districts complaints still continue to be made of the dulness of trade, low profits, and unemployed workmen. The recent accounts from the United States represent commerce to be in a flourishing condition. The crops of cotton, corn, and tobacco, have all been large, and will enable the Americans to clear off a great part of the debts they owe in Europe; but, unfortunately, the abundance of raw cotton, and its extreme cheapness, operate as a check on our manufacturers getting a remunerating price for their goods. The stock of sugar is very small, so that prices are likely still to advance; and the time does not seem far distant when we must make up our minds either to dispense with the use of sugar, or to allow foreign sugar to be imported at a reasonable duty. The highness of the price has lessened the demand very much, and the market continues dull. The Gazette average at this time in 1838, was 34s. 3d. per cent; in 1839, 35s. 6d.; and now 56s. 10d., exclusive of the import duty of 24s. a cwt., or more than 24d. a lb.

AGRICULTURE.

It is now generally admitted by the best judges that the last crop was nearly an average, that is, sufficient to serve our population for twelve months. We may compute the present population of Great Britain at 19,000,000, and that of Ireland at 9,000,000. And allowing each of the former one quarter of wheat, and each of the latter (as the Irish live on coarser food) half a quarter, our annual consunt of wheat may be taken at 234,000,000 of quarters. To this must be added ten per cent., or 2,350,000 quarters for seed; and we should always have a sufficient quantity of the old crop for this purpose. This was certainly not the case last harvest, for the stack-yards and barns were almost entirely cleared. On the other hand, we imported 1,700,000 quarters of foreign wheat just before harvest; so that, if our calculation be correct, we have still a deficiency of 1,000,000 of quarters in the quantity necessary to maintain us till next harvest. Between the 5th September and 10th October, 1,035,814 quarters of wheat and 365,087 cwts. of flour were entered for home-consumption, leaving only 7278 quarters of wheat, and 8594 cwts. of flour in bond. As very little has been imported since, the stock of foreign wheat in bond is unusually small. Since September, the price of wheat has been steadily, though slowly, rising, and the general average is now 61s. 2d.; and the duty being 25s. 8d., no more foreign wheat will be taken out of bond.

The murrain has gradually approached us from the south; but although many cattle and sheep have been attacked with it, the mortality, where proper care has been taken has been very inconsiderable. An absurd alarm has been raised against the consumption of milk and animal food; but there is no reason to believe that the disease either affects the milk or flesh of the animals. From the risk of contagion, some of the cattle markets have exhibited a great deficiency of supply; but, notwithstanding, the price of food has not risen materially.

While on the subject of agriculture, we shall take the opportunity of noticing the Gardeners' Gazette,—a weekly newspaper published in London. It has been greatly improved since the management of the horticultural department was intrusted to Mr Loudon. Though principally intended for circulation among gardeners and amateur florists,—and to them indeed it is indispensable,—a great deal of useful information is also to be found in it as to the management of the soil, the planting and treatment of forest trees, and on agricultural subjects generally. Mr Loudon has now openly joined the Gardeners' Gazette. He is in himself a host.

BURSCHEM MELODIES.—No. V.

A BATCH OF GENUINE COMMERS-LIEDER.

C'a donc, ça donc !
Thus day for day live we ;
A company of toppers most beautiful to see !
We sit upon our hobby-horse,
And through the world we ride,
Like the most glo-glorious
King in his pride.

Burschen Song.

"L'ALLEMAND," says Oxenstiern the younger, "est une creature qui BOIT PLUS QU'ELLE NE PEUT PORTER, un tonneau qui contient plus qu'il ne paroît, et un homme qui soit plus qu'il ne dit : j'y ajoute un homme d'honneur et de probité"—a text on which a sermon might be written as edifying as some of Thomas Carlyle's famous essays on German Literature. Capacity, it seems, and comprehensiveness, is the grand feature of the German mind ; and of the German body also, which, we are told, contains more beer than it can carry. And this is all right and proper, and according to nature—as the Puritans tell us, that every soul must have a body corresponding to it, an outward expression and type of that which is within. Not that all great eaters and great drinkers are necessarily or naturally also great thinkers ; but that a large and broad and jovial intellect will not, in the general case, be cast in a body ; slim and slender, like a dandy's walking-cane, or a young lady's prayer-book. So Goethe ; so Wilson ; so Patrick Robertson : and if Harry Bluff, in the song, be an exception exceptio confirmat regulam ; and it is not the less true, that small bodies, like that of Thiers the ex-minister of France, are the general encasement of quick and clever minds only, not of those that are grand and comprehensive. And as is the body, such also are the capacities and functions of the body. Goethe was a great eater ; so are Van Amburgh's lions—would it not be foolish to see them pecking like fowls?—and the "immania corpora" of the ancient Germans, whose mere aspect struck terror into the degenerate Romans, remaining to the present day, are accompanied with large capacities of eating and drinking, noticed by all intelligent travellers. And with regard to the matter of drinking (the more godlike function,) we may observe generally, that though fashions in this, as in other matters, change with times and places ; though the Englishman drinks port wine, the German beer, and the gods nectar—still, to drink well is a quality that we instinctively associate with the idea of perfect manhood ; and a soul of large capacity will not sip mincingly, but swill down the purple draught heartily, as Solomon tells us that all good things ought to be done—"with all thy might," totus in illis—accentuating the energy, concentrating the function, making a totality of it, and not a wretched fragment, and peddling abortion of a deed. Does not some god (we forget which) in the Edda, drink up, or try to drink up Ocean, making a visible elb even in the Mediterranean sea ? and have we not known small, compact, stay-laced souls, too many, that could not, even were their salvation to depend on it, expand into a hearty laugh, and would be literally drowned by a bona fide bumper of any thing substantial?—It is no jest : whoso cannot drink, is deficient in one of the functions of manhood ; and if he be minutely examined, outside and inside, the probability is that he will be found deficient in some other function also.

Mr. Tait has received various communications anent the Burschen Melodies ; and, for the most part, he is proud to acknowledge (and the present writer acknowledges also with gratitude,) of a laudatory and commendatory character. But one correspondent—a Reverend and a Tee-totaller—expresses great dissatisfaction with our melodious efforts for the amusement of the public; accusing us, in plain phrase, of “corrupting the manners of the age;” and warning us that, if we proceed in our wicked courses, we shall certainly “fall under the condemnation of Jack Sheppard.” To this charge, our answer may be very short: we advocate drinking, and sing drinking-songs; but we say nothing about the liquor that shall be drunk. Banish beer, banish wine, banish Crambambuli (of which anon,) and say coffee, cocoa, tea, water, and the song will remain as good as ever, except a rhyme here and there, which it is your duty to change who are dissatisfied. It is not wine that we sing, but the soul of joy and joviality incarnated in wine: and if the Tee-totaller shall succeed in incarnating that soul more perfectly (for Vishnu has many Avatars) in coffee or well-water, and convincing the world to that effect—then the web which Pantagruelizing fancy weaves, will show new pictures, and the language of convivial poetry will be changed. But the poet cannot dictate in these matters: he receives and enjoys. For himself, the present writer confesses that he loves a glass of good wine, both on its own account, and as a clear mirror wherein truth from the face of a friend hath again and again revealed itself triumphantly—to the utter rout and prostration of that minced propriety and laced dignity which has now unhappily become part of the habitude of social etiquette in this country. And as for Tee-totalism, no doubt it is an admirable thing, according to that Scripture, “If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out;” whereby, however, it is not said, that what is expedient or necessary for one shall be obligatory on all. But let abstinence flourish by all means rather than drunkenness; and if a man loves water let him rejoice in it—as wine-drinkers rejoice in wine. For such persons we have provided a Temperance-crambambuli, communicated by a Tee-total Bursch (p. 76, infra.) At the same time it must be remarked, that never was there a greater mistake than to suppose that drinking-songs create drunkenness. They do so certainly in a fashion, as love may create lust, and religion superstition; but is it not somewhat more common to find that lust burns love to a cinder, and that superstition chokes and strangles religion? Let a man look about among his friends, and note those who are most given to mere physical excess at the table. Certainly not those who make the banquet billow with floods of melodious glee. They who give so much out from the soul, cannot be ever taking in to the body; for the human being can perform only one function grandly at the same time. A black hen lays a white egg; and singers of drinking-songs are generally very temperate persons. They do not sing to drink, but drink to sing, like Madame Malibran with the porter; or they sing and drink rather both together, in harmonious parallelism, that soul and body may hold a common festival, and bless God for his manifold goodness.

A critic in the Westminster Review, noticing

Captain Morris's “Social Effusions,” tells us, that “without some alloy of IMPROPRIETY, drinking-songs won't go down. Correct drinking songs are very dull things.” This is a very improper remark in many respects. No doubt, many expressions in drinking-songs, if taken literally, by people who cannot Pantagruelize, are immoral and improper—at least according to the very sublimated sensibilities of this superfine age. But why should these trifles be taken literally any more than more serious things,—the Song of Solomon for instance? When Nature triumphs, she is never anxiously moral. Homer is not moral. Moses is not moral. Shakespeare is not moral. Prudery and coarseness are equally removed from health. But as for “impropriety,” properly so called, it is a spice only to dulness, as dishes which are bad stand most in need of sauce. What drinking-songs require, to correct their tendency to dulness (a tendency which is not peculiar to drinking-songs,) is humour, and originality either in the shape of character or idea. Our Burschen bacchanals, for instance, possess mostly the originality of character, and they are not without humour; some of them, also, as the famous song of “the Pope,” possess originality of idea. Not a few of them, however, in common with some of Morris's songs, and many in Ritson's collection, possess nothing to redeem them from the quality of dulness or commonplace which the Westminster critic notices. Of these we can only say, in the first place, that they are inferior works of the genus; and in the second place, that it is not fair to take up a volume of printed songs, and read them through, as critics will read, and then pronounce the judgment—dull. Songs were never intended to be read,—never are read by men who follow the instinct of nature in the matter. He who separates a song from the singing of it, robs the fairy car of the rosy cloud-embosomment in which lies half its witchery,—studies Titian without the colours. And, in this respect, we must note, that many songs, which are admirable, and among the best when sung in character and with spirit, are nothing upon paper. The jovial flow of social feeling in which the essence of a good song consists, how can the compositor express that?—So in the words of our song, No. XIII., “Brethren, circle round in chorus,” there is nothing either of character or idea to call forth the particular commendation of the critic. Nevertheless it is a great favourite with the Burschen; and deservedly so: for it gives utterance to feelings that are or ought to be, especially in the social meetings of the young, as vulgar and as grateful as the light of day, as broad and as free as the breath of life. When men tire of sun-light, and of the green fields, and of the linnet's lay, they will tire of these songs, and not sooner,—only they must be sung.

The specimens of the Burschikose muse, which we give in the present Number, are genuine Commers-lieder, students' songs altogether, and only. “Commerces are great drinking associations, which are held, from time to time, in houses set apart specially for that purpose; and in the proceedings of which none but students are allowed to participate. Their purpose is partly to facilitate intercourse among the students, specially those who are newly arrived, partly for social entertainment and the more undisturbed singing of jovial Burschen songs. Beer likewise, on these occasions, is drunk right methodically; and wo be to him who gives the least indication here that he is not a stiff toper; his thirst will be quenched for many a day: for the watchword of every Commers is, 'DRINK AND SING;' and whoso, in these points, cannot approve himself well appointed, is despised as a weakling.* So says a Burschen Bible, out of which the present writer learned German at Göttingen; and the definition seems very complete. We have it, however, in our power to present the curious reader with a picture of the whole proceedings of a great Commers held in the University of Halle—not a common weekly Commers, but a formal, grand, half-yearly one, such as is wont to be held about the end of the first quarter of every semestre, or half-year's session (for there is a double session in the German student's year,) for the reception of the freshmen, called "Foxes," and the burning of the six-months' freshmen into the dignity of "Brandfoxes," so called from brennen, to burn. This Commers is accordingly called a "Fox-Commers;" and the freshman himself is called a fox; because, like a fox, he peeps and prowls about with circumspection and cunning, where a nobler animal would show self-confidence, and rush, lion-like, into danger. So a student entering among the renowners of Halle and Jena the first semestre, being seldom without an indescribable awe of the cannons (boots) and spurs which he hears clattering around, peeps about; and, instead of advancing straight up to his fellow with the feeling of a man who knows his value, circumscribes in many ways, walks cautiously, almost like a Philistine "treading upon eggs," and appears then most silly when he wishes to look most particularly sly. Thus is explained the seeming paradox, that a foolish freshman should be known, in Burschen phrase (for they have a language of their own,) by the name of an animal so famed in the annals of wisdom as the fox. Of all virtues, prudence is that for which a Bursch has the least respect; cunning he holds to be a positive vice—the very Devil's own; and, notwithstanding the practice of diplomatists and lawyers, we are very much inclined to agree with him.

Our account of the Hallensian Fox-Commers is taken from the autobiography of a German Bursch, a most curious and interesting work, of which we give the title below.†

"At length the glorious day appeared; everything was in motion; many things were yet to be done, that should have been done before; and many things that had been done before, had to be done over again. At one o'clock, cars and riders assembled at the place of rendezvous; more than sixty coaches, and as many riders, formed the imposing procession, which was led on by two gens-d'armes and a band of music. The main streets of good old Halle were crowded with insatiate spectators. In the first cars, with six horses, sat the seniors and other officials of the clanships, in party-coloured uniform, surrounded by riders in uniform and adjutants, and looking down on the gaping multitudes with an air of calm dignity and condescension becoming their importance. Some of these, also, who were expert horsemen, had even condescended to appear on a meagre Philistine-Rosinante, the van-guard or rear-guard of the coached dignitaries.

"After the grand pomp of the six-horse vehicles, followed first four and then two-horse coaches; and, last of all, a multitude of single-horse gigs or cabs, fearfully overladen, driven on with a sturdy competition of beating and bawling, at an equal pace with the better-equipped dignitaries that preceded. Pre-eminent amid the throng appeared the Fox S—, in his new blue Polonaise, shining cap, and high-booted and spurred potentates, mounted on a proud steed, and looking down with eyes that drew up admiration from the fair ones and poor despised camels around.* He brandished his sabre valiantly, and galloped up and down on his brown English stallion, not as if he had anything to order—for who would have listened to the orders of a Fox?—but only that he might curvette and lancade, and display himself in the utmost possible variety of equestrian situations. Happy and highly-to-be-envied hero! Had a benevolent fairy on that day offered thee companionship with the great and the wise of the earth, and service under those whose service is dominion, thou wouldst certainly have rejected it. Life for thee could show no greater dignity than what was then before thee, clutched with the prophetic certainty of ambitious fancy—the rank of adjutant at a Fox-Commers!

"After much roundabout, the coaches and riders at length found themselves outside the town, and fairly on the road to Reideburg, a village about three miles from Halle. The march, I confess, when we were once fairly in earnest, had as much of the ridiculous as of the sublime. It was not surprising if the rustic Rosinante, that had been yesterday carting sand or peats, should feel to-day somewhat uncomfortable, yoked with all sorts of unmated mates, six together, and no one like another: here the hasty vamping of some crazy cab gave way; there a drunken cabman, or an ambitious Phaeton of a Bursch, blundered himself into the mud, just at the grand moment when in imagination he was leaping the 'flammania moenia mundi.' But young men get out of all difficulties by a laugh: it were well for wise grey-beards sometimes to imitate their example. Our caravan at length arrived at the place of its destination—a fine roomy inn, gaily festooned; and long symmetrically-arranged tables, laden with full flasks, stood before us. With gay hurly-burly, halloo, and hurrah, we entered.

* Camels are quiet, solitary students, who keep apart from all joviality, seeming as if made only to bear the burdens of existence; a race of creatures in the eyes of the genuine Bursch, more contemptible than the Philistine or cit, who loves slavery by necessity, and because he was born to it, never having had an opportunity of sharing the divine "freedom" of the Bursch. Potentates means many things; here legs.

"At the upper end of the tables the seniors and sub-seniors seated themselves. They led off the songs, which were accompanied with music; struck the tables with their swords (making the glasses ring,) to indicate when a verse or the song was ended; commanded 'silentium!' with dictatorial power; and ordained the quantity of glasses to be drunk by each Bursch, according to his age and rank. These draughts the Foxes took with uncovered heads, and standing; the Brandfoxes with uncovered heads also but sitting, or with their caps on but standing; the young, old, and mossy Burschen without ceremony; the candidates, again, at their own tables, and ad libitum;* and the toast of all was the mutual and general weal of the students.

"The officials were in the uniform of their respective clanships; the others were dressed according to their fancy—for the most part in strange and grotesque costume. On their coats shone epaulettes, sometimes their own, oftener borrowed: the stormer (casquet) with high white feathers and golden tassels throned majestically on the head; the thighs and calves of the legs, strongly and clumsily padded, were incased in white, generally leathern breeches; and huge heavy cannons (boots,) with giant spurs, appropriately based the whole. Of course the grand parade-sword was not wanting.

"After all had taken their places, and put away the desire of eating (but not of drinking,) as Homer says, silence was commanded by the presidents, and the song, 'Brüder lagert euch im Kreise' (No. XIII.,) after a prelude by the band, was sung. After this song was ended, one of the presidents called out to his colleagues, 'Schmollis, Brüder Präses!' To which these replied, 'Fiducit!' He then, turning to the company, repeated the same salutation—'Schmollis, ihr Herrn!' which they answered in like wise with a hundred-voiced, loud-bellowing 'Fiducit!' † Then the Foxes, and all the students present, were

* The reader will observe here the different grades of social dignity, which are as essential to Burschen as to angels and devils. It is characteristic that neither a Fox nor a Brandfox is properly a Bursch. Before that noble name can be born a whole year's gestation in the fox or fetus state is necessary.

† Smollis, according to a lexicon of Burschen slang in our possession, is Sis mihi mollis! and Fiducit, a contraction for fiducia sit! Houwald has an allusion to this students' greeting:—

Begreift ihr auch warum man "Smollis" trinket
Und was das tiefe wort "Fiducit" heisst!
"Ja-Smollis dem gangen menschengeschlecht Und dann Fiducit auf Gott und recht—"

To all men Smollis, and in God fiducit;
And what he gives thee freely, freely use it.

ordered to drink certain quanta in manner described; and then this or the other (who, in the singing or other procedure, had failed in any point of Burschen etiquette, as the same is set forth in the Comment, or Bible of Students' Laws) was 'recommended,' that is to say, fined in an additional glass or glasses; and with this—the president calling out, Ex est; Colloquium!—the first act of the Commers ended. Then several songs, mostly from the good old times, as, Vom hohem Olymp (Tait's Magazine, April, 1840, p. 263,) and Wo zur frohen Feierstunde, were sung with the same, or similar ceremonies. In the intervals, much talk, and more drinking. Hereby, and by the terrible thick rolling smoke that could find no exit from the low room, many began to be jovial and blessed (lustig und selig)—a warning that the important ceremonies which yet remained should be gone about forthwith. An ancient, faithful house* accordingly seized a chair, and placed himself, booted and spurred, upon it back foremost; and on this wooden horse, with sword in hand, and grimly painted, opened the 'Fox-ride' (Fuchs-ritt). The Foxes and Brandfoxes, were forced to follow the leader on horses of the same description; and this mad cavalcade, now slowly, now galloping, rode round and through the room several times, amid loud laughter and all sorts of spoken and acted jokes, to the tune of the song, 'Was kommt da von der Höh?' When this hurly-burly was over, the dubbing, or initiation of the Brandfoxes commenced. These were first shut up in an adjoining room; then the more ancient houses formed themselves into a phalanx, and armed themselves with fidibuses an ell long, smeared with oil and tallow, which, on a signal given, were lighted. Then the poor foxes were driven out of their cage, and a chase commenced after them with the burning fidibuses—the aim being to burn their hair. What a rattling and battling, stinking and burning, and topsy-turvy turning, was here! A very bedlam, or witches' dance, as Faust saw it on the Brocken! The 'sly foxes' had most of them soaked their heads in beer to avoid the danger that threatened their long Frankish locks, so dearly prized; but the wooden and paper fidibuses, well tallowed, put such weak inventions mostly to shame.

"After enough of noise and racketing, as the evening began to sink, the 'Landesvater' was sung (Tait's Magazine, April, 1840, p. 261. †) The singing of this solemn Burschen hymn formed a strange contrast to the farcical 'Fox-ride' that preceded it. Here everything proceeds with calm and reverential dignity, according to the opening

* A student who numbers some five or six semestres. "Faithful" (fideli), in students' phrase, is "honest, jovial." "Ein fiderler kerl," is the true German for our English "A good fellow." The word occurs in the Brocken-Intermezzo of Faust.

† Our readers will recollect that, in our second number, we gave a version of the Landesvater, with all the foolish puerilities expurgated; so that it might stand before the English song-lover as what it substantially is—a grand and solemn patriotic hymn. We here take advantage of our narrative to give a more exact idea of the living drama of this famous air, words, 'Alles schweige!' The presidents—in this case only the highest officials—divide the company into equal parts, and arrange their places so that each person sits exactly opposite his vis à vis, and so remains. They then take their own places, two at each end of the table; so that each president rules a quarter of the company to which he is attached. According to the number of those present, two, six, or more tables are prepared. With well-sharpened swords, commanding silence, the presidents then sing aloud the first verse:—

Silence lend all—rapt attend all
To the high and solemn strain!
Song of songs, full well we know thee;
Song of songs, can we bestow thee
On a German ear in vain!

And then, dividing right and left, they turn to their nearest neighbour, hob-nob with him, and sing—

Bright with bold wine from the old Rhine,
Take this goblet in thy hand,—
Take this sword and pierce it freely
Through thy cap, and drink then gleely
To thy German father-land!

The person thus addressed does accordingly; and, after piercing his cap up to the hilt of the sword, lays the two first fingers of his right hand on the blade, and sings solo—

I do pierce my cap, and swear now,
Honour in my breast to wear now,
As a gallant Bursch doth wear!

This procedure is repeated by each president through the whole quarter of the table under his inspection; and, as it is the custom for him to drink something, more or less, with each Bursch, it sometimes happens that, before the end of the ceremony, the president is no longer in a condition to preside. After the swords have been completely laden with caps, the presidents return with them to the ends of the tables, and after mutually piercing one another's caps, commence the redistribution of the whole, each to its proper owner. While doing this, they place the sword across each man's head, and sing—

So take it back; thy brave head wear the bonnet!
My good sword I lay on it.
Long live our brother, N—, brave!
Foul fall the man who calls him knave!

To which the chorus joins—

As long as we shall name him
A brother dear, we claim him:
Long live our brother, N—, brave! *

So till the whole are capped; and with this the Landesvater, and generally, also, the Commers, ends,—at least, any one may now go home without offence. Those who wish to avoid rows take this occasion to retire: those who seek them remain. S— remained. The Saxons and the Märker (Brandenburgers) had long stood in a hostile relation to each other; and as every Commers offers the most convenient opportunity for picking a quarrel, and getting up a duel, S—, being a Märker and ambitious of distinction, remained. Nor was the occasion long wanting to "catch" (fangen) a flat. A luckless peace-loving Saxon was taken to task by the blood-thirsty Märker, and rated soundly, for not having replied to the salutation—"Ich trinke dir vor" (I drink to you,) by the corresponding one—"Ich trinke dir nach." It was in vain that the Saxon replied, such an intimation had never been given, or, at least, that amid so much noise, it was impossible to hear it. S— asseverated loudly; and, on being contradicted steadfastly by his calm opponent, finding that nothing less would do, he roared out a Dummer-Jung! (foolish boy!) and perfected the catastrophe. After this word a duel could not be avoided. S— felt that he was now a genuine Bursch. When the duel should be successfully achieved, the name of fox would remain for a few months, but not the shame."

So ends this half-sublime, half-ridiculous drinking bout of Hallensian Burschen. The sublime, perhaps, will not reveal itself to most of our readers; but it is there certainly and most substantially, as those who have ever heard the Landesvater sung by Burschen, or even have caught an echo from the strains in our second Number, will be prompt to testify. In these rude Commerses we see the grand nursery of German song. "Theodore himself confesses," says Förster, speaking of his friend Körner, "that if his war-songs have obtained any popularity, this is in a great measure to be attributed to the expanding and bracing influence of the STUDENT'S LIFE, (Deutsche Pandora, I. 63.) As for duelling, it is indeed, a folly; but young men cannot be blamed for making an amusement of that which grey-hairs consider to be a duty. Besides the use of the sword strengthens the arm, quickens the eye, and teaches presence of mind,—qualities of as much importance in the education of a young man as Latin and Greek. There are no Burschen, and no duels in Austria; and the consequence is, that these amiable children of the good Kaiser grow up with milk instead of blood in their veins—with soft, pulpy, unaccentuated souls, without boldness, without enterprise, without genius,—less than men at sixty, according to the proverb, because more than boys at sixteen!

Of the three airs which follow, No. XIII. is the most beautiful; No. XIV. and XV. are brisk and comical, and quite in the mad Commers style. CRAMBAMBULI is a famous old air, pretty generally known in this country. In the second set of words which we have given, Mr Lockhart, to whom they are attributed, has, by the two original verses (second and third,) made a soldier's song of it; and as such it sings well. These words will be sung with more dash and briskness; the Burschikose words with more of playful humour, and in company only of those who are prepared to relish a student's song, which not every one has sense enough to do. The Tee-total words, with which we have been supplied by a Tee-total Bursch, have the variation of a tee-to-tum (the note A three times) in the second line, supplying the place of Vallera! found in some editions of Crambambuli. No. XV.

* The music that accompanies the redistribution of the caps, is quite different from the Landesvater. The solemn changes into the soothing and cheerful. Possibly we may print it in some future Number, should a happy chance wed it to good words.

Brethren, circle round in chorus,
Sing as sang our sires before us,
Quaff your glasses, wave your bonnets,
To our German liberty!

Paths by rosy boyhood haunted,
When young hearts with high hopes panted,
To each early fond remembrance
Fill a brimming glass of glee!

To all lovely maidens fill we!
Chaste as charming may they still be!
Pour a sparkling bright libation
To the maids of Germany!

To all Deutschland's sons who love her
Fill a bumper foaming over,
Men who stand and fall for freedom,
Fatherland, who fell for thee!

Men who moved our hearts to duty,
Taught us wisdom, showed us beauty,

Whom we honour, whom we follow,
Fill to them with three times three!

Friends whom Fate from friends hath riven,
To hot suns and cold skies driven,
Far from home new homes creating,
Bless them, God, where'er they be!

Brothers, whom no sorrows cumber,
Cradled in death's dewy slumber,
Pour to them this pure libation—
May they sleep, and dream of us!

And, when life's harsh toils are over,
Under lime-trees' cooling cover,
Brother brave shall meet brave brother,
And remain for ever thus.

When I cross the dingy ferry,
Trusty Charon, in thy wherry,
O then one last draught restoring
Give for my last obolus!

No fuming roast or boil deceives me,

Then blows the guard his taranti,

As some vile imp my soul possessed ;
When heaped distempers goad me madly,

Why ! don't you see our merry mugs
Bright with Crambambuli, &c.

Were I the Kaiser Maximilian,
A noble order in the land
I'd make, and write in bright vermillion,
This motto on a silver band—
"Toujours fidèle et sans souci,

Crambambuli, the world all over,
Thou'rt mother's milk to Germans true ;
No cure like thee can sage discover,
For colic, love, or devils blue ;
Blow hot, blow cold, from morn till night,
My dram is still my soul's delight,

Hungry and tired with bivouacking,
I'll rise at song of earliest bird ;
Cannons and drums our ears are cracking,
And saddle, boot, and blade's the word :
" Vite, en avant !" the bugle blows,
A flying gulp, and off it goes,
Crambambimbambuli ! crambambuli !

Victory's ours, off speed despatches,
Huzza ! for once the luck is mine !
Food comes by morsels, sleep by snatches,
No time, by Jove, to wash or dine ;
From post to post my pipe I cram,
Full gallop, smoke, and suck my dram
Crambambimbambuli ! crambambuli !

When I'm the peer of kings and kaisers,
An order of mine own I'll found ;
Down goes our gage to all despisers,
Our motto through the world shall sound,
" *Toujours fidèle et sans souci,
C'est l'ordre de Crambambuli.*"
Crambambimbambuli ! crambambuli !

TEE-TO-TUM ; OR, THE TEMPERANCE CRAMBAMBULI.

BY A TEE-TOTAL BURSCHE.

Tee-totalism, that's the nostrum
For every ill that flesh inherits ; tee-to-tum !
My muse in triumph mounts the rostrum,
A Balaam banning ARDENT SPIRITS.
At morning bright, at noon, at night,
Tee-tôtal cups are my delight.
Tee-to-tee-totalism, tee-to-tum !

The blood to madness' top it urges,
Each folly to the light it ferrets ; tee-to-tum !
Or in Lethæan dulness merges,
'Tis "double-distilled damnation" SPIRITS !
But whose drinks the fountain, knows,
How musical his clear blood flows
By tee-to-totalism, tee-to-tum !

New schemes and projects transcendental,
In town, in country, loud they cry ; tee-to-tum !
You may try them all—you will repent all—(Even New Moral Worlds ;) but if you try
Tee-total once, you will confess,
You have one headach then the less
By tee-to-totalism, tee-to-tum !

Blind fools ! attend the birds' blithe carol ;
They know no whisky, need no wine ; tee-to-tum !
Ye taint your throats, and roar and quarrel,
Like tigers rage, and roll like swine ;

While I, so tight in all my joints,
Still whistle on my finger points,
Tee-to-tee-totalism, tee-to-tum !

Ye drink till night shrinks from the dawning,
And senseless to your beds are drawn ; tee-to-tum !
Then late you wake with leaden yawning,
As poor magnetic maidens yawn ;
While I do greet with break of light,
St. Anthony* in pure delight,
And sing, Tee-to-talism, tee-to-tum !

I tell ye truth, I don't deceive ye,
One pious priest, a Papist brave ; tee-to-tum !
Has saved more souls from death, believe me,
Than all the state-paid Churchmen save.
'Tis Father Matthew's mystic pledge
That sets the devil's teeth on edge,
By tee-to-totalism, tee-to-tum !

Against the Devil the only mail sure,
Is to keep out of the Devil's way ; tee-to-tum !
The truth is great and will prevail sure,
As Matthew sure prevails to-day
Above the Church, the revenue—
And greater wonders yet will do
By tee-to-totalism, tee-to-tum !

THE LADIES' CRAMBAMBULI.

BY A THELEMIT.†

No more we'll sing of sorrows sentimental,
Of maidens fond, and faithless swains,
Of mosques, kiosks, and bulbuls oriental,
Of broken hearts and maddened brains.
Leave sighs to tabbies drenched with tea,
We'll laugh and quaff Crambambuli.
Crambimbambambuli, Crambambuli.

Noyeau is good—a little of a forenoon—
Seductive is " Parfait Amour,"
" Eau d'or" divine ! but they become a bore soon,—
Such sugared sweets to cloy are sure.
The veritable Eau de vie
Is exquisite Crambambuli.
Crambimbambambuli, &c.

Like nectar, it both fires the heart and mellows,
Beams in the eyes, glows in the tongue ;
Inspired by it, we captivate the fellows ;
They sink before us, old and young.
The little trickiest god, 'twas he Invented first Crambambuli.
Crambimbambambuli, &c.

Fie on all prudes, on all strait-laced precisians,
Would mould us maids to statues cold ;
Would chain our lips, and blight the rosy visions
To love's believing eyes unrolled !
Ye icicles, we shall be free !
And quip and sip Crambambuli.
Crambimbambambuli, &c.

† See Rabelais, Book I. chap. 57. The fair contributor of these verses (who belongs to an order of females now almost extinct, and which will soon be known only in the annals of science, with the great elk and the Dodo) has given eleven instead of nine syllables in the first and third verses of each stanza ; an agreeable variation, which does not disturb the music, and gives the whole air a more brisk and lively character. It belongs to the national character of the Germans to sing even comic songs slower than is agreeable to our English taste ; besides that the more full vocalty of the German language more naturally admits the singing of one syllable to two notes.

With friends around, with many a true and dear one,
Light in each eye, heart on each lip,

Shall we the flowing joy not sip!

With song and jest not show, that we

Chaplets they twined at feasts of old in far lands,
To cool brows flushing high with wine;
Wit, poesy, and song these, these shall be our garlands,
To crown our feasts with rosy twine.

These, these the blooming graces be,
That wait on our Crambambuli.
Crambimbambambuli, &c.

Come, ladies, come, I crave from you a bumper,
From one, from all, petites and tall;
You maids that are slim, and you that are plumper,
Both fair and dark, obey my call.

"The frank, the generous, brave and free!"
These pledge in your Crambambuli.

LETTER TO MR. TAIT FROM RICHARD COBDEN, Esq., (THE "MANCHESTER MANUFACTURER,") ON THE EASTERN QUESTION.

DEAR SIR,—The British Parliament, which is about to assemble, will, I venture to prophesy, be found concentrating its earliest attention upon the affairs of a remote and barbarous people, to the omission or postponement of those vital questions that interest the people of these realms. Turkey, Syria, and Egypt, will take precedence of import duties, currency, corn-laws, and the Scotch Church; and the question of questions with our representatives will be, the maintenance of the integrity and independence of the Ottoman Empire.

Having a few years ago, partly at your suggestion,* embarked in a controversy upon the Eastern question, I became so far interested in the subject as to be induced to pay a brief visit to Turkey, Egypt, and Greece, in the Spring of 1837, for the purpose of making inquiries on the spot, as to the actual state of things in those countries; the result of which effectually opened my eyes to the amount of misrepresentation that had for years been industriously spread respecting the alleged reforms and improvements going on in the Ottoman Empire. Ten years had elapsed since the complete destruction of the janissaries, during which time the Sultan had been, according to popular belief, industriously occupied in effecting the most important ameliorations in the social and political institutions of the country; judge then of my surprise at finding the unanimous opinion of all with whom I conversed in Turkey, to be—that the condition of the mass of the people had greatly deteriorated subsequently to the fall of that turbulent but powerful militia. The Janissaries formed a kind of national guard, drawn chiefly from the ranks of the population of Constantinople; but having their ramifications also throughout the provinces. Any extreme act of oppression, on the part of a minister or subordinate functionary, was taken cognizance of by this body; which was, to a certain extent, a shield between the government and the people. Had the massacre of the janissaries been really followed by those vigorous reforms in the public administration, which were expected from Sultan Mahmoud, it might have been the tragical precursor of an improved state of things: they were the conservatives of ancient institutions in Church and State; and no essential innovations could have been attempted whilst they were allowed to retain their powerful organization. But the Sultan was wholly unequal to the task of regenerating his country. Instead of possessing the genius of a Peter, or even a Mehemet Ali, he was weak and vacillating; and the sole act of vigour which characterized his reign, that of the destruction of the janissaries, was planned and executed by Hussein Pasha, and a few daring spirits, almost without the personal intervention of the sovereign.

* A silly charge is made against me in a recent pamphlet by Mr. Cargill, of having been instigated to write by the Ministry of the day.

That event left him at liberty to pursue an uninterrupted course of change; but instead of applying his mind to such reforms as would essentially alter the character of his people, and prepare them for important modifications of their institutions, he amused himself with mere externals—he compelled his courtiers to dispense with the turban, and adopt the costume of Franks—to substitute English saddles for the old wooden platform of the Turks, with similar innovations; whilst all beyond the circle in which he immediately moved remained unchanged.

In the meantime he gave himself up to the guidance of a succession of favourites, who, having nothing to fear from the janissaries, plundered and oppressed the people, by selling the produce of the soil to monopolists. These favourites were generally raised from the lowest ranks of life, and had no other aim but to secure a fortune during the brief period that the sun of royal favour shone upon them. The Sultan was amusing himself with the most childish pursuits, whilst the world was giving him credit for bestowing all his thoughts upon the improvement of his country. One of his propensities was the multiplying of his residences. Thirty-two palaces and kiosks adorned the shores of the Bosphorus, and whilst I was at Constantinople, he was erecting another which gave rise to the report that the astrologers (in whom he implicitly confided) had predicted, that when he ceased to build he would die. He was passionately addicted to the bottle; and his face, when I saw him, bore the usual evidences of deep potations: yet, whilst violating in this particular, the precepts of his religion, he lent himself to the most rigid enforcement of its forms upon the people. When I was at Constantinople, the populace were actually driven to the mosques five times a-day by the police with whips, pursuant to an order just before obtained from the Sultan by the ministers of religion.

During the period that intervened between the destruction of the janissaries and the death of Mahmoud, great and systematic exertions were made by a school of writers, which one might dub the philo-Turk, to impress the public mind of England and Europe with the belief that Turkey was making rapid strides in the path of reform and civilisation. They went so far, indeed, as to point to the system of "direct taxation," and to the "municipal institutions" existing in Turkey, as models worthy of imitation for other countries. Direct and indirect taxation I found in abundance; but I sought in vain for anything resembling the local self-government which constitutes our municipalities. The Turks have no such institutions at all; but the Rayas do associate themselves in a kind of religious fraternity, without, however, having any voice in the amount of the taxes imposed,—their privilege, in fiscal matters, being confined to the mode in which they raise the arbitrary imposts laid upon them;—in fact, the municipalities may be described by reference to an incident in Anastasius, where the Turkish collector sends for the recognised heads of a village, mentions the amount he requires, and gives them the privilege of raising the money in any way they please; then, lighting his pipe, he adds, that if it be not ready by the time he has finished his tobacco, their heads must pay the penalty.

But not only have writers been at work: our diplomatists and our armaments have been employed in "maintaining the integrity of the Ottoman empire!" A powerful fleet has, for many years, been employed in the Mediterranean, under the pretence of watching over the safety of Turkey: that fleet has latterly been occupied in demolishing the fortified and unfortified places, and destroying thousands of lives on the coast of Syria, in order to rescue that province from the hands of a rebel pasha, and place it again in the power of his so-called master:—all which has been done pursuant to a treaty entered into "in the name of the most merciful God," (!) and declared to have been agreed to by four parties, "animated by the desire to watch over the maintenance of the integrity of the Ottoman empire;" and one of the parties is Russia!!

It would be useless to go back to the origin of this treaty; because, when once the hand of a foreign minister is set to such things, the country must take the consequences; but that there has been treachery and duplicity in one quarter at least, and folly, if nothing worse, in others, nobody who has been in Turkey, or who has made himself acquainted with the actual condition of the country, can for a moment doubt. The evil under which the Ottoman empire suffers is a chronic disease of the heart, which it is proposed to cure by encumbering it with bruised and mortified extremities! To hand over Syria, in a state of anarchy, to Turkey,—to bestow on her the distant possessions of the holy cities,—to bid her build up fortresses, organize the population, and retain these worthless possessions now, which she could not hold when in a more vigorous state,—is like putting a load upon the shoulders of a prostrate man, in order that he may be the better able to raise himself upon his feet, and walk. When in Turkey, I heard but one opinion from intelligent men—"This people cannot regenerate themselves; occupation from without must precede regeneration." In the meantime, we are deluding ourselves with the belief that Hatti Sheriffs and commercial treaties,—measures dictated by foreigners,—will resuscitate a people, the cause of whose decay lies in the profound depths of their religion, laws, institutions, and language;—a people whose destiny is now in no better keeping than that of a boy-Sultan, whose education has been that of a rigid Turk and Mohammedan, and who is governed by women, eunuchs, and slaves.

As during the approaching debates in Parliament upon the Eastern question, much will be said about the necessity of "maintaining the integrity of the Ottoman Empire;" it is to be hoped, that some members will be found to insist upon definite information as to the means by which this end is to be obtained. The facts of the case ought to be fully before the House before any legislative sanction be given to a course of foreign policy, involving this country in incalculable expense. It is not a little odd, that we think it necessary to send forth Commissioners in England, to collect evidence, before legislating upon factories or a constabulary force; but sit down very complacently to the task of "maintaining the integrity of the Ottoman Empire," in the absence of any such information. It will be said, probably, that our ambassadors afford sufficient means of supplying the knowledge we stand in need of; but, being themselves parties to those diplomatic intrigues, in which passions and prejudices become excited, they are the very last persons to judge coolly upon the facts of the case. Although no friend to Commissions in general, let me suggest, that if we are to "maintain the integrity of the Ottoman Empire," it would be well to ascertain the nature and extent of the undertaking, and the best mode of doing it; and this would be known, by taking evidence on the spot; or, if that be too great an innovation, let the most intelligent residents in Turkey be brought home to be examined before a Committee of Inquiry; and let one of these witnesses be our highly respected and experienced Consul-general, Mr. Cartwright, who has spent a long life in the Levant.

As every addition, however slight, to the stock of facts possessed by the public, upon the subject of Turkey, will be of interest at the present moment, you will probably favour me with the insertion of the accompanying short extracts from my note-book, in your February number; and although my name can add very little weight or influence to the pages of your Magazine, yet, as it will be a voucher for the authenticity of the communication, I send it; and remain,

Dear sir, your obedient servant,

RICHARD COBDEN.

MANCHESTER, 10th January, 1841.

SCHOOLS IN TURKEY.

Having read much respecting the great reforms which the late Sultan Mahmoud had effected in the education of his people,* I was naturally anxious, on arriving at Constantinople, to inspect some of the new schools. A Mr. —, a correspondent of a London paper, and one of the new sect of Philo-Turks, who had been actively engaged in writing-up this country, kindly undertook to accompany me to see an establishment conducted upon the Lancasterian principle, situated a little distance beyond Dolné Backaké. We were detained about half an hour in an entrance-room whilst the boys were washing and praying; which ceremony, we were told, they performed five times a-day, according to the rites of the Mohammedan faith. We were shown over the school by a gentlemanly young Turk, who had been in Paris, and spoke French fluently. The Sultan had made it his hobby for a time, and everything was accordingly arranged in a rich and fanciful manner. The curtains of the little tent-beds (a novelty in the East) were hung in the French taste; and there was a magnificent little closet, beautifully fitted up, in which the Sultan could loll at his ease, concealed behind the gilt trellis-work, and see the boys at their tasks or devotions.

* "The nation itself has made, within ten years, a progress in opinion and public education such as no other people of Europe has made in a century."—England, France, Russia, and Turkey, by Mr. Urquhart.

We came at length to the lecture-room, where we found a respectable-looking old Turk, surrounded by about sixty or seventy remarkably fine handsome-looking boys, to whom he was giving a lecture upon history. A large map was spread out upon a table, just below the raised desk at which he was seated, to which he pointed from time to time with his wand. Russia happened to be the subject upon which he was discoursing, and he was alluding to the acquisition of the province of Courland, in 1795, at the moment when we entered. The huge territory of this distended empire stretched over one half the canvass that covered the table; and the old professor, wishing to point out the province under consideration, leaned forward, and carefully traced, with the point of his wand, the whole area from the Baltic to the Black Sea; he then traversed the circumference of the map with no better success: the boys who were sitting round upon a raised amphitheatrical bench, looking on very gravely all the while, nothing surprised, apparently, at the old gentleman's embarrassment. At length he descended from his rostrum, and took his place at the table beside us, exchanging a smile of recognition with my companion. Again he explored the colossal empire from Prussia to China, but with no better luck; when he turned good-humouredly to Mr. —, and requested him, in French, to point out the lost province. My companion was a little disconcerted at my being a witness of a scene so little calculated to confirm the favourable opinion of the proficiency of Turkish professors, with which he had been labouring to impress me; and I could not help rallying him with the suggestion, that, unless better progress were made, some future Mussulman geographer in Asia would probably be one day making a similar fruitless search in the map of Russia for the province of Roumelia.

Before taking our departure, I asked our young Turkish conductor to direct me to some other schools carried on upon the new principle, when, to my astonishment, he informed me that there were no others upon the European system.

"No other reform schools but this in Constantinople!" I exclaimed.

"Not another in all Turkey," was the reply.

The fact was afterwards admitted to me, that this establishment was founded more to amuse the Sultan than for any other purpose. Many of the fine lads I had seen were Circassian and Georgian slaves belonging to him. The rest of the youth of Turkey are being educated precisely on the same principle now as in the time of Soliman the Magnificent—the Koran, and the commentaries thereon, being the sum-total of their studies. Need I add how greatly I had been misled by those writers-up of this country, who had taught me to expect to find a general system of instruction adopted in the large towns after the models of Christian Europe. No! there is no jeune Turquie.

THE RAYAS.

A large proportion of the population of Turkey—I have heard it estimated as the majority—consist of Rayas, or non-Mussulman subjects of the Porte. They consist chiefly of Greeks and Armenians, together with some Jews. The Christians of Turkey form a much more industrious and useful body than the Turks. The Armenians are the bankers and manufacturers of the country; they are also the best agriculturists, their villages being always distinguished by cleanliness and neatness; the cleverest mechanics and domestic architects are also to be found amongst this sect of Christians. The bustling, quick, and enterprising Greeks are the shipowners, foreign merchants, interpreters, and professional people. The Rayas pay a haratch or capitation tax, distinct from the taxes laid upon Turks; they are, besides, subjected to a thousand indignities; and even the richest of them lead a stealthy and secluded life. The Christian, in a lawsuit against a Turk, must have Turkish evidence; whereas the Turk can avail himself of Turk or Raya in his defence. The Rayas are compelled to wear a distinguishing badge upon their dress; they are thrust aside in the bazaar, custom-house, or the streets, by the meanest Turk; they would not presume to hire a caïque of three oars to cross the Bosphorus; and even if seated in a smaller boat, the lowest Turk might order him out, and take his place, nor would the boatmen dare, even for ten times his fare, to prefer the Christian. The late Sultan ordered an Armenian to be severely bastinadoed for meeting him on horseback in the street; and he issued an order forbidding the Rayas to ride in Constantinople. On another occasion, the Armenians were interdicted from wearing shawls round their calpacs, or to carry umbrellas. The Sarafs, or bankers, can, by bribing their patron pashas, exempt themselves from these regulations. To escape similar vexations, the Rayas enter a kind of corporation called barratees, when, by paying a large entrance-fee, and a certain annual sum, they are released from the haratch, the extra customs, &c.

Whilst in Turkey, I was an eye-witness to a couple of scenes that afforded striking illustrations of the depressed fate of the Christian population. Walking one day in Constantinople, after a snow storm, I came upon a large party of Armenians and Greeks, with brooms, busily at work, sweeping the mud from the pavement: many of them appeared like respectable men of business; they had all been seized, as they were passing, by the Turkish guards, who put brooms in their hands, and stood over them whilst they did their work. A friend of mine, a merchant in Constantinople, had an Armenian in his employ as a kind of inferior broker, who attended to small matters at the custom-house, and other business. The man had done a few errands for me, and had acted once or twice as, my guide. Upon calling on my friend one morning, he told me that his clerk was at home very ill with a fever, occasioned by the following adventure, the particulars of which I afterwards took down from the man's own lips. He was despatched by Mr. — up the Bosphorus, on business, in a caïque, which, instead of having seats like our boats, is so constructed that the passengers are obliged to sit at the bottom to avoid an overturn. The Armenian, having straps on, could not double his legs beneath him, à la Turque, but raised them upon the side, and presented the soles of his feet after the fashion of brother Jonathan. To avoid the current, the boatman pulled pretty near shore, and passed close to a palace occupied by Halil Pasha, (originally a Georgian slave,) at the moment when he happened to be looking out of the window: there was a pair of feet in the very posture for the bastinado! The temptation was too great—with a wave of his finger he beckoned the caïque: the man would as soon have thought of turning the current of the Bosphorus as resisting the will of the favourite, Halil. The Armenian was horrified at finding the head of the boat touching the steps of the palace, whilst the pasha himself was watching his arrival at the window. In a second, the man sprung upon the towing path, and flew on the wings of terror towards his home in the city, which he no sooner reached, than he sent a message to his employer, imploring him to make his peace with the dreaded Halil. Being a lusty man, and, like many of his sect, not blessed with an over-endowment of courage, the Armenian was seized with fever, for which he was bled, and confined for several days to his house. Mr. — sent word to the pasha that the man was in his employ, and laid the rest of the blame upon the straps, which prevented him from taking a posture more respectful to the palace of the Sultan's son-in-law!

To protect themselves effectually against the exactions and annoyances, and even violence of the Turks, the more wealthy of the Rayas, especially those connected with foreign trade, have become naturalised citizens of other countries. Some adopt English, others French; but by far the greater number choose Russian protection. It speaks volumes as to the comparative security to life and property in Russia and in Turkey, to find the timid Armenians and acute Greeks flocking to Odessa, to return again the naturalised subjects of the Czar!

TRADE BETWEEN ENGLAND AND TURKEY.

Much misapprehension exists upon the subject of the trade between England and Turkey. Lord Dudley Stuart and others have constantly, and it is hoped ignorantly, misrepresented this question. I felt considerable interest, whilst in the Levant, in investigating the subject of the actual amount of British products consumed in Turkey. I saw every British merchant in Constantinople; the principal ones in Smyrna; the whole of the trading community in Syria; and I made it my primary study to ascertain the exact extent of the trade of those ports, and the other places of the Turkish empire.

On an average of years, the imports of British products to Constantinople amount to from £1,000,000 to £1,100,000; two-thirds of which go forward to Persia, and the rest remain for the consumption of Turkey. I feel justified in saying, that the imports of British products into Constantinople, for the consumption of Turkey, amount to £450,000; in fact, I am convinced that this exceeds the amount.

At Smyrna, I was told by our own vice-consul, that last year there was one ship only arrived with British products from England, and that was but half freighted with manufactures. The best estimate that I could form was, that there is not £60,000 per annum of our products carried direct to Smyrna.

I met, both at Constantinople and Smyrna, individuals acquainted with the trade of Salonica. They informed me that there was scarcely any importation of British goods now into that port: their estimates were under £40,000 per annum.

At the island of Syra, which is the principal seat of the Greek trade, I made the acquaintance of the principal merchants, as well as of Mr Wilkinson, our consul. I received from the latter a statement of the importation of British products, which amounted to £110,337. From the principal Greek merchants, I learned that about one-third of the imports are designed for consumption in Greece; whilst two-thirds are carried to the Turkish islands, the coast of Anatolia, &c. I therefore estimate the importation of our goods into Turkey, through the Greek island of Syra, at £80,000.

I should be inclined to estimate the value of the British products, which reach Turkey through all other channels, as almost below notice. If, however, we add £50,000 per annum to the foregoing, it will more than satisfy the truth of the case.

The following is the summary of the foregoing:—

Constantinople, exclusive of the Persian trade,	£450,000
Smyrna, direct from Great Britain,	60,000
Salonica,	40,000
Imports at Syra, on account of the trade of Turkey,	80,000
Other channels,	50,000
	£680,000

In every case I have exceeded the estimates of the most competent judges; and I am, therefore, prepared to prove, as far as such things admit of demonstration, that the amount of our exportation of British products to Turkey does not exceed £680,000.

The Persian trade, which forms really so large a portion of that which is put down as the trade of Turkey, was formerly carried on through other channels. Previous to 1790, our exports to Persia went principally by way of Aleppo, where there were twenty-eight English houses established. The shipments were made at two seasons of the year, and in large vessels, to Scanderoun or Latikeia, at which places there were large warehouses for dépôts. After that epoch, the stream of commerce took the direction of Bombay for the lower division of Persia, and the German fairs and Russia for the other parts. The modern route, by Constantinople, was opened up about fifteen years ago. At present, almost the whole of our exports to Persia go by way of the Turkish capital and Trebisonde, which is the most direct and economical route. The apparent increase of our shipments to Turkey has been seized upon by the writers-up of this country as a proof of its increasing prosperity: (it has been made, too, the pretence for enlarging our armament and our consular establishments.) Those writers forget the fact, that half a million worth of our exports went formerly to Persia, by way of Bombay; whereas now, not a tenth of that amount go by the circuitous route of the Cape. Many of the articles sold in Constantinople for Persia are inquired for by the buyers in the old Indian names.

I have not included the trade of Syria, Egypt, or the African coast, in the foregoing estimate of the trade of Turkey, because they are only nominally subjected to the Ottoman government. The principal port of Syria at present, for British trade, is Beyrout; and I have heard the importation of our products estimated to be £100,000 through that place. The whole of the trade with Egypt is carried on through Alexandria; and I was told by the best informed merchants there, that the importation of British manufactures into Egypt had fallen below £100,000 per annum.

No direct trade is carried on from England to Tripoli or Tunis. If a few British goods reach those places, they go by way of Malta, or some other port of the Mediterranean. Algiers is, of course, supplied by France. Our trade with Morocco is chiefly in the hands of the Gibraltar merchants.

I should wish to add, with reference to the progressive state of the trade with Turkey, that whilst Lord D. Stuart, Mr. Urquhart, and others, maintain that a rapid increase is going on in our commerce with that country, I found the merchants of Constantinople, Smyrna, and Syra, of opinion, that, during the last ten years, a decline has annually taken place in the money amount of our exportations for the Turkish markets. At the same time, however, the bulk and quantity of goods have been continually augmenting; owing to the circumstance of the rapid impoverishment of the population, which compels the consumer to use a coarser and cheaper article of dress. Thus, for example, the people who, twenty years ago, wore India muslins or fine jacconets, are now content to dress in coarse shirting calicos. The bales of goods which were, ten years ago, valued at £60 or £70 each, are now estimated, although more bulky, at £30 to £35. This partly explains the error, into which some writers fall, upon the subject of the increasing amount of our trade with Turkey: they mistake bulk for value.

The merchants of Constantinople have not, in general, (with the exception of a few Greeks,) been very successful in their undertakings. Scarcely one considerable fortune has been realized amongst the English: and some of the oldest houses have hardly done more than maintain unimpaired their respectability. One of the principal causes assigned for this want of prosperity, was, that the currency has been continually debased* by the government, and the interests of the importers have as constantly been sacrificed. In 1807, the pound Sterling was equal to fifteen piastres; in 1819, it was worth thirty-five piastres. When I was at Constantinople, in February 1837, the exchange was at one hundred and five piastres; and shortly afterwards it had risen to one hundred and ten. It would be needless to point out the mode in which such a system tends to confiscate the property of the importing merchant. One house told me that, a month previously, the exchange went up, in one day, from ninety-eight to one hundred and six, by which they incurred a loss of eight per cent. upon the whole amount of their book-debts—about £30,000 at that moment: they were determined not to sell any more for credit. As a natural consequence of this repeated degradation of the standard, a constant exportation of specie had been going on; the gold and silver coin had gradually disappeared, and I found the principal part of the current coin to consist of tokens, called bechlecks, of little intrinsic value. The government have since resorted to an issue of paper money, which has already become depreciated; and it appears not unlikely that the troubles of this tottering empire will receive their coup-de-grace from a deluge of assignats.

CAUSES OF THE LOW STATE OF COMMERCE.

When we reflect upon the almost boundless extent and variety of the natural resources of the countries comprised in the Turkish empire,—when we recollect that Asia Minor itself, in ancient times, contained several renowned kingdoms, and boasted of cities and temples unrivalled for their wealth and splendour,—and when we look at the extent of coast, and the commodious natural harbours possessed by this country, we feel at a loss to account for the insignificant extent of the commerce carried on by the Turks. Nor is this to be accounted for by the existence of restrictive customs duties for the protection of the home manufacturers: the latter have declined as much or more rapidly than the foreign trade; and both have suffered from the like cause—the rapacity and stupid despotism of the rulers. Never have trade, manufactures, or agriculture flourished beneath the withering rule of Turks. If in an obscure corner of their vast territory any bright exception to the general desolation be found, it may be traced to the absence of Mussulmans. Take, for examples, Hydra, Spezzia, and Ipsara. These are little better than small insular rocks, whose very existence was unknown, for a long time, to their barbarous owners: they became places of refuge for a few Greek boatmen, who subsisted at first by fishing. By degrees, the genius of this people triumphed over every disadvantage: they became the owners of a few merchant ships, which were the carriers of the neighbouring islands and coasts. They were then made subject to the rule of the Capitan Pasha; from whom, however, they received no other molestation than an occasional visit, and a demand for a few pilots or sailors. At length, these islanders became possessed of a thousand sail of vessels, of every size, trading with almost every port of the Mediterranean; and carrying home wealth which enabled their owners to erect mansions, to surround themselves with refinements and luxuries, and to clothe their native crags with groves and gardens. Then the genius of freedom, which has ever been the attendant upon commerce, inspired the souls of Condiottiis, and other patriotic shipowners, with the idea of Grecian liberty. They converted their merchantmen into vessels of war, hoisted the standard of freedom at every mast, and, putting forth Miaulis, Canaris, and other heroes, they achieved the emancipation of their country from Ottoman tyranny. The cause of this glorious event is given in a word—those islands were not cursed by the presence of Turkish governors or pashas.

Scio is an island about double the size of the Isle of Wight; like it presenting, to the side of the open sea, a wall of precipitous rocks, and offering to the spectator, who sails along the narrow strait, which separates it from the main land, a series of sloping hills and picturesque valleys. This island, with a population of upwards of 100,000 Greeks, was a kind of appanage of the Sultana-mother; and, although ruled nominally by a governor and a garrison of two or three hundred Turks, the latter were, in fact, treated rather as their guests than their masters, and the inhabitants governed themselves by their own laws. Scio became the garden of the Archipelago: the wealthy Greeks retired there after a life of successful commerce. Thither the aged and timid flocked for security; and the widow and orphan, that they might enjoy that protection and means of instruction which no other part of their enslaved country afforded. There, too, was congregated all that was most refined, intelligent, and captivating of Greek society:—the very name of Sciote, when applied to females, implied fascination and beauty. To complete the picture, schools, colleges, and libraries were established in this happy island. Such were the fruits of an exemption from Turkish visitation. The dismal reverse of this picture remains to be told. Upon the breaking out of the Greek Revolution, the Sciotes, conscious of their defenceless situation, renounced all participation in the plans of the insurgents; and the heads of their church, and a number of the principal inhabitants, voluntarily became hostages for the good conduct of their fellow-citizens. The struggle between the Mussulman and Christian, the tyrant and the slave, became a religious war; and the hapless inhabitants of Scio were at length given over, by a mandate from Constantinople, to the fanaticism of the faithful. There was immediately a rush from the capital, and from the large towns on the coast of Asia Minor, towards Tchesmé, the nearest point of embarkation to Scio. One cannot better picture the horrors that followed, than by imagining that the Isle of Wight, with its happy and cultivated population, were suddenly given over to the lawless violence of fifty thousand of the most desperate characters of London, Portsmouth, Southampton, and the other large towns of the south, armed with knives, pistols, and guns;—imagine the worst that could arise from the unbridled cruelty and lust of such a mass;—imagine fields covered with wounded fugitives, streets filled with mangled corpses, the churches heaped with slain, and the rooms of every mansion and villa, from the kitchen to the nursery, reeking with the blood of men, women, and children. Not one house, excepting those belonging to the consuls, escaped destruction. Fire, sword, and the still more deadly passions of fanaticism and lust, ravaged the island for three months, during which such horrors were enacted, related to me by eye-witnesses, as quite mock all human credulity. Of one hundred thousand inhabitants, not five thousand were left alive upon the island. Forty thousand of both sexes were sold into slavery, and the harems of Turkey, of Asia, and Africa,* are still filled with the female victims. Such was the massacre of Scio, unparalleled in modern history, (a tragedy compared, by the British consul, an eye-witness, to the destruction of Jerusalem,) which thrilled the public mind of Europe and America with horror, and led to that intervention of the Christian powers, which saved Greece.

A brief notice of the subsequent history of the few wealthy inhabitants who escaped by flight or emancipation from the catastrophe, will still further illustrate the beneficial effects of the absence of Turks.

Upon the settlement of the boundaries of the new kingdom of Greece, Scio was left in the hands of the Turks; and the few merchants who had escaped the massacre went in search of a new asylum. The little barren island of Syra, having had only a few Roman Catholic inhabitants, was considered to be under a kind of French protection, and had hoisted the flag of that nation over its church, as a safeguard against the visitations of Turkish vessels of war. Thither the Sciote refugees fled; and, although they had suffered such terrible losses, their activity and perseverance overcame all obstacles. There were no inhabitants on the island, excepting those few congregated together at the little port: there could, therefore, be no home trade; but a considerable transit trade was soon established; and, ten years after, on visiting Syra, I found a town of fourteen thousand inhabitants, with hospitals, schools, and substantial public buildings;—there I found a quay of solid masonry, a thing which does not exist even in Constantinople; and, in the little basin, I counted double the number of ships that I had left the week before in the spacious harbour of Smyrna:—the cause of all this lies in a word—in Syra I did not find one Turk. The Prince's Island in the sea of Marmora, Samos, and other spots where Christians have exclusively congregated, might be adduced, to illustrate the advantages always derived, by commerce and civilisation, from the absence of the Turks.

* Whilst I was at Cairo, one of these unfortunates, an accomplished young female, escaped from a harem and took refuge with the Greek consul. The latter, who was a mere creature of Mehemet Ali, received his orders to give her up. Under pretence of conveying her to a place of safety, the wretch carried her back, by a circuitous route, to the residence of her owner. No sooner did she discover his perfidy, than she threw herself upon the ground, and entreated him to kill her. Her cries were, however, in vain: she was dragged back to her prison-home, and the next day the report spread through Cairo that she had been cruelly murdered. Colonels Campbell and Duhamel, the British and Russian consuls, appealed to the pasha against the invasion of the consular rights, in forcing the female from her place of refuge. He pleaded the Koran! said he had no power to interfere in the affairs of the harem, and there it ended.

Under the late Sultan, a system of monopolies was commenced, which tended probably, more than anything besides, to dry up the resources of the government, by putting a check to the cultivation of the soil. After every other means of exaction had been exhausted; after the Armenian bankers had been, one by one, ruined by the successive depreciations of the currency, and the more direct extortions of the government; and after the circulating coin itself had been almost wholly banished from the country, there was no other resource left but to prey directly upon the husbandman. The Sultan, or any of his favourites (for since the destruction of the janissaries there have been virtually scores of sultans), disposed of the coming crops to the highest bidder at Constantinople, and bought them from the cultivator at any price he pleased to give. Whilst I was at Constantinople, a deputation was there from Mytelene, to remonstrate against a sale, which had been made by one of the pashas, of the oil of that island: the purchaser of the tsakeri, or order from the favourite, claimed the oil at a price that was ruinous to the growers. When I inquired of my informant how they would succeed in setting aside this transaction, I was told that the deputation must bribe another pasha! Similar monopolies were sold of valonia, opium, silk, figs, grain, and every other article of produce. The consequence was, that the farmers ceased to produce more than was necessary for their own immediate use. The country was lying waste even in the neighbourhood of Constantinople, the inhabitants of which were dependent upon Russia for their daily bread! In some districts, the cultivators had cut down the valonia trees to save themselves from the unprofitable labour of gathering the produce for others. It must be borne in mind that I am writing about events that happened at the close of the late Sultan's career of reform and improvement—events that occurred many years after the French editor of the Moniteur Ottoman, Mr. Urquhart, and the corps of writers-up of Turkey, in the pamphlets and reviews of the day, had assured us of the immense progress that country had made in the European system of government!

A general corruption prevailed among the public employes. Nothing could be done without bribery. The chief of the custom-house at Galata, for instance, was receiving nominally eight thousand piastres, and was spending eighty thousand a-year. Amongst a number of cases of the kind, I may mention one. Mr. — sold five thousand muskets to government, and was called upon by the storekeeper, who demanded two piastres a-piece for backshish: and, upon being refused, he told him plainly, through an interpreter, that, unless he complied, he would take care that his guns were bursted in the proof. Mr. — had no alternative but to comply, upon which the man stipulated that a few should be bursted by way of saving appearances; and, accordingly, forty-two were so served. The storekeeper very frankly told him that it was his only mode of living; that his salary would not buy his clothes, and even that was never paid regularly. The latter statement was easily credited by Mr. —, for he showed me entries in his own books of instalments of £10 a-month, which he was receiving from the government; and he stated that he found them very irregular in even such small transactions.

In the interior of the country, and at remote places on the coast, all sorts of expedients are resorted to for extorting money. At Broussa, the great centre of the silk district, the pasha put a duty upon the mulberry leaves that were brought into the town. A very ingenious mode of levying a contribution was put in force by the Governor of Phocæa, when I happened to be off that port. The plague was raging at the time very severely in the Turkish quarter of the town; and the Greeks, who were very numerous in the place, were anxious to escape. The governor, however, interdicted their departure; and his consent was, of course, to be had only by a bribe. I was told that twenty thousand piastres was the price of their safety. An amusing case of the kind was related by Captain — of the — line of battle ship, whom I met at Athens. He had occasion to send ashore on the coast of Asia Minor to purchase fresh provisions. No difficulty was experienced in bargaining for a calf at the first village; but no sooner had the owner agreed as to the terms, than the agha made his appearance and put his veto upon the transaction. "We had as much diplomacy over that calf," said the captain, "as though we were treating for the province in which it took place; and it ended in our giving the land-shark fifty piastres for his assent to the purchase." I might relate scores of instances, but shall only mention one more, a little similar in character to the above, related to me by Captain —, of a French brig of war, in which I was accommodated from Syra to the Piræus. He had been to a place on the coast of Asia Minor to bring away a statue discovered by a French traveller, which had been given to Louis Philippe by the Sultan. It had to be conveyed a few miles to the sea, and he required the aid both of men and bullocks; but he assured me that not a man or beast could be hired till the agha of the village had bargained for his share of the wages!

In speaking of the causes of the decline of the trade of Turkey, I must not omit to mention that terrible curse, the plague. I arrived in Constantinople towards the close of a most disastrous visitation of this periodical scourge. Upwards of sixty thousand persons were said to have perished in the capital alone during the previous six months. It is difficult to convey an adequate notion of the sad and depressing effects produced upon a population by the presence of this mysterious disease. The very atmosphere is scented with the fumigations which the Christian inhabitants use as an antidote and safeguard. In walking the streets, you see Greeks, Armenians, and Franks, threading their way in the crowd with their cloaks drawn closely about them, and avoiding, with the utmost caution, the slightest contact with any other living thing. The more timid of the pedestrians are clothed in oil-skin: I saw one of these spring from the footpath into the mud, at the turning of a corner, when he found himself on the point of contact with a Turk, who trudged onward, like the rest of these sturdy fatalists, quite indifferent to the panic he was occasioning. The Turks, as is well known, take no precautions against the plague.—A man dies, and his next of kin succeeds to his clothes; he dies also; when, if there be no more relations, his garments are sold in the bazaar, and thence transferred to some other fated wearers.

On calling with a letter of introduction upon a merchant, I found in the entrance-hall a contrivance resembling a watchbox, into which I was thrust, the door closed, and a pan of burning cypress branches were placed at my feet. A small round hole in the door, just level with my face, enabled me to breathe, whilst my whole person and clothes were thoroughly fumigated. When released from this suffocating confinement, and shown into the counting-house, I found Mr. — standing behind a barrier, placed at the entrance of his private office, which prevented my approaching him. I offered my letter; but he requested me to read it to him, as he was "in quarantine," and could not touch it. In the course of our conversation, he told me that no person but himself had entered his private room for six months, not even to clean it; that at the breaking out of the plague he had laid in a stock of paper, pens, &c.; that he locked the door each evening, and carried home the key; that his family were similarly isolated ; and that, during all that time, he had not allowed even the skirt of his coat to come in contact with any other individual excepting at his own home. Not only is business almost entirely suspended during such a calamitous period, whole streets become depopulated ; the bazaars are deserted ; and the creditor finds one common response to his applications for money—the debtor is dead of the plague, or his customers are dead, and so he cannot pay.

THE SLAVE TRADE.

Whilst we have been spending upwards of fifteen millions sterling, and sacrificing lives almost innumerable, to put an end to the slave trade on the south-west coast of Africa, we have devoted mighty armaments to the upholding of a state of things which perpetuates the inhuman traffic in Europe itself. At the one end of the African continent, philanthropy is the plea for spending our money ; at the other, state policy pleads for costly armaments. Nobody who has visited one slave market will ever wish to see another. I had seen human beings penned, like cattle in a fair, at Cairo, and did not, therefore, go through the same disgusting ordeal at Constantinople, where not only black but white men and women are daily exhibited for sale. An active slave trade is carried on between Alexandria and the Turkish capital in European vessels. In the Sardinian brig which carried me from Egypt to Constantinople, I had for fellow-passenger a negro girl purchased a few weeks before in Cairo ; and a friend of mine, going in an Austrian steam-boat from Constantinople to Smyrna, found a dozen beautiful Circassian boys occupying the ladies' cabin, who were on their way for Egypt, having been purchased for the harem of Mehemet Ali. There is a constant exchange of human merchandise going on between Turkey and Egypt : the negroes brought down the Nile are conveyed to Constantinople ; and, in return, white slaves are taken to the markets of Alexandria and Cairo. Whilst in the latter city, I was acquainted with a Greek merchant, who had received, at one time, a commission to go to Constantinople to purchase fifty Circassian girls, to supply the vacancies which had been created in the harems of Egypt by the devastations of the plague. There is, in Upper Egypt, a manufactory of eunuchs, the horrors and atrocities connected with which have often been described as a disgrace to the character of the present pasha. The chief demand for those wretched victims comes from Constantinople ; and whatever other objects may be accomplished by our armed interference to "maintain the independence and integrity of the Ottoman empire," one of its consequences certainly is to keep up a brisk demand for these mutilated beings ; and so long as there is a demand, there will be a corresponding supply.

Wherever a Mohammedan government exists, slavery must exist :—it is sanctioned by their religion ; the Koran contains precise directions for the management of slaves, and expressly refers to the treatment of eunuchs in their domestic capacities. So long, then, as we are in political alliance to strengthen and preserve a government and people by whom the soil of Europe is polluted with a slave-market, other nations may well suspect the sincerity of our motives in attempting to put down the inhuman traffic in the Western hemisphere.

POPULATION OF TURKEY.

In a country where no accurate census has ever been taken, and where, consequently, every estimate is founded on mere conjecture, it is not surprising that a great variety of opinions as to the population should be encountered, even amongst the best informed upon the condition of the Turkish empire. From every person to whom I spoke upon this subject, I received a different estimate. One intelligent individual gave it as his opinion, that the population of Turkey amounted to twelve millions, of whom a third were Christians. The oldest merchant in Constantinople estimated the numbers at eleven millions—of whom seven and a half were Christians and Jews, and three and a half only Turks—exclusive of Syria and Egypt, and the provinces of Wallachia and Moldavia. A well informed and observing Frenchman thought that Turkey in Europe contained six millions, of whom a fifth only were Mussulmans ; whilst an English resident estimated the population of European Turkey at five millions, of whom a third were Mussulmans and the remainder Christians. From these, and many other guesses, I should put down the whole of the population of Turkey at from ten to twelve millions, of whom the majority probably are Christians. Turkey in Europe contains from five to six millions ; and, as Bosnia, Bulgaria, and the maritime cities, are chiefly inhabited by Christians, it may be safely estimated that not more than a third of the population of this portion of the empire are Mussulmans. Whilst the Christian subjects of the Porte are constantly increasing in numbers, it may be doubted whether the Mohammedan population is not suffering more than a proportionate diminution.

As I have before remarked, the Rayas form the most active and useful portion of the population of Turkey. In Smyrna, Constantinople, Salonica, and the other trading ports and cities, the Greeks have nearly superseded all competitors, and monopolised the commerce of the country. In entering the Dardanelles, I found myself surrounded by seventeen merchant ships—fifteen were Greek, one Sardinian, and one English. Remembering that it is only about twenty years since they began to embark in foreign trade, the progress the Greeks have made is a striking proof of the superiority of their talent. No other people can compete with the Greeks in the race of commercial enterprise. They have drawn the trade of the Levant from Malta and Leghorn, and diverted the stream of commerce which formerly flowed round the Cape of Good Hope, and through Bombay, to Persia, into the channel of Constantinople ;—they have, in the meantime, pushed out branches of their establishments into all parts of Europe ; they have become the bankers of Vienna, Trieste, and Marseilles, and the merchants of London and Manchester. The house of R— has branches in Manchester, London, Marseilles, Constantinople, Odessa, and Teheran. In the only field in which the Greeks have had the opportunity of signaling themselves—that of commercial enterprise—they have displayed qualities to warrant the belief that they retain all the mental superiority for which their ancestors were so illustrious. They seem to combine, in fact, in their intellectual composition the rarest characteristics of other races,—possessing, at once, the common sense of the English, the plodding frugality of the Scotch, the vivacity and brilliancy of the French, and the daring of the American. Rather than find myself in rivalry with a Greek, I would prefer to choose my competitor from any one of these nations.

The ardour with which the Greek youth seek instruction, is a strong evidence of the intellectuality of their character. Whilst in the island of Syra, I paid a visit to a large school, conducted by a missionary of the London Church Missionary Society. The master spoke in the highest terms of the aptitude of the children for learning. "They require no stimulus from rewards or punishments," said he ; "I find sufficient emulation and quickness in their natural character." Afterwards, when at Athens, I saw a school under the management of Mr. and Mrs. —, the American missionaries. They had taught children in America, and in London ; but they assured me that they had never found elsewhere, such quickness of intellect as in Greece ; and, in explaining to me the ardour of the children for learning, Mrs. — remarked, "they would part with anything for the sake of instruction." These are the minds that will again possess Constantinople and govern Turkey. Whatever foreign power may nominally succeed to the tottering rule of the Osmanlis, the population, language, arts, literature, and commerce, will be Greek. The indestructible genius of the race will again conquer their conquerors, after upwards of three centuries of oppression, which would have brutalized any other people.

THE FEATS AND FORTUNES OF RICHARD THE REIVER; COMMONLY CALLED DOUBLE-RIBBED DICK.

PART II.—THE TRIAL.

THE intelligence of Dick's capture flew like wild-fire through the town and over the country. It was the universal theme of conversation. The vassals and tenants of the baron were overjoyed, as if they had gained a pitched battle; but the sympathies of the people generally were on the side of the prisoner.

"Ay, woman," said Peg Robson, to her next-door neighbour, Nelly Cowtart, "Dick's gruppit."

"Hech me!" retorted Nelly, "I'm wae for him; wi' a' his fauts, he was aye guid to the puir."

"Troth, I can say the same thing," interjected Shury Smith, the cobbler's sister; "for whiles whan he was doun buying corn frae Archie Rodan for his gem cocks, I've seen him gie me the best pairt o' a bushel for groats to the kail pat."

"An' ye mind," said Matty Walker, whose tongue went like the clapper of a mill, "we wad hae been a' killed but for him, whan the auld kirk o' Kilbane fell ae Sunday. There was a great crack i' the gable wa', just aboon the door, ye mind; an' that day, ye mind, the fowk were a' fley'd to gang in, for fear o' some accident; an' just afore the kirk scaled, ye mind, doun cam the bell and the cross, wi' an awesome crash, an' a lump o' lime fell through the riggin on the floor. Gude save us! ye mind, what a scramble there was, wha to get oot first. It was naething but helty-skelty; an' I daursay they wad hae tramped ane anither to death, had Dick no banged up, an' settin' his shoulder under the lintel, proppit up the hale crazy concern till the fowk escapit, every man an' mither's son o' them. Weel a wat, we hae a' great reason to hae a sympathy o' fallow feelin' for him. Whare, I may say 't," continued Matty in a half-whisper, "he'll get nae mercy frae the baron."

"Na, truly," quoth Jenny Tamsen, "he's i' the hawk's hans; an' if he war only himsel', I wadna murd sae sair about it; but I'm wae for that lassie, Marion Corrie; puir creature, it'll brek her heart, an' that'll brek her auld grandfather's too. She was owre head an' ears in love wi' him; but, in troth, there wasna a kimmer, gentle or semple, atween the Bar Hill and the braes o' Dunscore, that could ca' her heart her ain for him, an' wad hae followed him wi' a rape o' saun."

Whilst this sort of gossip occupied the minds and mouths of the village dames, preparations for the trial were going on with all due despatch.

The reader who has studied the history of his country under the Jameses, must be aware that, from the earliest ages, there never had been in Scotland any stated times or fixed courts for trying civil lawsuits, till the period of which we write, when John duke of Albany, regent of the kingdom, obtained from the pope the right of levying from the clergy an annual sum, by way of income-tax, sufficient to pay the salaries of a few judges. The tax was strongly opposed by the dignitaries of the Scottish Church: but the controversy was at last decided in favour of the regent; and, on the 24th of April, 1532, the College of Justice was established at Edinburgh.

The first institution of this court, indeed, properly belonged to James I., who erected it in 1425, when it consisted of the chancellor, and other persons nominated from the Three Estates of Parliament by the king; and was termed Session, because it was to sit thrice in the year, at such places as his majesty should appoint. After several fluctuations in its constitution, it was new-modelled by James V., according to the form of the Parliament of Paris, dignified with the name of the College of Justice, and its members styled senators. At first, much utility was expected from the equal distribution of justice by those regular judges: but the events which followed did not fulfil the hopes of the country. There were almost no laws, except acts of parliament; and these, in general, were not fixed but temporary. Much was thus left to the discretion and the arbitrary will of the judges; and in criminal cases, the execution of the law, as has been already stated, and the power of life and death, were intrusted to the wardens of the marches, or to the nobles and barons who resided in the district.

Never had the administration of justice been intrusted to more unworthy hands than those of Sir Gilbert Maxwell of Duncow. Nature had cast his outer man in the mould of the third Richard; his bodily appearance was a caricature of humanity: his face, twisted and hideous, was certainly not "made to court an amorous looking-glass;" his voice, a childish treble, was better fitted for "the weak piping times of peace" than the stern alarms of battles and forays. Had he been inclined to "descant on his own deformity," he might have soliloquized with the crooked monarch—

I that am curtailed of man's fair proportion;
Cheated of feature by dissembling Nature;
Deformed, unfinished; sent before my time
Into this breathing world, scarce half made up,
And that so lamely and unfashionable,
That dogs bark at me as I halt by them.

Unhappily, these outward defects were not compensated by any good gifts or bounties of nature within. His disposition was cruel, his tyranny capricious; the scowl of envy perpetually darkened his brow; and all his thoughts and actions seemed to centre in the gratification of his own brutish and vindictive passions.

The possession of so formidable and so hated an enemy as Richard the Reiver, could not fail to impart, to a soul like his, a degree of joy and exultation such as he never perhaps before experienced. His withered and wrinkled visage was lighted up with a gleam of savage delight, as he gave orders for the jury to be summoned, and the gallowes to be erected on the Cheaplaw Hill, where the court was to be held next day.

To those unacquainted with the mode of jury trial, and the judicial forms that prevailed in the earlier ages of Scottish history, and which were borrowed from the Danish and Norwegian invaders, long settled in various parts of our island, it may be proper to explain, that courts of justice were not held within the walls or under the roofs of elegant buildings, as at present. They assembled in the open air, on the tops of hills; and where these were wanting, on the summits of artificial mounds or moats, constructed for the purpose. These were sometimes circular, but generally of an oblong shape, steep in the ascent, and level at the top, so as to accommodate the jury, the criminal, the witnesses, and a reasonable number of spectators. At one end of the smooth green plain on the summit, was usually a little detached knoll, or hillock, on which the gibbet was fixed; for in those days the interval between the trial and the execution was but a short step, and often not more than a single hour.

With these relics of legal antiquity, Dumfriesshire abounds. They are scattered over Annandale, Nithsdale, and the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, in considerable numbers, and some of them in a state of high preservation. Every petty barony had, at least, one; and in large domains, such as those of Charteris of Amisfield, or of the Jardines, Johnstons, and Maxwells, there were several. Some of these were unquestionably old Roman camps, such as Burnswark, Torthorwald Hill, the Barhall in Tinwald, &c.; but, in general, small natural or artificial elevations were employed; specimens of which may yet be seen on the Dryfe near Lockerbie; at Dumfries; Applegarth Manse, Troqueer; Dalswinton, the site of the present hospitable mansion; on the Orr water; and in the parish of Glencairn, where these green hillocks still retain the name of moats; a word which, though erroneously applied to ditches round castles or forts, simply means a meeting or assembly; as, for instance, the Wittenagemote, the parliament of the Saxons, or the meeting of the wise men; and the Wardmotes of London, which signifies the meeting of the wards.

The barony of Duncow was furnished with an artificial court-house of this kind, which bears the name of the Cheaplaw Hill, then situated almost in the centre of the village, but long ago converted into the more agreeable uses of a play-ground for the children frequenting the parish school. The ascent was a winding footpath on the north side; the base on the west end was covered with a natural shrubbery of broom and furze; on the east and south, it was closely surrounded by houses and kailyards. The baron's castle stood in the immediate vicinity; and, on the opposite side, a long narrow street or alley, called Pauly's Close, ran between the bottom of the hill and a ford which communicated, by means of a line of stone steps, with the part of the village lying beyond the burn.

On the forenoon of the day when Dick was apprehended, the baron's mandate or circular was issued for convoking the court. The form of summons then practised resembled that for gathering the Highland clans, when the fiery cross was despatched through their hills and glens. The symbol used was a short rude piece of wood, shaped something like an arrow or halbert, the type of which is still preserved in the official staves or batons of our constables and policemen. This token of authority was passed from house to house, from man to man, over marsh and moor, to intimate that a legal assembly was to be held. It was accompanied by no letter or writing, for that would have been useless when people could not read; and, indeed, in general such accompaniment must have been wholly superfluous from the rapidity with which it was forwarded; for to have detained it for a minute, even to examine the writing, would have been a breach of law, and punishable by a considerable fine.

The ancient custom prescribing the route, and the mode of carrying the summons, ordained as follows:—"If the magistrate issues circulars, according to the king's letter, or message, he shall send one into each quadrant or airt. This circular must always go forward, and not retrograde. A widow is not ordered to carry the circular, nor a cottager living in the woods. If the circular enters a town from the east, it shall go from thence to the west; if it enters by the south, it shall go out by the north. All men shall carry this circular—farmers and countrymen—and all except noblemen. Whosoever miscarries the circular, or drops it, so that the court is not summoned, shall pay a fine of three merks." The messenger was to proclaim the summons orally at the door of the house, for it was held unlawful to take the symbol under a roof; and having done this, he was to send it on by a fast runner to the next stage.

The clachan of Duncow, on this occasion, presented an unusual degree of bustle and business-like excitement. "Fetch me my caker'd heel'd shoon, Tibby, and the gray rig-and-fur gilligaskins." This mandate proceeded from the Baron's bum-bailiff, Hughie Hiddlestone; a slender perpendicular personage, thin as a lath, and endowed with a mighty conceit of his own dignity and importance. "Fetch me, I say, my caker'd shoon, and the leather breeks wi' the knee-buckles." The obedient spouse complied, and produced the required articles. "Dinna stan' glowrin' there, when fouk's in a hurry! Fetch me the broon doublet wi' the drugget linin'; fetch me the taffetie waistcoat; fetch me the checket gravat wi' the blue border." Again Tibby hastened to the wardrobe—an old carved oaken chest—and, after some little rummaging, vest, doublet, and gravat were forthcoming. "Fetch me my mittens, and the silver-headed kent; it's stanin' ahint the door, ben the huse, and hasna been in my han' sin' Davie Tinning was hang'd for ca'in the baron thravn-gabbit Gibby."

The lambswool mits and the silver-mounted staff of authority, were instantly brought from their respective places of abode.

"Noo, my woman, gin I had my cockit hat I wad be a' ready for the road; for I maun be off wi' the summons. I'm ower lang here. Fetch me my cockit hat."

Here Tibby's alacrity forsook her; she was evidently non-plussed, and hesitated what to say. The demand was repeated in a more peremptory tone.

"Can yer braid blue bannet, wi' the red thrum cherry i' the tap o't, no do just as weel?" observed the better half.

"Thrum deevil! Fetch me yur cockit hat."

By this time the gudewife's temper was fast getting up to blood heat.

"Patience, my man; patience, my man; there's reasons for a' things, and I could gie ye a dozen o' them; but ye maun just be content wi' yer bannet."

The disappointed functionary was preparing to make a rejoinder, but the thread of Tibby's argument was not to be interrupted with impunity; and, raising her voice an octave higher, while one hand gave a slap on the other that made the bailie's heart nearly jump out of his mouth, she said, with an air obviously intended to show that further remonstrance or contradiction to her will would not be much longer tolerated—

"It's for nae use kickin' up a collishangie about it. Ye canna get yer cockit hat: ye needna ax't. I've the clocker sittin' in't, an' I wadna hae the clockin' lost for you nor the best man that ever steppit in leather shoon."

This magnanimous resolve put an end to the dispute, and Hughie had no alternative but to proceed on his errand with a borrowed hat.

The summons was despatched with all due expedition, passing rapidly from house to house and hand to hand, round the district, from the Nith across Locharbriggs, up the Glenae Burn, round by Glenmade, Auchengeith, Auldgirth, and Dal-swinton.

Meanwhile, operations were going on nearer the scene of action. Peter Plaintree was busy erecting the gibbet, while the vassals and labourers of the baron were cutting and carrying hazel stakes and twigs for the purpose of fencing the court. It was the ancient custom, on the occasion of jury trials, to have one portion of the smooth green platform, on the summit of the hill or moat, enclosed within a paling of wooden stakes, slightly driven into the ground, and surrounded with cords or ropes. This was called fencing the court. Within this ring or circular enclosure, sat the jurors; and, by law, it was required to be wide enough to contain room for thirty-six men, although the jury might consist only of twelve. A sacred character was attached to this circle; and if, by any accidental violence, it should happen to be broken down, it was enough to sist procedure, or sometimes to render the whole operations of the court in the case null and void.

On the morning of the trial, and long before the hour of cause, every thing was in readiness for so important an event; the country people were flocking in hundreds into the village, and choking up every lane and close leading to the Cheaplaw Hill, the steep sides of which were covered with eager spectators, each scrambling for a good place, where a view of the prisoner and the proceedings could be obtained. The baron had taken his seat in an elevated chair at the east end of the platform; and at the other stood the gibbet, and the hangman fastening the rope to the cross-beam. The jury were in their places, and the surrounding space was filled with persons cited as witnesses, or with vassals and retainers of the baron. The prisoner had been brought up doubly ironed, and under a strong guard. His countenance evinced no symptoms of fear or perturbation at the scene before him, which he surveyed with a calm indifference approaching to scorn. A whisper went round the crowd—"That man canna be guilty; he doesna look like it. Guilt aye kythes on the face even o' the boldest, when within eye-shot o' the hangman's tether."

The jury was now empanelled, or, more properly speaking, enclosed; and the rules of court read as follows:—

"It is forbidden to every man who is not chosen a juror to sit within the sacred cords; and if he sits down there, and does not go out when he is admonished, he shall pay a fine of half a merk of silver. Every man must come fasting into the court, and make his appearance there while the sun is in the east, and remain in the court till noon. No man must bring any drink into court, neither for sale nor in any other way; but if it be brought notwithstanding, then it shall be confiscated, and belong to the lord of the manor. All who are chosen jurors shall sit in the court during the whole time aforesaid, unless they have to go out on necessary errands. But whosoever goes out of the court, outside the sacred cords, without any necessity, shall pay a fine of two silver groats. If those who are outside the court make there such noise and disturbance that the jury are prevented from hearing causes, or those from pleading who have obtained leave by the judge and the jury, they shall pay a fine of a silver groat when detected and convicted.

"GOD SAVE THE KING!"

The oath was then administered to each juror.

"I protest, laying my hand on the Holy Book, that I shall give such a verdict in every cause, as well on the side of prosecutor as defender, as I consider most just in the sight of God, according to law and my conscience; and I shall always do the same whenever I shall be chosen a juror. I shall not make any man guilty who is innocent, nor make any man innocent who is guilty; nor shall I be prevailed on by relationship, affinity, fear, friendship, or favour. So help me God, and the holy things I hold in my hands!"

The prisoner was then commanded to stand forth, when the charge was read in his hearing, accusing him of having, on the night of the 18th, or the morning of the 19th, of the week and month aforesaid, committed the wilful, heinous, cruel, diabolical crime of murder on the person of Gilbert Grip-hard Maxwell, younger, Master of Duncow.

"I solemnly declare my innocence before God and this court, and am ready to prove it," said the prisoner.

"Produce your evidence," replied the baron; "where are your witnesses?"

"Witnesses I have none; but I am willing to appeal to such proof as the law allows, and such as, by the customs of this realm, have been held to establish the guilt or innocence of an accused party. I claim the right of appeal to single combat. This privilege is never refused in cases of doubt; and cannot with justice be denied to me."

The baron had no wish to bring the issue to any such test, nor to let justice take its fair course if it could be prevented.

"That privilege," said he, "I interdict. True, the laws of the realm permit it; but the law of the duel requires that there shall be some degree of equality in the strength and advantages as well as in the rank of the combatants. Were it not so, life and innocence would be at the mercy of every desperado, every daring villain who might choose to fancy that the sword was a better instrument to decide contested causes than a judge and a jury."

"Well," rejoined the prisoner, "since this right is denied me there is another way I offer to clear myself, which is as legal and satisfactory as the appeal to arms, and not liable to objections arising from inequality of personal strength or worldly circumstances. I offer to clear myself by twelve men's oaths, who shall declare their sworn persuasion of my innocence; for the law says, 'If there be witnesses let the accused defend himself by a jury; if there be none, then by the oaths of conjurators.' When the truth cannot be discovered I have a right at least to disprove the accusation."

"Your right is good," said the baron; "but you forget that it rests with the prosecutor whether he will be satisfied with twelve men's oaths. I tell thee, knave, I will not be satisfied. Dost thou think to frustrate the ends of justice by thy shifts and pretences? Wilt thou dare to beard me in my own court, and to bandy thy rights and privileges when thou hast not a witness nor a word of evidence to show why thy bones should not bleach on the gibbet? Blood for blood is the law of God as well as of man. Thou seest the noose waving for thy throat. Shrive thyself to the priest, and let thy prayers be short. Away with him!"

"Stay," cried the prisoner; "not so fast. The jury have not given their verdict: they are the judges, not you. I have no witnesses to produce; where are yours? One man declared he had seen the murder. Where is he? Bring him forth."

"Silence, wretch! silence. Witnesses, forsooth! Evidence! Is it not enough that thou hast always had a malignant hatred to my house; that thou hast stolen my cattle; set my authority at defiance; insulted my son, pretending that he had crossed thee in some amour with a low-born wench? Is it not known that, on the very night of the murder, thou wast seen near the spot where the foul deed was committed; that thou hadst an assignation with thy paramour, and intended to carry her off from her father's house? Is it not an aggravation of thy crime that my son, while endeavouring to save a father from the bereavement of his only child, should have fallen by the hand of that unfeeling villain who had first ruined the virtue of that child, and then sought to hide his infamy by seizing her person and consigning it to a dungeon, perhaps to the grave? Proofs! Witnesses! Why, thy guilt is palpable as noonday. It smells so rank that every person may trace it out. What say ye, jurors, guilty or not guilty?"

Richard's teeth were grinding with indignation to hear an innocent maiden thus traduced, and himself branded as her betrayer, perhaps her murderer. A burst of scornful denial was struggling to get vent from his heaving and convulsed throat; but it was drowned by the verdict of the jury—"Guilty, guilty, guilty;" and the loud murmurs of disapprobation from the spectators, who were shocked at this scandalous prostitution of justice to the will of a tyrant.

"Off with the miscreant, off with him to the gallows!" cried the baron, beginning to apprehend, from the state of feeling that prevailed, that a rescue might be attempted. The mandate was obeyed; and the guards were in the act of dragging him to the other end of the platform, where the priest and the hangman stood prepared to discharge their respective offices, when, at the moment, a sudden commotion arose among the crowd, near the hazel stakes which formed the jury-box. All was tumult and disorder; loud huzzas, shouts, and clapping of hands followed. "What's the matter? what's the matter?" every body inquired; but none could tell except those in the neighbourhood of the enclosure. The cause, however, soon spread, and seemed to occasion universal rejoicing.

As the reader is not likely to conjecture what it was, we may inform him, that among the spectators of that day's proceedings, and not the least interested in the result, was Marion Corrie. She had contrived to work her way through the dense mass that covered the sides of the hill, and took her place within a few yards of the hazel paling, watching every word and look of the judge and jury, and observing every thing without being herself observed; for all eyes were engrossed with one object, and that was the prisoner, whose handsome form and bold demeanour had won all hearts in his favour. With intense interest, but without allowing a sob or tear to escape her, she had listened to every word. When the fatal sentence was pronounced, she uttered a wild frantic scream, and, drawing a whinger from her bosom, she rushed forward and cut asunder the ropes that surrounded the enclosure. The breaking down of this sacred fence, as has been mentioned, was enough to stop the proceedings of the court, and destroy their validity in law. It was for this, among other reasons, and to prevent accidents from violence, that no man was allowed to come armed to the court; and it was forbidden that any number of armed men should be allowed to remain within a certain distance (a practice continued to the present day at parliamentary elections,) lest it might be said that freedom of discussion and the award of the jury had been overawed by fear or force.

The baron, seeing his bloody purpose about to be thwarted, and the victim likely to be torn from his clutches, when already within his grasp, became frantic with rage. Springing from his chair, he exclaimed, "Bring me a sword! drive a poniard to his heart! the ruffian must not escape. Executioner, do your duty; disobey me at your peril!" Four of the sentinels in waiting here seized the prisoner by the shoulders, and hurried him towards the gibbet.

During this scene of confusion, Marion had forced her way to the opposite end of the platform, and applying a little ivory cat-call to her lips, she blew a shrill note, resembling the huntsman's whistle. The signal was understood, and, at the summons, a band of sturdy yeomen, in full armour, with drawn rapiers in their hands, rushed up the hill. These were a party of Richard's friends, neighbours and tenants of his father from Brun-tick and Anchincairn. It had been concerted with Marion that they were to repair to the Cheaplaw Hill on the preceding night, conceal themselves among the long broom and furze at the base, and wait her signal, in case an opportunity for rescue might present itself. This trusty band was divided into two detachments, headed by Jock Crichton of the Townfoot, and Adam Robson of Castlehill, two of the stoutest and boldest adventurers that ever rode a foray or lifted a prey. One division took immediate possession of the knoll and the gibbet, with its attendant functionaries, the priest and the hangman. The other pushed through the crowd to seize the baron and the jury; an exploit which was performed without much difficulty, as every man was unarmed, and not a weapon could be drawn to offer resistance.

The tables were now completely changed. The judge was to become the culprit at his own bar, and the packed jury in danger of having their sentence carried into execution upon themselves. In short, from the exasperation, and excitement, and universal hubbub that prevailed, the proceedings were likely to be brought to a very summary conclusion. "Away with the tyrant; tuck him up. Let Haman hang on his own gallows!" were among the few intelligible expressions that could be heard in the confused Babel of hisses, yells, groans, and imprecations of vengeance.

At this stage of the turmoil, when the justice-court had every appearance of ending in a general onslaught, a stranger stepped forward into the vacant space which the crowd had left in pressing towards the gibbet, expecting to see the baron hoisted instead of the prisoner. Though his attire was mean, his person was tall and handsome, his speech commanding, "Wha's that lang weel-faur'd man wi' the yellow beard, an' the bugle-horn at his side?" said Lilly Walker to Babie Fead. "He's no that weel dress'd, but he speaks like ane hae'n authority. Surely he canna be frae aboot this pairt. I dinna think I ever saw him afore."

"Heth," replied Babie, "I kenna for that, but he has a bonnie red cheek, and bonnie glancin' blue een i' his head; maybe he'll be some wanderin' knight in disguise; there's a hantle o' thae fouk gaun through the kintra enow, under pretence o' pittin' down thieves and reivers; but, od', they're often the greatest rogues themsels."

This dialogue was interrupted by the loud voice of the stranger, addressed to the combatants; for the tumult had now assumed the appearance of a regular pell-mell battle. "Desist, I command you!" The order was not attended to—the speaker's outward habit not being particularly fitted to enforce submission, or even inspire respect. "Desist, I command you, on pain of high treason!" was again repeated, in a more authoritative tone; and in a moment, as the old ballad says,

He took the bugle frae his side,
He blew baith loud and shrill,
And four-and-twenty belted knights
Came skipping up the hill:
Then he took out a little dirk,
Let a' his duddies fa';
And he was the brawest gentleman
That was among them a'.

The amazement of the crowd at this sudden transformation was indescribable; nor was their astonishment lessened when they discovered that the bold gaberlunzie was no other than King James himself. The first that identified the royal person was the prisoner, who had been in Liddesdale when James undertook his expedition for checking depredations in that quarter, and hanged the redoubted freebooter, Johnnie Armstrong. "The king!—the king!" was speedily whispered from ear to ear.

"Lord preserve me!" exclaimed Meg McWhutterick, the souter's pretty wife; "he sleepit i' our house yestreen, and pledged me in a caup o' yill." And wiping her mouth, as if she had got something else into the bargain—"Had I jaloosed wha gruppit me roun'—but, heth na; hoo could I—I wad hae gart our John pitishion him to be made buitmaker to the airmy. He's a fine man, an' neither prood nor saucy; for he took nocht but parritch to his supper. He said he was the Gudeman o' Bellygeith; and sleepit on the langsettle, wi' a pock o' woo aneth his head."

The reader will hardly require to be informed that it was a practice with James V. to traverse the country in disguise—sometimes for the purpose of seeing that justice was regularly administered, and frequently on the less patriotic errand of gallantry and adventure. On these occasions he engaged in many romantic frolics, and made strange discoveries, that amused both himself and his subjects. His anxious attention to the interests of the lower classes, and to protect them from oppression, procured him the title of "King of the Commons;" and it was upon some of his amorous expeditions, when travelling in disguise as a beggar, that the two comic songs, "The Gaberlunzie Man," and "We'll gae nae mair a-roving," are said to have been founded. These freaks occasionally brought his majesty's life into considerable jeopardy; as, for example, in his encounter with the band of gallants at Cramond Brig, near Edinburgh, where he is said to have rescued from abduction a pretty girl of the lower rank, to whom tradition has given the name of Marion Howison. The soubriquet, or designation, which he usually assumed in those clandestine journeys, was the "Gudeman of Ballengeich," or the Windy Pass; which is the name of a narrow defile down the rocky hill behind Stirling castle.

The cause of his visit to Dumfriesshire, on the occasion here referred to, was, as has been already mentioned, to make inquiry respecting the conduct of Sir John Charteris of Amisfield, of whose administration, as warden of that part of the Border, many complaints had reached the royal ear. As it was the king's intention to surprise Sir John, and pay him a solitary visit at his own residence, under his usual disguise, as Gudemane of Ballengeich, he marched privately, with a small retinue, to Duncow, distant little more than a mile from Amisfield. Here he remained for a short time, and passed the night in a house in Pauly's Close, near the Cheaplaw Hill, where a huge stone long marked the spot where the monarch slept, until it was thrown down by the march of improvement, about fifty years ago. Leaving his whole retinue in the village, he set out on foot to Amisfield, and with some difficulty procured an interview with the haughty baron (as he repeatedly refused to admit the Gudemane within his gate,) the result of which was a heavy fine, that imposed a burden on the estate from which it never recovered; and a few years ago the last remnant of it was sold, after having continued in the family of Charteris since the days of Wallace, who conferred it as a reward for his valiant services in Scotland's cause, on one of his warriors of French descent, named Longueville.

The adventure we have now related will easily account for the sudden and unknown appearance of the king at the trial of Double-Ribbed Dick. As James was not only an excellent connoisseur in female beauty, but had a sort of intuitive art in finding it out, even though passing but a single night in the neighbourhood, it was scarcely possible that he could be in Duncow an hour or two without hearing of the pretty maid of the mill. It so happened that his gallantry had tempted him to pay a visit to Marion Corrie; and as fate would so have it, it was the very night when the baron's son had laid his plan for carrying her off. While proceeding with a single attendant along the foot-path on the green margin of the burn, his attention was arrested by hearing the clash of swords; and on approaching the spot (for it was dark,) what was his astonishment on perceiving two men engaged in mortal combat, one of whom fell transfixed through the heart, and the other was taken into custody.

While the royal henchman conducted the murderer back to Duncow to headquarters, where he was to be detained in strict keeping until the particulars of the quarrel became known, James hurried his nocturnal visit to the mill, and there learned, from the lips of the unsuspecting Marion, the whole history of her attachment for the reiver; the infamous purpose of the baron's son; her suspicions that a plot was laid against her liberty, as well as her honour, to be carried into effect that very night; and, finally, her alarm that the bloody rencontre of which the stranger told, could be no other than the deadly combat between her lover and her intending seducer. The king, who was, of course, entirely ignorant as to the persons he had so unexpectedly found engaged in mortal strife, could give no information tending either to explain the mysterious accident, or quiet Marion's fears; but he said he would inquire into the circumstance; and, in case the rashness of her lover had got him into danger, he promised to stand his friend, and even to let King James himself know, if he was not likely to get justice. Comforted with this kindly assurance, Marion bade adieu to the gentle stranger, not a little flattered, and half afraid that Dick had got a rival more formidable than the baron's son; for, as the poet of Loch Katrine has said of the same roving monarch—

Not his the form nor his the eye
That youthful maiden went to fly.

The reader may guess Marion's surprise and joy when, on the Cheaplaw Hill, she identified her friendly visitor in the person of the king, whose presence had, so soon as recognised, instantly allayed the tumult. Mounting the abdicated chair, he commanded the baron and the prisoner to be brought before him; and discharged the jury, as wholly unnecessary and informal in a cause where no proof could be led on either side.

"This trial, Sir Gilbert, concerns the murder of your son?" inquired the king.

"It does, my liege."

"And the prisoner by your side, you say, is the murderer?"

"So he has been proved to be, please your majesty."

"Proved! By whom?"

"By a competent jury, lawfully summoned, and lawfully assembled."

"Have you produced witnesses to the fact?"

"My liege, presumption is so clear, so strong, so convincing, that no one doubts of his guilt."

"Doubts! presumption! sirrah; and would you hang a subject of my realm on presumption?"

"My lord, your grace, I will produce twelve men to swear to his guilt."

"Oaths are not proofs; much less can the oaths of vassals—for such, doubtless, your twelve men are—be held as unexceptionable testimony. Do you persist in the accusation of this man as the murderer of your son?"

"I do, so please your grace."

"Are you prepared to declare, upon your soul and conscience, and with your hand upon the Holy Book, that his crime has been proved, and his sentence just?"

"I will swear to it," said the baron.

"Then," replied the king, "thou wouldst swear away thy salvation! Wretch that thou art! how can justice be administered; how can life and limb be secure; how can the poor be protected; how can oppression be redressed; how can innocence or virtue be safe; how can public or private interests be expected to thrive, when I have within my dominions such reckless and iniquitous ministers of the law as thou? Alas for this poor distracted kingdom!—too long has it been cursed with corruption, and cruelty, and avarice, and misrule such as thine. But, touching the guilt of the prisoner, as thou hast no witnesses, I shall undertake to produce one. While passing along the footpath, on the night of this murder, I chanced myself to be a spectator of the act, and so can bear my testimony as to the innocence of the crime laid to his charge; though, had thy son fallen beneath his weapon, it had been scarcely more than just retribution—as the heartless ruffian had not only conspired the ruin of an innocent maiden, but proposed to add to the crime of seduction, the still deeper offence of violently carrying off from her father's house, perhaps of secretly putting to death, the hapless victim of his diabolical revenge. But, sirrah, I am not the only witness in the case; there is another, whose evidence is yet more conclusive than mine, that of the murderer himself; and he shall be forthcoming. My attendant apprehended him in the act; he has since been in strict custody. He shall now confront thee at thy own bar, and put down thy vile falsehoods by the confession of his guilt."

A blast of the bugle summoned the mysterious culprit to the hill, between two soldiers of the guard; and, to the unspeakable horror and surprise of the baron, he discovered the murderer to be no other than one of his son's confidential retainers, called, from his Irish extraction, Paddy Wull.

"Now, caitiff," said the king, "what hast thou to say to thy proofs and thy presumptions—thy juries and thy oaths? Yet this unfortunate individual is not so deeply stained with infamy as thou mayest suppose. The weapon that slew his master was intended to have been dyed in the heart's blood of another—of the man whom, but for this accidental discovery, as I may term it, thou wouldst have put to an ignominious death, upon the unjust sentence of a packed jury. A watchful Providence had so ordered it, that the innocent and injured lover had taken a different path than usual, from the humane motive of eacheving the serpent in his way, and thus avoiding the commission of that very crime for which thy savage malignity had doomed him to suffer. The craven seducer was thus snared in his own toil. The servant, who acted the accomplice, mistook, in the dark, his master for the intended victim; and at this hour he is yet ignorant that any other perished by his hand than the object for which the fatal blow was originally intended."

At this intelligence, the assassin was hardly less horrified and amazed than the baron. He confessed to the whole adventure of the night; to the foul conspiracy against Marion; to his master's murder, of which he had been the unconscious instrument; and, lastly, to his being surprised and detected in the act by two strangers.

"Now," continued the king, "having cleared up this mysterious affair, and fixed the guilty deed on the proper criminal—I trust, to the satisfaction of all present—I shall proceed to give judgment, not doubting that my award will be approved by every impartial court in Scotland. As for the assassin, I doom him to grace the gibbet; for it does not lessen his guilt or extenuate his crime, that he merely mistook, in the darkness of the night, one object for another. He was a consenting party to the base stratagem against maiden innocence; and wilfully undertook, in abetting the plot, to shed the blood of a fellow-creature. It is decreed by a higher authority than that of any human tribunal, that 'whosoever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed;' and so it can be deemed neither unjust nor cruel to pronounce sentence according to the Divine law. As for you, Sir Gilbert, it has happened, luckily for your own head, that my accidental presence here has prevented you from committing a crime of the deepest dye, that of perverting the law—which ought to be pure and spotless as innocence itself—into an engine of private vengeance; and attempting to cover this atrocious conspiracy, against the life of a guiltless man, with the sacred forms of justice. So far be grateful that thy carcass does not blacken on thine own gallows. But, wretched man, thou hast an arrear of guilt for thy innumerable offences and misdemeanours as a corrupt judge and an unworthy magistrate, that cannot possibly be overlooked or passed unpunished. Know, then, that, in penalty for thy notorious misdeeds, I deprive thee of one-third part of thy barony, to be given as retribution to those whom thy injustice hath wronged; and I further burden thy estate with the liability to quarter two hundred men whenever I may undertake an expedition into Nithsdale.

"And now, Sir Reiver," addressing himself to the prisoner, and commanding his irons to be removed, "it is thy turn to receive sentence. I do not justify the raids and forays, the plunderings and outrages against property, in which fame reports thee to have been an active and daring leader. All these lawless doings I am resolved to put down by the strong arm of force; and shall not cease to wage war against all marauders and freebooters, until the flocks of the Borders shall graze as securely in their pastures as my own sheep do in the parks of Stirling and Falkland. It shall go hard with the barons and wardens of these marches, if I do not make the rush-bush keep the cow. But, sirrah, thy offences have this alleviation, that they are the fault of the times, the natural fruit of the disorderly state of society. The laws have been so long silent and disregarded, that the perpetrators of these outrages are hardly conscious of doing anything that merits severe usage at the king's hands. Let, then, thy past misdemeanours be forgotten and forgiven, on this condition, that there be an instant and complete amendment in thy habits of life hereafter. And as thou art a brave fellow, and hast in thy arm what will strike thieves and plunderers with terror, I intrust to thee the keeping of the peace from the gates of Lochmaben to the march of Dalswinton. So long as I am King of Scotland, thou shalt be King of Kirkmahoe.

"But where is pretty Marion of the mill? Has she no boon to crave? no rogueries to confess? Unless I am much misinformed, she has sins against the eighth commandment that require to be shaven; for she confided to me the secret, that she had stolen away the heart of a young gallant."

Marion, who had retired abashed at the discovery of her unknown visiter, lingered for some time in the outskirts of the crowd, afraid lest she might have been compromised by some of her unguarded disclosures; but so soon as the king had decided what was to be the fate of her lover, she sprung forward, half frantic between joy and fear, and threw herself into Richard's arms, almost suffocated with convulsive sobs.

"I know it all," said James, beckoning the bewildered couple to approach him; "but come hither, my sweet little penitent thief. Nobly hast thou won thy prize; and it were an unprincipally act not to make thee a just reward. Come hither, come hither."

Graceful, but grave, her brow he kissed,
And bade her terrors be dismissed;
Then gently dried the falling tear,
And gently whispered hope and cheer,
As to her lover's arms she clung,
With beating heart and bosom wrung.

"Say, my pretty maiden, dost not thou deserve chains and slavery for so nearly bringing a brave man's neck to the gallows, eh? What, not a word?

Then must I be the interpreter of thy blushes, ay, and the judge, and the priest, and the executioner of the law, too? I decree, then, that thy chains be the links of love's golden fetters; and there can be no dishonour in surrendering thy liberty to the man whom nobody but thyself could ever conquer. Take her hand—kneel down." Then, drawing his sword, and laying it gently on the bridegroom's shoulder, "Rise, Sir Richard; and now, fair lady, I claim, as the priest's fee, the pleasure of dancing at the bridal; and, by the mass, the baron shall pay the piper, for he shall give and bequeath to you and your heirs that pendicle of the barony beyond the mill, stretching from the Marten Yett to the march of Closeburn."

A shout of applause followed the winding up of this strange yet interesting scene. Meg M'Whutterick's best parlour was decked out for the occasion, and a merrier night was never spent within the bounds of Duncow. The king honoured the happy festivities with his presence; and, in the morning, leaving his retinue in the village, he set out, in his usual disguise, for Amisfield.

MEMOIRS OF THE LATE JAMES SMITH, Esq.*

MR. HORACE SMITH, in the memoir prefixed to these Comic Miscellanies, or James Smith himself, we forget which, mentions that a lady once remarked that he was, in manners and mind, like a Frenchman. There must be something in it, as we, before seeing this, had been struck with precisely the same idea. He was, in fact, in his habits and tastes, as like a native of Paris as it is well possible for a native of London to be: lively, quick, somewhat superficial, an egotist; fond of pleasure, but discreet in his pleasures; and able to turn the talents he possessed to the best account, both as regarded his own reputation and the amusement of "the town." Posterity might have been neither much better nor much worse had James Smith never lived; but his contemporaries would certainly have lost a great deal of harmless enjoyment, which, in this dull and care-worn world, should go for something. He might not do much to help his race to surmount the many evils of their social condition, or to render them either wiser or better; but he made some of them laugh and forget their cares. What sort of man James Smith might have been if bred in the country, or in a small town where there were no theatres and operas, it is impossible and needless to conjecture: he could not have been the same creature; nor probably, though less frivolous, half so good-natured. Lady Blessington once remarked, "acutely," that "if James Smith had not been a witty man he must have been a great man!" Had the honeyed speech been, "a great man of business"—a thriving merchant, like his grandfather,—or an eminent solicitor, like his father before him—we might heartily subscribe to its "acuteness;" for he was a sensible, self-centred man, of fair parts, active mind, orderly and temperate. But he chose to set up for a regular town-bred wit—a man of figure in "society;" and, as far as his professional duties permitted—for he succeeded his father as Solicitor to the Ordnance—his ambition was completely successful; and in a then novel line, which combined pleasure, literature, and business, he achieved a considerable reputation, of which this collection of his jeux d'esprit is, in all probability, the last sparkling bubble. That very clever, and more lucky, hit, the "Rejected Addresses," at once brought James Smith into general notice, and conferred upon him the highest fame that can be expected to attend such effusions. The public has now, all save a few antiquarian readers, forgotten "The Bath Guide;" and yawns over "Sir Hanbury Williams;" and since the "Rejected Addresses" were received with obstreperous theatrical applause, audiences have grown much more serious, thoughtful, and reverential,—their passions have become more vehement, and their sensibilities deeper. They require a different species of excitement than farce and drollery. A vigorous and more healthful appetite craves more generous diet and powerful potations, than the brisk ginger-pop and whipt trifle on which the Town then banqueted, and landed the bestower.

The Memoir of James Smith, written by his brother, and his few Letters, written to Mrs. Torre Holme, (a lady who writes very elegant verses for the Fashionable Annuals,) in the last years of his life, are the most interesting portion of the contents of the volumes,—partly because they are fresh, but chiefly because they tell something of a clever, pleasant man, whose name has been buzzing in the public ear for two generations. The Messrs. Smith were the sons of "an eminent legal practitioner of London, who, for many years, held the office of Solicitor to the Ordnance;" he was, moreover, a worthy and intelligent man; who educated his sons with care, and endeavoured to protect their youth and inexperience from the sin of idle dalliance with the Muses. In due time, James became, first the apprentice, and next the partner, of his father—secretly maintaining a flirtation with Thalia, and yet not wholly neglecting Themis; and, in short, uniting the man of wit and pleasure with the man of business. A kind of half-dramatic, half-political or satirical newspaper, called the "Pic-Nic," was started by Colonel Greville, to which the Smiths, when very young men, were invited to become gratuitous contributors; and they had for associates, Cumberland the dramatist, Sir James Bland Burgess, Mr. Croker, and others; Mr. Combe, an able and eccentric literary fag of those days, being the editor, and the only paid writer.

The "Pic-Nic" had the fate which might have been anticipated; but it served to initiate James Smith into the mysteries of periodical writing, and he never again wholly laid aside his unofficial pen. His first attempts, like his most successful work, were parodies and imitations. He next contributed to a "London Review," in which (with the usual success) an attempt was made to write without the protection of the solemn, mysterious, and really modest, potential we; every author affixing his name to his critique. This could never do. The "Review" dropt when Mr. Smith had contributed just one article. They must either be "little lower than the angels," or very arrogant and impudent persons indeed, who can, as periodical critics, face the public, and deliver opinions approximating in any reasonable degree, to candour and honesty, without the graceful veil of the time-tried, sacred we.

Mr. Horace Smith alleges, that his brother's kindness and good-humour disqualified him for this species of writing; and, at that time, pertness, frothy impertinence, banter, or sarcasm and downright abuse—of which the leading Reviews were the great exemplars—were too often the favourite weapons of the critic; and that was admired as happy wit, which could not now be tolerated. The Monthly Mirror was next favoured by the contributions of the brothers, who published in it those poetical imitations entitled "Horace in London." And in 1812 appeared the "Rejected Addresses," of which no fewer than eighteen editions have since appeared. To James Smith belong the imitations of Crabbe, Cobbett, Wordsworth, Coleridge, and the Editor of the Morning Post—in brief, the rarer portion of the entire contents. Next to those, his various contributions to Mathews' Entertainments, which were altogether congenial to his taste and powers, were his most celebrated and successful compositions; though many of his Magazine papers, as the Bachelor's Thermometer, My Wife's Mother, parts of Grimm's Ghost, &c., are choice in their own kind. The "Nonsense for Mathews" were, at least, the best paying productions. Smith, that actor said, was the only man who could write clever nonsense well; and clever nonsense was just what Mathews most wanted; and so he paid him a thousand pounds for it. "A thousand pounds for nonsense!" the receiver would say, shrugging his shoulders; and probably not insensible to the value of the nonsense whether in money or celebrity. It is worthy of record, as a literary curiosity, that Mr. James Smith once received three thousand pounds as a legacy, for two complimentary stanzas addressed to old Strachan, the king's printer; with which the good man was so flattered that an immediate codicil was made to his will, thus munificently rewarding the wit of his poetical friend. For the general good of the craft we copy the following remarks:—

In ancient times, as we know from some of the classical letters, the rich frequently left handsome legacies to favourite authors with whom they were personally unacquainted—a fact to which the present writer has great pleasure in referring, in the hope that so laudable a custom may be revived!

Smith's talents and tact early gave him that prominent place in London society which appears to have been the limit of his ambition. As a wit and joker, he appears to have been somewhat dry and mechanical; but he was gifted with an excellent memory; and, with a rich assortment of anecdotes, possessed a happy knack of telling them. He could also dress up an old Joe to look almost as good as new, and he attempted the impromptu à l'air. He sung comic songs with taste and humour; and from boyhood had been a frequenter of the theatre, and a welcome visitor in the green-room, a regular diner-out, and a hearty laugh. There might be nothing very useful or dignified in all this, but it comprehended the great requisites for maintaining that place in society, which he desired to hold. He had never been needy, and latterly he was affluent in his circumstances; and throughout life he was a well-tempered, obliging, and a very handsome man; always most carefully dressed and appointed; and too prudent, or too indifferent, easily either to give or take offence. Smith was, besides, a confirmed metropolitan, thinking "London the best place in summer, but the only place in winter;" tolerating no ruralities more substantial than those to be found in the scenes of Covent-Garden or Drury-Lane; a Tory, and a determined bachelor. "It will," his brother remarks,

Be hardly necessary to state that he was a bachelor; and to those who knew him, it will be equally needless to add, that his celibacy proceeded rather from too discursive than too limited an admiration of the sex. To the latest hour of his life, he exhibited a marked predilection for their society, giving a natural preference to the young, the intelligent, and the musical; and never concealing his dislike of a dinner-party composed exclusively of males. It will be seen that even in the many hours of solitude and sickness that threw a shade over the closing scenes of his life, he does not appear ever to have regretted his bachelorship.

The following paragraph in a letter to his accomplished friend, Mrs. Holme, written after he had seen his grand climacteric, is as characteristic as any thing in the "Bachelor's Thermometer":—

Better still this morning,—am thinking of dining at the club. Horrid dream last night, viz. that I was engaged to be married—some politic arrangement. Introduced to my bride, a simpering young woman with flaxen hair, in white gloves. Just going to declare off (coute qui coute,) when, to my inexpressible relief, I awoke.

His table-talk, as it is served up here, is somewhat scanty, and not remarkably piquant; but the reader may judge:

"Mr. Smith, you look like a Conservative," said a young man across the table, thinking to pay him a compliment. "Certainly, sir," was the prompt reply; "my crutches remind me that I am no member of the movement party."

Mr. Smith, in his latter years, was a martyr to gout; and he bore his sufferings with fortitude. If he had no sympathy to bestow on the sufferings of others, neither did he exact or accept sympathy for himself. In his latter years, physical infirmity had nearly estranged him from gay society; but visits to his Club—"Magazine day"—the kindness of a few old friends—the attentions of his faithful housekeeper of twenty-five years—and every comfort which his own London could afford, made his latter days pass away in tranquil enjoyment. And his death, like his life, was easy. Among his personal friends, or familiars, were the late Earl of Mulgrave,

Mr. Croker of the Admiralty, Lord Abinger, and many other distinguished persons. His acquaintance with authors, actors, and artists, was nearly universal; for he was a fixture the year round in London, and he went everywhere there.

His letters, it strikes us, are written in an easier and more delicate vein than his published sketches; yet they are equally studied compositions. We regret they are so few; and shall select a few morsels from those we consider the most attractive, from what they record—if not, also, the best in style.

I dined yesterday at — House, where the Countess Guiccioli is on a visit; she is much improved in her English. When we rejoined the ladies in the drawing-room, coffee was introduced, and several little tottering daddy-long-legs tables were set out, whereon to deposit our cups. I and Madam G. had a table between us. I then ventured to touch upon Lord Byron. The subject evidently interested her. I repeated several passages from his "Childe Harold," with which she seemed quite familiar. She then asked me to give her some of my imitations of him from the "Rejected Addresses." These she did not seem quite so well to comprehend. I told her all I knew of him before he went abroad, to which, like Desdemona, "she did seriously incline." Bysshe Shelley she denominates a good man. Leigh Hunt's name she pronounced Ley Honte. With tears in her eyes, she then descanted upon the merits and failings of the departed. When any sudden pause took place in the conversation at the other tables, she, evidently not wishing to be overheard, said, "Bai an bai," (by-and-by,) and when the general buzz recommenced, she resumed the thread of her narration. Shelley "disliked his Don Juan," said I, "and begged him to leave it off, calling it a Grub Street poem." "A what!—what do you mean by Grub Street?" I then explained to her the locality of that venerable haunt of the Muses, in the days of Pope and Swift, by a quotation from myself:—

"A spot near Cripplegate extends,
Grub street 'tis called, the modern Pindus,
Where (but that bards are never friends)
Bards might shake hands from adverse windows."

"When he dined with me," the countess continued, "he ate no meat. Still haunted by a dread of growing fat, he very much injured his own health; yet his figure, notwithstanding, grew larger. Oh! he was very handsome! Beautiful eyes and eyelashes!—and such a spiritual expression of countenance! I had occasion to go to Ravenna upon some family business. We settled that he should not accompany me. At that time several people were plaguing him to go to Greece. Ah, he said, in a sportive manner, 'Let fourteen captains come and ask me to go, and go I will.' Well, fourteen captains came to him, and said, 'Here we are, will you now go?' He was ashamed to say he had only been joking, (you know how fond he was of saying things in that light, joking sort of way,) so it ended in his undertaking to go. He said to me, 'While you are at Ravenna, I will go to Greece, and we shall meet again when we both return.' God, however, he dispose of it otherwise. He was not well when he set out. In Greece they wanted to bleed him; he would not be bled, and so he die!" The countess paused, evidently much affected. I said nothing for a moment or two, and then observed, that I had read and heard much upon the subject she had been discussing, but that I did not know how she and Lord Byron first became acquainted. She looked at me a moment as if wondering at my audacity, and then said, with a good-humoured smile, "Well, I will tell you. I was one day"—But here the drawing-room door opened, and some Frenchman with a foreign order was announced. The lady repeated her "Bai and bai" sotto voice, but, unfortunately, that bai and bai never arrived. The foreigner, unluckily, knew the countess; he, therefore, planted himself in a chair behind her, and held her ever and anon in a commonplace kind of conversation during the remainder of the evening.

Count d'Orsay set me down in Craven Street. "What was all that Madame Guiccioli was saying to you just now?" he inquired. "She was telling me her apartments are in the Rue de Rivoli, and that, if I visited the French capital, she hoped I would not forget her address." "What! it took her all that time to say that! Ah, Smeeth, you old humbug! that won't do."

The count was one of his particular friends, and, in some sort, a kindred spirit—for whom he had the highest regard. He adduced D'Orsay "as a specimen of a perfect gentleman;" and gave him the higher praise of delightfully uniting gaiety and good sense, in an unrivalled degree. We make no doubt that Mr. Smith considered the count a very superior person to any one member of either of the Houses of Parliament, since Sheridan had disappeared.

This is in his ordinary vein—

Charles Kean, they tell me at the Garrick, is a clever, but not a great actor; but you don't care about theatricals. The Opera Buffa, they tell me, is so-so; but you don't care about music. Well, then, as you do care about me, I have the satisfaction to tell you that I am convalescing apace. I move upon two crutch-canes like Asmodeus, but lacking a considerable portion of his agility. Neither, like him, can I unroof the houses to see what is passing within; neither would I if I could. Curiosity about other people's affairs is not one of my staple commodities.

I dined yesterday at Murray's. Moore was very pleasant, although not in good health. He said his forte was music, and that he was no poet apart from that sensation. He talked of the different manner in which George the Fourth was received in Edinburgh and Dublin, contrasting the dignity of the former with the servility of the latter; and he said, "The contrast makes me blush for my countrymen." After all, the two modes of reception are merely constitutional. The Scotch are naturally sedate, and the Irish extravagant: Lockhart says the last are all mad, more or less.

You will see in the Examiner an extract from a speech delivered by my brother Horace, at a meeting at Brighton, in favour of vote by ballot. He had better abstain from politics altogether: it is his business as an author to please all parties.

If any one desires to know how a rich, self-engrossed, old bachelor, of refined habits, and literary tastes, spends his Sundays in London, in 1841, here is the picture which, though sketched in 1839, still holds good:

It is to me literally a day of rest. Let me enlighten you as to my general disposal of it. I breakfast at nine. With a mind undisturbed by matters of business, I then write to you or to some editor, and then read till three o'clock. I then walk to the Union Club, read the journals, hear Lord John Russell deified or diabolized, (that word is not a bad coinage,) do the same with Sir Robert Peel or the Duke of Wellington, and then join a knot of conversationists by the fire till six o'clock, consisting of merchants, lawyers, members of parliament, and gentlemen at large. We then and there discuss the three per cent. consols (some of us preferring Dutch two and a half per cents.) and speculate upon the probable size, shape, and cost of the intended New Royal Exchange. If Lady Harrington happen to drive past our bow window, we compare her equipage to the Algerine ambassador; and when politics happen to be discussed, rally Whigs, Radicals, and Conservatives, alternately, but never seriously; such subjects having a tendency to create acrimony. At six o'clock the room begins to be deserted, wherefore I adjourn to the dining-room, and gravely looking over the bill of fare, exclaim to the waiter, "Haunch of mutton, and apple tart!" Those viands despatched with no accompanying liquid save water, I mount upward to the library; take a book and my seat in the arm-chair, and read till nine; then call for a cup of coffee and a biscuit, resume my book till eleven, afterwards return home to bed. If I have my book here which particularly excites my attention, I place my lamp upon a table by my bedside, and read in bed until twelve. No danger of ignition, my lamp being quite safe, and my curtains moreen. "Thus ends this strange eventful history." Should Sir Andrew Agnew, or any other evangelical successor in St. Stephen's Chapel, (for he is no longer a senator,) succeed in passing a Sunday Bill to abolish public carriages, it would, you see from the above detail, not affect me. My only deviation from this even tenor, is an occasional family dinner at my friend Heath's in Russell Square, or at Dr. Paris's in Dover Street.

The handsome new edition of "Pelham," lying on our table alongside of the agreeable miscellanies of Bulwer's old friend, tempts us to this interior.

I dined yesterday with E. L. Bulwer, at his new residence, in Charles Street, Berkeley Square, a splendidly and classically fitted-up mansion. One of the drawing-rooms is a fac-simile of a chamber which our host visited at Pompeii,—vases, candelabra, chairs, tables, to correspond. He lighted a perfumed pastille modelled from Mount Vesuvius. As soon as the cone of the mountain began to blaze, I fancied myself an inhabitant of the devoted city; and, as Pliny the Elder, thus addressed Bulwer, my supposed nephew:—"Our fate is accomplished, nephew. Hand me yonder volume;—I shall die as a student in my vocation. Do you then hasten to take refuge on board the fleet at Misenum. Yonder cloud of hot ashes chides thy longer delay. Feel no alarm for me—I shall live in story. The author of Pelham will rescue my name from oblivion." Pliny the Younger made me a low bow.

I perceive by the newspapers that Madame Vestris is about to exhibit Puss in Boots at Christmas, and that all the other theatres adopt nursery tales as vehicles for their pantomimes. These things must be wholly unintelligible to the present philosophical race of infants. I should suggest pieces like the following:—"Population, or Harlequin Martineau." "My Stars, or Harlequin Herschel." "Pons Asinorum, or Harlequin Triangle." Harlequin Tedious, or Yours sincerely,
JAMES SMITH.

I dined on Saturday with ——. The gorgeous furniture did not of course please me, who am above characterized [by a phrenologist] as disliking gaudy and showy colours. The M. P. properly remarked that such furniture is all right in an old baronial hall, but to encounter it in a small house in a London street is too startling a transition. The inner drawing-room, fitted up from a model at Pompeii, is in more classical, and therefore a better taste. Here were busts of Hebe, Laura, Petrarch, Dante, and other worthies.

Now for a snatch of this gay old gentleman's philosophy:—

My notion of Hentleham Hall is a large old red brick house with stone pilasters, and wings, with steps up to the central entrance. Are there any old family pictures? I love to look at things of that sort. A handsome young woman in blue velvet by Sir Peter Lely, with her right hand on the head of a favourite lap-dog; then the object of love and admiration, and now—where?

Reflections upon this lead us to two opposite conclusions, according as our temper and habits operate. The grave join the monks of La Trappe, and the gay rush into the ball-rooms and taverns; so that the certainty of death proves nothing.

O blindness to the future kindly given!

I too (insignificant I) shall live upon canvases in the studio of Lonsdale the painter in Berners Street (No. 6). On the death of the painter, his goods and chattels will come to the hammer, and a century hence I may be seen in a broker's shop in Frith Street, Soho, peeping out amid a motley assemblage of old iron, ragged sofas, and damaged crockery ware! So much for human glory! Johnson says of Cowley, that he was, in his day, a poet of unrivalled celebrity. His epitaph in Westminster Abbey says the same:

Aures dum volitant late tua scripta per orbem.

While round the world your golden writings fly.

But even a century ago Pope says, "Who now reads Cowley?" Fancy some lady, in the year 1937, taking up, in an antique library, "Poems by Mrs. Holme," and wondering who and what sort of a person she was.

Mrs Glover reminded me on Tuesday, that on that day she had just been twenty-four years in my service. What a lapse of time! How different was I then from that which I am now! Then a rattling, lively, fresh-coloured man of the town, running from dinner to rout, and from tavern to opera, and now quiet and contented, with all my social eggs in one basket. May the basket never break! I dined to-day at the Union, upon lamb-chops: I never order any thing else while they are in season. I observed that ——— ordered a luxurious repast, like Luke in the City Madam. How could you endure that man? I believe he used to call upon you in Paris. I am certain he has no soul, and if I meet him in paradise I shall be very much surprised. According to your account, ——— has a soul. I quite forgot to ask Deville whether I had one. How glad I am that, as the old man says in "As You Like it,"

In my youth I never did apply

Hot and rebellious liquors to my blood.

The consequence is, that I now can dine upon mutton and drink water with an unabated appetite.

My long confinement from illness has given me a habit of passing the evenings at home. The clubs or dinner society are no longer necessary to my comfort. I think I shall be more sparing of these recreations in future. At all events, at the beginning of every month, as now, when the periodicals make their appearance, I shall dine and pass the evening at home. Theatres have long been out of the question.

This shows us a new beauty in light periodical literature.

It was a prediction of somebody's, several years ago, that, when phrenological lectures failed, developments would be a sure card; and so they are—absolutely taking the bread of the fortune-tellers and gipsies from between their white teeth, by manipulations upon the skull, instead of the palm of the hand; and equally skilful the phrenologists seem in tickling their credulous clients.

I have at length paid a visit to Deville the phrenologist; the following is a literal copy of his certificate:—"Great kindness shown to children; warm in friendship; it is a point that requires care, as inconvenience may arise in serving others. Irritable at times, with some anger if offended, being liable to become irritable on trifles more than upon things of importance. Firm in your views and opinions, particularly upon important matters. Not over positive. Sensitive to approbation and distinction, it being a motive for most of the actions; but feeling conscious of your own power, and the respect you consider your due. Rather tenacious on the point of honour in seeking it, not stooping to servile means to obtain it. Much urbanity of manner shown in society, and much general knowledge and information developed. Property not coveted further than its purposes in life. A high respect for religion and its institutions. For occupation, the development of the intellectual faculties is strong. You should possess much useful information; languages, classics, literature, history, science, and mathematics, well understood, and with facility applied to highly useful purposes, and various practical purposes. Some poetical feeling, if studied. Works of art pleasing, with power for drawing. Things out of parallel lines or upright quickly seen. Music should give pleasure, and if studied, a good ear and judgment of it. Fond of system and arrangement by those under the direction. A great dislike to gaudy or showy colours in dress or furniture. You have many schemes and contrivances, which may cause you expenditure in buildings or alterations. You should possess a good memory for things read or observed.

(Signed) "J. DEVILLE.

"May 7, 1833."

Devilé evidently did not know me. He added further in conversation, that I took, or ought to take, a prominent lead in affairs literary or political; but that if on committees, a small number, say three, would please me most. Of the accuracy of his admeasurement, I, of course, am not a competent judge. He has clearly overrated me in some particulars: I fear I have not the high religious character he assigns to me; and that he has given me too much of science and mathematics. The expenditure in building or alterations is an odd coincidence, as I have lately had the lower apartments of my house under repair. If he means figuratively castles in the air, he is wonderfully accurate. I have always had a tendency to that sort of architecture; some of those places of ideal strength have recently which had been previously turned, as if purposely to receive them. What do you think of the fidelity of the portrait in its general features? If true, it ought to be endorsed on my engraved portrait which hangs in your anteroom.

Toppled on their warder's head,

Devilé's room was stuffed full of skulls. Around the apartment were also arranged busts of the celebrated dead and living; among the rest, Byron with his smooth Apollonian beauty, and Tom Moore with his chin in the air.

I rode in the Park on Friday with Count d'Orsay, who said Lady B. had received a beautiful poem from Mrs. Torre Holme. His light blue trousers were the admiration of the learned and curious.

The marvellous story of a husband-poisoner, which Mr. Smith relates, was probably a hoax, or the experiment upon him of a fictionist in want of a plot; and, at all events, it is not now new to the world.

It ought to be a rule, in fashionable society, never to invite two lions to the same dinner party. Evening parties afford more scope to the shaggy monarchs of the saloon. This passage illustrates the utility of the rule we suggest; and affords another fair specimen of Mr. James Smith's table-wit.

Our dinner-party yesterday at H——'s chambers was very lively. Mrs. ——— was dressed in pink, with a black lace veil; her hair smooth, with a knot behind, and a string of small pearls across her forehead. H—— was the lion of the dinner-table, whereupon I, like Addison, did "maintain my dignity by a stiff silence." An opportunity for a bon-mot, however, occurred, which I had not virtue sufficient to resist. Lord L—— mentioned that an old lady, an acquaintance of his, kept her books in detached book-cases, the male authors in one, and the female in another. I said, "I suppose her reason was, she did not wish to increase her library." Altogether the conversation, considering the presence of ladies, was too mannish. As Pepys says in his Memoirs, "Pleasant, but wrong."

Did I tell you of a pun of mine upon ———, who, since the obtaining of his pension, has ceased to write? viz. that he was a pen-skunner. Not so very bad. Tell this to your husband.

Count d'Orsay called on me yesterday. The mixture of gaiety and good sense in his conversation makes him always most acceptable to me.

Here is a trait of modern married life. From what portion of Scripture could the lady justify separation from her husband, because he chose to dine with a friend on Sunday?

You don't know ———. He married a widow, Sam Weller's warning not having then appeared in print. His wife is really a sensible, agreeable woman, but I espied in the drawing-room a bible and prayer-book of Patagonian dimensions. This, methought, looked suspicious. Whenever people are super-religious, it is sure to break out in quarto. Sunday dinners were in due course forbidden. ———'s friend, Colonel ———, gives Sunday dinners of unexceptionable quality. Hence arose domestic bickering. The spiritual dry-rot had got into the house, and damped the timbers of their attachment. She has gone to reside in France, and her evangelical female friends abuse poor ——— beyond measure, calling him an atheist!

We are really sorry that this lively correspondence terminates so suddenly—or rather, that it began so late; and doubly so, to part with one who should have continued always gay and juvenile, and have lived for ever—in London.

TO A LOST FRIEND.

There came a bird in lovely eventide,
In his wild voice the soul of music beamed;
His eye, like dewy morn, to earth returned,
Hymning the death-knell of the dying day.

"Harp of the sky,
O, come again with the sweet soul therein;"
But it never came again!

They brought me, in my life's green summer time,
The sweetest gift o'er which sweet earth has power;
Beauty's own bright ideal—a glorious flower,
So fresh, so young, so dear, so odour full!

—O beautiful!
In all thy fragrance all thy bloom still beam!—
But it faded like a dream.

Oh, fair are the fond soul's wild reveries!
And one that I remember was among the rest,
Like lily 'mid the flowers with snowy vest—

For hope's own magic hand formed the design.

"Lovely, be mine!"
But her bright face saddened in sweet sympathy,
As she whispered, "Not for thee!"

Glittering on the majestic brow of night,
A star was my companion and my friend:
Vast fields of thought it opened to my mind;
I loved it as friends love the soul that's gone.

Glorious, shine on!
Lead up to loftier heights my mounting way!
But it sank on its grave, the sky!

Lady! that bird, and flower, and dream, and star,
'Twas thou! "Ah, why thus 'reft my torn soul ground?"
And, lo, the great wind from its halls of sound, Sweeping, with master-hand, the chords of air,
—Earth's sister fair,
Did syllable its music into mortal mode:
"It was the will of God!"

SKETCHES OF LIFE AND MANNERS; FROM THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF AN ENGLISH OPIUM-EATER.

THIS mention of Allan Cunningham recalls to my recollection an affair which retains one part of its interest to this day, arising out of the very important casuistical question which it involves. We Protestant nations are in the habit of treating casuistry as a field of speculation, false and baseless per se; nay, we regard it not so much in the light of a visionary and idle speculation, as one positively erroneous in its principles, and mischievous for its practical results. This is due in part to the disproportionate importance which the Church of Rome has always attached to casuistry; making, in fact, this supplementary section of ethics take precedence of its elementary doctrines in their catholic simplicity: as though the plain and broad highway of morality were scarcely ever the safe road, but that every case of human conduct were to be treated as an exception, and never as lying within the universal rule: and thus forcing the simple, honest-minded Christian to travel upon a tortuous by-road, in which he could not advance a step in security without a spiritual guide at his elbow: and, in fact, whenever the hair-splitting casuistry is brought, with all its elaborate machinery, to bear upon the simplicities of household life, and upon the daily intercourse of the world, there it has the effect (and is expressly cherished by the Romish Church with a view to the effect) of raising the spiritual pastor into a sort of importance which corresponds to that of an attorney. The consulting casuist is, in fact, to all intents and purposes, a moral attorney. For, as the plainest man, with the most direct purposes, is yet reasonably afraid to trust himself to his own guidance in any affair connected with questions of law; so also, when taught to believe that an upright intention and good sense are equally insufficient in morals, as they are in law, to keep him from stumbling or from missing his road, he comes to regard a conscience-keeper as being no less indispensable for his daily life and conversation, than his legal agent, or his professional "man of business," for the safe management of his property, and for his guidance amongst the innumerable niceties which beset the real and inevitable intricacies of rights and duties, as they grow out of human enactments and a complex condition of society. Fortunately for the happiness of human nature and its dignity, those holier rights and duties which grow out of laws heavenly and divine, written by the finger of God upon the heart of every rational creature, are beset by no such intricacies, and require, therefore, no such vicarious agency for their practical assertion. The primal duties of life, like the primal charities, are placed high above us—legible to every eye, and shining, like the stars, with a splendour that is read in every clime, and translates itself into every language at once. Such is the imagery of Wordsworth. But this is otherwise estimated in the policy of papal Rome: and casuistry usurps a place in her spiritual economy, to which our Protestant feelings demur. So far, however, the question between us and Rome is a question of degrees. They push casuistry into a general and unlimited application; we, if at all, into a very narrow one. But another difference there is between us even more important; for it regards no mere excess in the quantity of range allowed to casuistry, but in the quality of its speculations: and which it is (more than any other cause) that has degraded the office of casuistical learning amongst us. Questions are raised, problems are entertained, by the Romish casuistry, which too often offend against all purity and manliness of thinking. And that objection occurs forcibly here, which Southey (either in The Quarterly Review or in his "Life of Westley") has urged and expanded with regard to the Romish and also the Methodist practice of auricular confession—viz., that, as it is practically managed, not leaving the person engaged in this act to confess according to the light of his own conscience, but at every moment interfering, on the part of the confessor, to suggest leading questions (as lawyers call them,) and to throw the light of confession upon parts of the experience which native modesty would leave in darkness,—so managed, the practice of confession is undoubtedly the most demoralising practice known to any Christian society. Innocent young persons, whose thoughts would never have wandered out upon any impure images or suggestions, have their ingenuity and their curiosity sent roving upon unlawful quests: they are instructed to watch what else would pass undetained in the mind, and would pass unblameably, on the Miltonic principle: ("Evil into the mind of God or man may come unblamed," &c.) Nay, which is worst of all, unconscious or semi-conscious thoughts and feelings or natural impulses, rising, like a breath of wind under some motion of nature, and again dying away, because not made the subject of artificial review and interpretation, are now brought powerfully under the focal light of the consciousness: and whatsoever is once made the subject of consciousness, can never again have the privilege of gay, careless thoughtlessness—the privilege by which the mind, like the lamps of a mail-coach, moving rapidly through the midnight woods, illuminate, for one instant, the foliage or sleeping umbrage of the thickets; and, in the next instant, have quitted them, to carry their radiance forward upon endless successions of objects. This happy privilege is forfeited for ever, when the pointed significance of the confessor's questions, and the direct knowledge which he plants in the mind, have awakened a guilty familiarity with every form of impurity and unhallowed sensuality.

Here, then, are objections sound and deep, to casuistry, as managed in the Romish church. Every possible objection ever made to auricular confession applies with equal strength to casuistry; and some objections, besides these, are peculiar to itself. And yet, after all, these are but objections to casuistry as treated by a particular church. Casuistry in itself—casuistry as a possible, as a most useful, and a most interesting speculation—remains unaffected by any one of these objections; for none applies to the essence of the case, but only to its accidents, or separable adjuncts. Neither is this any curious or subtle observation of little practical value. The fact is as far otherwise as can be imagined—the defect to which I am here pointing, is one of the most clamorous importance. Of what value, let me ask, is Paley's Moral Philosophy? What is its imagined use? Is it that in substance it reveals any new duties, or banishes as false any old ones? No; but because the known and admitted duties—duties recognised in every system of ethics—are here placed (successfully or not) upon new foundations, or brought into relation with new principles not previously perceived to be in any relation whatever. This, in fact, is the very meaning of a theory* or contemplation, [Θεωρία,] when A, B, C, old and undisputed facts have their relations to each other developed. It is not, therefore, for any practical benefit in action, so much as for the satisfaction of the understanding, when reflecting on a man's own actions, the wish to see what his conscience or his heart prompts reconciled to general laws of thinking—this is the particular service performed by Paley's Moral Philosophy. It does not so much profess to tell what you are to do, as the why and the wherefore; and, in particular, to show how one rule of action may be reconciled to some other rule of equal authority, but which, apparently, is in hostility to the first. Such, then, is the utmost and highest aim of the Paleyan or the Ciceronian ethics, as they exist. Meantime, the grievous defect to which I have adverted above—a defect equally found in all systems of morality, from the Nichomachéan ethics of Aristotle downwards—is the want of a casuistry, by way of supplement to the main system, and governed by the spirit of the very same laws, which the writer has previously employed in the main body of his work. And the immense superiority of this supplementary section, to the main body of the systems, would appear in this, that the latter I have just been saying, aspires only to guide the reflecting judgment in harmonising the different parts of his own conduct, so as to bring them under the same law; whereas the casuistical section, in the supplement, would seriously undertake to guide the conduct, in many doubtful cases, of action—cases which are so regarded by all thinking persons. Take, for example, the case which so often arises between master and servant, and in so many varieties of form—a case which requires you to decide between some violation of your conscience, on the one hand, as to veracity, by saying something that is not strictly true, as well as by evading (and that is often done) all answer to inquiries which you are unable to meet satisfactorily—a violation of your conscience to this extent, and in this way; or, on the other hand, a still more painful violation of your conscience in consigning deliberately some young woman—faulty, no doubt, and erring, but yet likely to derive a lesson from her own errors, and the risk to which they have exposed her—consigning her, I say, to ruin, by refusing her a character, and thus shutting the door upon all the paths by which she might retrace her steps. This I state as one amongst the many cases of conscience daily occurring in the common business of the world. It would surprise any reader to find how many they are; in fact, a very large volume might be easily collected of such cases as are of ordinary occurrence. Casuistry, the very word casuistry expresses the science which deals with such cases: for as a case, in the declension of a noun, means a falling away, or a deflection from the upright nominative (rectus), so a case in ethics implies some falling off, or deflection from the high road of catholic morality. Now, of all such cases, one, perhaps the most difficult to manage, the most intractable, whether for consistency of thinking as to the theory of morals, or for consistency of action as to the practice of morals, is the case of DUKELLING.

As an introduction, I will state my story—the case for the casuist; and then say one word on the reason of the case.

First, let me report the case of a friend—a distinguished lawyer at the English bar. I had the circumstances from himself, which lie in a very small compass; and, as my friend is known, to a proverb almost, for his literal accuracy in all statements of fact, there need be no fear of any mistake as to the main points of the case. He was one day engaged in pleading before the Commissioners of Bankruptcy; a court then newly appointed, and differently constituted, I believe, in some respects, from its present form. That particular commissioner, as it happened, who presided at the moment when the case occurred, had been recently appointed, and did not know the faces of those who chiefly practised in the court. All things, indeed, concurred

* No terms of art are used so arbitrarily, and with such perfect levity, as the terms hypothesis, theory, system. Most writers use one or other with the same indifference that they use in constructing the title of a novel, or, suppose, of a pamphlet, where the phrase thoughts, or strictures, or considerations, upon so and so, are used ad libitum. Meantime, the distinctions are essential. That is properly an hypothesis where the question is about a cause: certain phenomena are known and given: the object is to place below these phenomena a basis [ἡ δόξαις] capable of supporting them, and accounting for them. Thus, if you were to assign a cause sufficient to account for the aurora borealis, that would be an hypothesis. But a theory, on the other hand, takes a multitude of facts all disjointed, or, at most, suspected, of some inter-dependency: these it takes and places under strict laws of relation to each other. But here there is no question of a cause. Finally, a system is the synthesis of a theory and an hypothesis: it states the relations as amongst an undigested mass, rudis indigestaque moles, of known phenomena; and it assigns a basis for the whole, as in an hypothesis. These distinctions would become vivid and convincing by the help of proper illustrations.

to favour his mistake: for the case itself came on in a shape or in a stage which was liable to mis-interpretation, from the partial view which it allowed of the facts, under the hurry of the procedure; and my friend, also, unluckily, had neglected to assume his barrister's costume, so that he passed, in the commissioner's appreciation, as an attorney. "What if he had been an attorney?" it may be said: "was he, therefore, less entitled to courtesy or justice?" Certainly not; nor is it my business to apologise for the commissioner. But it may easily be imagined, and (making allowances for the confusion of hurry and imperfect knowledge of the case) it does offer something in palliation of the judge's rashness, that, amongst a large heap of "Old Bailey" attorneys, who notoriously attended this court for the express purpose of whitewashing their clients, and who were in bad odour as tricksters, he could hardly have been expected to make a special exception in favour of one particular man, who had not protected himself by the insignia of his order. His main error, however, lay in misapprehending the case: this misapprehension lent strength to the assumption that my friend was an "Old Bailey" (i. e., a sharking) attorney; whilst, on the other hand, that assumption lent strength to his misapprehension of the case. Angry interruptions began: these, being retorted or resented with just indignation, produced an irritation and ill temper, which, of themselves, were quite sufficient to raise a cloud of perplexity over any law process, and to obscure it for any understanding. The commissioner grew warmer and warmer; and, at length, he had the presumption to say:—"Sir, you are a disgrace to your profession." When such sugar-plums, as Captain M'Turk the peacemaker observes, were flying between them, there could be no room for further parley. That same night the commissioner was waited on by a friend of the barrister's, who cleared up his own misconceptions to the disconcerted judge; placed him, even to his own judgment, thoroughly in the wrong; and then most courteously troubled him for a reference to some gentleman, who would arrange the terms of a meeting for the next day. The commissioner was too just and grave a man to be satisfied with himself, on a cool review of his own conduct. Here was a quarrel ripened into a mortal feud, likely enough to terminate in wounds, or, possibly, in death to one of the parties, which, on his side, carried with it no palliations from any provocation received, or from wrong and insult, in any form, sustained: these, in an aggravated shape, could be pleaded by my friend, but with no opening for retaliatory pleas on the part of the magistrate. That name, again, of magistrate, increased his offence and pointed its moral: he, a conservator of the laws—he, a dispenser of equity, sitting even at the very moment on the judgment seat—he to have commenced a brawl, nay to have fastened a quarrel upon a man even then of some consideration and of high promise; a quarrel which finally tended to this result—shoot or be shot. That commissioner's situation and state of mind, for the succeeding night, were certainly not enviable: like Southey's erring painter, who had yielded to the temptation of the subtle fiend,

With repentance his only companion he lay;
And a dismal companion is she.

Meantime, my friend—what was his condition; and how did he pass the interval? I have heard him feelingly describe the misery, the blank anguish of this memorable night. Sometimes it happens that a man's conscience is wounded; but this very wound is the means, perhaps, by which his feelings are spared for the present: sometimes his feelings are lacerated; but this very laceration makes the ransom for his conscience. Here, on the contrary, his feelings and his happiness were dimmed by the very same cause which offered pain and outrage to his conscience. He was, upon principle, a hater of duelling. Under any circumstances, he would have condemned the man who could, for a light cause, or almost for the weightiest, have so much as accepted a challenge. Yet, here he was positively offering a challenge; and to whom? To a man whom he scarcely knew by sight; whom he had never spoken to until this unfortunate afternoon; and towards whom (now that the momentary excitement of anger had passed away) he felt no atom of passion or resentment whatsoever. As a free "unhoused" young man, therefore, had he been such, without ties or obligations in life, he would have felt the profoundest compunction at the anticipation of any serious injury inflicted upon another man's hopes or happiness, or upon his own. But what was his real situation? He was a married man, married to the woman of his choice within a very few years: he was also a father, having one most promising son, somewhere about three years old. His young wife and his son composed his family; and both were dependent, in the most absolute sense, for all they possessed or they expected—for all they had or ever could have—upon his own exertions. Abandoned by him, losing him, they forfeited, in one hour, every chance of comfort, respectability, or security from scorn and humiliation. The mother, a woman of strong understanding and most excellent judgment—good and upright herself—liable, therefore, to no habit of suspicion, and constitutionally cheerful, went to bed with her young son, thinking no evil. Midnight came, one, two o'clock; mother and child had long been asleep; nor did either of them dream of that danger which even now was yawning under their feet. The barrister had spent the hours from ten to two in drawing up his will, and in writing such letters as might have the best chance, in case of fatal issue to himself, for obtaining some aid to the desolate condition of those two beings whom he would leave behind, unprotected and without provision. Oftentimes he stole into the bedroom, and gazed with anguish upon the innocent objects of his love; and, as his conscience now told him, of his bitterest perfidy. "Will you then leave us? Are you really going to betray us? Will you deliberately consign us to life-long poverty, and scorn, and grief?" These affecting apostrophes he seemed, in the silence of the night, to hear almost with bodily ears. Silent reproaches seemed written upon their sleeping features; and once, when his wife suddenly awakened under the glare of the lamp which he carried, he felt the strongest impulse to fly from the room ; but he faltered, and stood rooted to the spot. She looked at him smilingly, and asked why he was so long in coming to bed. He pleaded an excuse, which she easily admitted, of some law case to study against the morning, or some law paper to draw. She was satisfied ; and fell asleep again. He, however, fearing, above all things, that he might miss the time for his appointment, resolutely abided by his plan of not going to bed ; for the meeting was to take place at Chalk Farm, and by half-past five in the morning : that is, about one hour after sunrise. One hour and a half before this time, in the gray dawn, just when the silence of Nature and of mighty London was most absolute, he crept stealthily, and like a guilty thing, to the bedside of his sleeping wife and child ; took, what he believed might be his final look of them : kissed them softly ; and, according to his own quotation from Coleridge's "Remorse,"

In agony that could not be remembered ; and a conflict with himself that defied all rehearsal ; he quitted his peaceful cottage at Chelsea in order to seek for the friend who had undertaken to act as his second. He had good reason, from what he had heard on the night before, to believe his antagonist an excellent shot ; and, having no sort of expectation that any interruption could offer to the regular progress of the duel, he, as the challenger, would have to stand the first fire ; at any rate, conceiving this to be the fair privilege of the party challenged, he did not mean to avail himself of any proposal for drawing lots upon the occasion, even if such a proposal should happen to be made. Thus far the affair had travelled through the regular stages of expectation and suspense ; but the interest of the case as a story was marred and brought to an abrupt conclusion by the conduct of the commissioner. He was a man of known courage, but he also was a man of conscientious scruples ; and, amongst other instances of courage, had the courage to own himself in the wrong. He felt that his conduct hitherto had not been wise or temperate, and that he would be sadly aggravating his original error by persisting in aiming at a man's life, upon which life hung also the happiness of others, merely because he had offered to that man a most unwarranted insult. Feeling this, he thought fit, at first coming upon the ground, to declare that, having learned, since the scene in court, the real character of his antagonist, and the extent of his own mistake, he was resolved to brave all appearances and ill-natured judgments, by making an ample apology ; which, accordingly, he did ; and so the affair terminated. I have thought it right, however, to report the circumstances, both because they were really true in every particular, but, much more, because they place in strong relief one feature which is often found in these cases, and which is allowed far too little weight in distributing the blame between the parties : to this I wish to solicit the reader's attention. During the hours of this never-to-be-forgotten night of wretchedness and anxiety, my friend's reflection was naturally forced upon the causes which had produced it. In the world's judgment, he was aware that he himself, as the one charged with the most weighty responsibility, (those who depended upon him being the most entirely helpless,) would have to sustain by much the heaviest censure : and yet what was the real proportion of blame between the parties ? He, when provoked and publicly insulted, had retorted angrily : that was almost irresistible under the constitution of human feelings ; the meekest of men could scarcely do less. But surely the true onus of wrong and moral responsibility for all which might follow, rested upon that party who, giving way to mixed impulses of rash judgment and of morose temper, had allowed himself to make a most unprovoked assault upon the character of one whom he did not know ; well aware that such words, uttered publicly by a person in authority, must, by some course or other, be washed out and cancelled ; or, if not, that the party submitting to such defamatory insults, would at once exile himself from the society and countenance of his professional brethren. Now, then, in all justice, it should be so ordered that the weight of public indignation might descend upon him, whoever he might be, (and, of course, the more heavily, according to the authority of his station and his power of inflicting wrong,) who, should thus wantonly abuse his means of influence, to the dishonour or injury of an unoffending party. We clothe a public officer with power, we arm him with influential authority over public opinion ; not that he may apply these authentic sanctions to the backing of his own malice, and giving weight to his private caprices : and, wherever such abuse takes place, then it should be so contrived that some reaction in behalf of the injured person might receive a sanction equally public. And, upon this point, I shall say a word or two more, after first stating my own case ; a case where the outrage was far more insufferable, more deliberate, and more malicious ; but, on the other hand, in this respect less effectual for injury, that it carried with it no sanction from any official station or repute in the unknown parties who offered the wrong. The circumstances were these :— In 1824, I had come up to London upon an errand in itself sufficiently vexatious—of fighting against pecuniary embarrassments, by literary labours ; but, as had always happened hitherto, with very imperfect success, from the miserable thwartings I incurred through the deranged state of the liver. My zeal was great, and my application was unintermitting ; but spirits radically vitiated, chiefly through the direct mechanical depression caused by one important organ deranged ; and, secondly, by a reflex effect of depression through my own thoughts, in estimating my prospects ; together with the aggravation of my case, by the inevitable exile from my own mountain home,—all this reduced the value of my exertions in a deplorable way. It was rare indeed that I could satisfy my own judgment, even tolerably, with the quality of any literary article I produced ; and my power to make sustained exertions, drooped, in a way I could not control, every other hour of the day : insomuch, that what with parts to be cancelled, and what with whole days of torpor and pure defect of power to produce any thing at all, very often it turned out that all my labours were barely sufficient (some times not sufficient) to meet the current expenses of my residence in London. Three months' literary toil terminated, at times, in a result = 0; the whole plus being just equal to the minus, created by two separate establishments, and one of them in the most expensive city of the world. Gloomy, indeed, was my state of mind at that period: for, though I made prodigious efforts to recover my health, (sensible that all other efforts depended for their result upon this elementary effort, which was the conditio sine qua non for the rest,) yet all availed me not; and a curse seemed to settle upon whatever I then undertook. Such was my frame of mind on reaching London: in fact it never varied. One canopy of murky clouds (a copy of that dun atmosphere which settles so often upon London) brooded for ever upon my spirits, which were in one uniformly low key of cheerless despondency; and, on this particular morning, my depression had been deeper than usual, from the effects of a long, continuous journey of 300 miles, and of exhaustion from want of sleep. I had reached London, about six o'clock in the morning, by one of the northern mails; and, resigning myself as usual in such cases, to the chance destination of the coach, after delivering our bags in Lombard Street, I was driven down to a great city hotel. Here there were hot baths; and, somewhat restored by this luxurious refreshment, about eight o'clock I was seated at a breakfast table; upon which, in a few minutes, as an appendage not less essential than the tea-service, one of the waiters laid that morning's Times, just reeking from the press. The Times, by the way, is notoriously the leading journal of Europe any where; but, in London, and more peculiarly in the city quarter of London, it enjoys a pre-eminence scarcely understood elsewhere. Here it is not a morning paper, but the morning paper: no other is known, no other is cited as authority in matters of fact. Strolling with my eye indolently over the vast Babylonian confusion of the enormous columns, naturally as one of the corps littéraire, I found my attention drawn to those regions of the paper which announced forthcoming publications. Amongst them was a notice of a satirical journal, very low priced, and already advanced to its third or fourth number. My heart palpitated a little on seeing myself announced as the principal theme for the malice of the current number. The reader must not suppose that I was left in any doubt as to the quality of the notice with which I had been honoured; and that, by possibility, I was solacing my vanity with some anticipation of honeyed compliments. That, I can assure him, was made altogether impossible, by the kind of language which flourished in the very foreground of the programme, and even of the running title. The exposure and depluming (to borrow a good word from the fine old rhetorician, Fuller,) of the leading "humbugs" of the age—that was announced as the regular business of the journal: and the only question which remained to be settled was, the more or less of the degree; and also one other question, even more interesting still, viz.—whether personal abuse were intermingled with literary. Happiness, as I have experienced in other periods of my life, deep domestic happiness, makes a man comparatively careless of ridicule, of sarcasm, or of abuse. But calamity—the degradation, in the world's eye, of every man who is fighting with pecuniary difficulties—exasperates beyond all that can be imagined, a man's sensibility to insult. He is even apprehensive of insult—tremulously fantastically apprehensive, where none is intended; and like Wordsworth's shepherd, with his very understanding consciously abused and depraved by his misfortunes is ready to say, at all hours—

And every man I met or faced,
Methought he knew some ill of me.

Some notice, perhaps, the newspaper had taken of this new satirical journal, or some extracts might have been made from it; at all events, I had ascertained its character so well that, in this respect, I had nothing to learn. It now remained to get the number which professed to be seasoned with my particular case; and it may be supposed that I did not loiter over my breakfast after this discovery. Something which I saw or suspected amongst the significant hints of a paragraph or advertisement, made me fear that there might possibly be insinuations or downright assertion in the libel requiring instant public notice; and, therefore, on a motive of prudence, had I even otherwise felt that indifference for slander which now I do feel, but which, in those years, morbid irritability of temperament forbade me to affect, I should still have thought it right to look after the work; which now I did: and, by nine o'clock in the morning—an hour at which few people had seen me for years—I was on my road to Smithfield. Smithfield? Yes; even so. All known and respectable publishers having declined any connexion with the work, the writers had facetiously resorted to this aceldama, or slaughtering quarter of London—to these vast shambles, as typical, I suppose, of their own slaughtering spirit. On my road to Smithfield, I could not but pause for one moment to reflect on the pure defecated malice which must have prompted an attack upon myself. Retaliation or retort it could not pretend to be. To most literary men, scattering their written reviews, or their opinions, by word of mouth, to the right and the left with all possible carelessness, it never can be matter of surprise, or altogether of complaint, (unless as a question of degrees,) that angry notices, or malicious notices, should be taken of themselves. Few, indeed, of literary men can pretend to any absolute innocence from offence, and from such even as may have seemed deliberate. But I, for my part, could. Knowing the rapidity with which all remarks of literary men upon literary men are apt to circulate, I had studiously and resolutely forborne to say any thing, whether of a writer or a book, unless where it happened that I could say something that would be felt as complimentary. And as to written reviews, so much did I dislike the assumption of judicial functions and authority over the works of my own brother authors and contemporaries, that I have, in my whole life, written only two; at that time only one; and that one, though a review of an English novel, was substantially a review of a German book, taking little notice, or none, of the English translator; for, although he, a good German scholar now, was a very imperfect one at that time, and was, therefore, every way open to criticism, I had evaded this invidious office applied to a novice in literature, and (after pointing out one or two slight blemishes of trivial importance) all that I said of a general nature was a compliment to him upon the felicity of his verses. Upon the German author I was, indeed, severe, but hardly as much as he deserved. The other review was a tissue of merriment and fun; and though, it is true, I did hear that the fair authoress was offended at one jest, I may safely leave it for any reader to judge between us. She, or her brother, amongst other Latin epigrams, had one addressed to a young lady upon the loss of her keys. This, the substance of the lines showed to have been the intention; but (by a very venial error in one who was writing Latin from early remembrance of it, and not in the character of a professing scholar) the title was written De clavis instead of De clavis amissis; upon which I observed that the writer had selected a singular topic for condolence with a young lady,—viz., “on the loss of her cudgels,” (clavis, as an ablative, coming clearly from clava.) This (but I can hardly believe it) was said to have offended Miss H.; and, at all events, this was the extent of my personalities. Many kind things I had said; much honour, much admiration, I had professed at that period of my life in occasional papers or private letters, towards many of my contemporaries, but never any thing censorious or harsh; and simply on a principle of courteous forbearance which I have felt to be due towards those who are brothers of the same liberal profession with one's self. I could not feel, when reviewing my whole life, that in any one instance, by act, by word, or by intention, I had offered any unkindness, far less any wrong or insult, towards a brother author. I was at a loss, therefore, to decipher the impulse under which the malignant libeller could have written, in making (as I suspected already) my private history the subject of his calumnies. Jealousy, I have since understood, jealousy, was the foundation of the whole. A little book of mine had made its way into drawing-rooms where some book of his had not been heard of. On reaching Smithfield, I found the publisher to be a medical bookseller, and, to my surprise, having every appearance of being a grave, respectable man; notwithstanding this undeniable fact, that the libellous journal, to which he thought proper to affix his sanction, trespassed on decency, not only by its slander, but, in some instances, by downright obscenity; and, worse than that, by prurient solicitations to the libidinous imagination, through blanks, seasonably interspersed. I said nothing to him in the way of inquiry; for I easily guessed that the knot of writers who were here clubbing their virus, had not so ill combined their plans as to leave them open to detection by a question from any chance stranger. Having, therefore, purchased a set of the journal, then amounting to three or four numbers, I went out; and in the elegant promenades of Smithfield, I read the lucubrations of my libeller. Fit academy for such amenities of literature! Fourteen years have gone by since then; and, possibly, the unknown hound who yelled, on that occasion, among this kennel of curs, may, long since, have buried himself and his malice in the grave. Suffice it here to say, that, calm as I am now, and careless on recalling the remembrance of this brutal libel, at that time I was convulsed with wrath. As respected myself, there was a depth of malignity in the article which struck me as perfectly mysterious. How could any man have made an enemy so profound, and not even have suspected it? That puzzled me. For, with respect to the other objects of attack, such as Sir Humphrey Davy, &c., it was clear that the malice was assumed; that, at most, it was the gay impertinence of some man upon town, armed with triple Irish brass from original defect of feeling, and willing to raise an income by running a muck at any person just then occupying enough of public interest to make the abuse saleable. But, in my case, the man flew like a bull-dog at the throat, with a pertinacity and acharnement of malice that would have caused me to laugh immoderately, had it not been for one intolerable wound to my feelings. These mercenary libellers, whose stiletto is in the market, and at any man's service for a fixed price, callous and insensible as they are, yet retain enough of the principles common to human nature, under every modification, to know where to plant their wounds. Like savage hackney coachmen, they know where there is a raw. And the instincts of human nature teach them that every man is vulnerable through his female connexions. There lies his honour; there his strength; there his weakness. In their keeping is the heaven of his happiness; in them and through them the earthy of its fragility. Many there are who do not feel the maternal relation to be one in which any excessive freight of honour or sensibility is embarked. Neither is the name of sister, though tender in early years, and impressive to the fireside sensibilities, universally and through life the same magical sound. A sister is a creature whose very property and tendency (qua sister) is to alienate herself, not to gather round your centre. But the names of wife and daughter these are the supreme and starry charities of life: and he who, under a mask, fighting in darkness, attacks you there, that coward has you at disadvantage. I stood in those hideous shambles of Smithfield: upwards I looked to the clouds, downwards to the earth, for vengeance. I trembled with excessive wrath—such was my infirmity of feeling at that time, and in that condition of health; and had I possessed forty thousand lives, all, and every one individually, I would have sacrificed in vindication of her that was thus cruelly libelled. Shall I give currency to his malice, shall I aid and promote it by repeating it? No. And yet why not? Why should I scruple, as if afraid to challenge his falsehoods?—why should I scruple to cite them? He, this libeller, asserted—But laugh!

This slander seemed to have been built upon some special knowledge of me; for I had often spoken with horror of those who could marry persons in a condition which obliged them to obedience—a case which had happened repeatedly within my own knowledge; and I had spoken on this ground, that the authority of a master might be supposed to have been interposed, whether it really were so or not in favour of his designs; and thus a presumption, however false it might be, always remained that his wooing had been, perhaps, not the wooing of perfect freedom, so essential to the dignity of woman, and, therefore, essential to his own dignity; but that perhaps, it had been favoured by circumstances, and by opportunities created, if it had not even been favoured, by express exertions of authority. The libeller, therefore, did seem to have some knowledge of my peculiar opinions: yet, in other points, either from sincere ignorance or from affectation, and by way of turning aside suspicion, he certainly manifested a non-acquaintance with facts relating to me that must have been familiar enough to all within my circle.

Let me pursue the case to its last stage. The reader will say, perhaps, why complain of a paltry journal that assuredly never made any noise; for I, the reader, never heard of it till now. No, that is very possible; for the truth is, and odd enough it seems, this malicious journal prospered so little, that, positively, at the seventh No. it stopped. Laugh I did, and laugh I could not help but do, at this picture of baffled malice: writers willing and ready to fire with poisoned bullets, and yet perfectly unable to get an effective aim, from sheer want of co-operation on the part of the public.

However, the case as it respected me, went farther than it did with respect to the public. Would it be believed that human malice, with respect to a man not even known by sight to his assailants, as was clear from one part of their personalities, finally—that is to say, months afterwards—adopted the following course:—The journal had sunk under public scorn and neglect; neglect at first, but, perhaps, scorn at the last; for, when the writers found that mere malice availed not to draw public attention, they adopted the plan of baiting their hooks with obscenity; and they published a paper, professing to be written by Lord Byron, called, "My Wedding Night;" and very possible, from internal evidence, to have been really written by him; and yet the combined forces of Byron and obscenity failed to save them,—which is rather remarkable. Having sunk, one might suppose the journal was at an end, for good and evil; and, especially, that all, who had been molested by it, or held up to ridicule, might now calculate on rest. By no means: First of all they made inquiries about the localities of my residence, and the town nearest to my own family. Nothing was effected unless they carried the insult, addressed to my family, into the knowledge of that family and its circle. My cottage in Gramere was just 280 miles from London, and eighteen miles from any town whatsoever. The nearest was Kendal; a place of perhaps 16,000 inhabitants; and the nearest therefore, at which there were any newspapers printed,

There were two: one denominated The Gazette; the other The Chronicle. The first was Tory and Conservative; had been so from its foundation; and was, besides, generous in its treatment of private character. My own contributions to it I will mention hereafter. The Chronicle, on the other hand, was a violent reforming journal, and conducted in a partisan spirit. To this newspaper the article was addressed; by this newspaper it was published; and by this it was carried into my own "next-door" neighbourhood. Next-door neighbourhood? But that surely must be the very best direction these libellers could give to their malice; for there, at least, the falsehood of their malice must be notorious. Why, yes: and in that which was my neighbourhood, according to the most literal interpretation of the term, a greater favour could not have been done me, nor a more laughable humiliation for my unprovoked enemies. Commentary or refutation there needed none; the utter falsehood of the main allegations was so obvious to every man, woman, and child, that, of necessity, it discredited even those parts which might, for any thing known to my neighbours, have been true. Nay, it was the means of procuring for me a generous expression of sympathy, that would else have been wanting; for some gentlemen of the neighbourhood, who were but slightly known to me, put the malignant journal into the fire at a public reading-room. So far was well; but, on the other hand, in Kendal, a town nearly twenty miles distant, of necessity I was but imperfectly known; and though there was a pretty general expression of disgust at the character of the publication, and the wanton malignity which it bore upon its front, since, true or not true, no shadow of a reason was pleaded for thus bringing forward statements expressly to injure me, or to make me unhappy; yet there must have been many, in so large a place, who had too little interest in the question, or too limited means of inquiry, for ever ascertaining the truth. Consequently, in their minds, to this hour, my name, as one previously known to them, and repeatedly before the town in connexion with political or literary articles in their Conservative journal, must have suffered.

But the main purpose, for which I have reported the circumstances of these two cases, relates to the casuistry of duelling. Casuistry, as I have already said, is the moral philosophy of cases—that is, of anomalous combinations of circumstances—that, for any reason whatsoever, do not fall, or do not seem to fall, under the general rules of morality. As a general rule, it must, doubtless, be unlawful to attempt another man's life, or to hazard your own. Very special circumstances must concur to make out any case of exception; and even then it is evident, that one of the parties must always be deeply in the wrong. But it does strike me, that the present casuistry of society upon the question of duelling, is profoundly wrong, and wrong by manifest injustice. Very little distinction is ever made, in practice, by those who apply their judgments to such cases, between the man who, upon principle, practises the most cautious self-restraint and moderation in his daily demeanour, never under any circumstance offering an insult, or any just occasion of quarrel, and resorting to duel only under the most insufferable provocation, between this man, on the one side, and the most wanton ruffian, on the other, who makes a common practice of playing upon other men's feelings, whether in reliance upon superior bodily strength, or upon the pacific disposition of conscientious men, and fathers of families. Yet, surely, the difference between them goes the whole extent of the interval between wrong and right. Even the question, "Who gave the challenge?" which is sometimes put, often merges virtually in the transcendent question, "Who gave the provocation?" For it is important to observe, in both the cases which I have reported, that the onus of offering the challenge was thrown upon the unoffending party; and thus, in a legal sense, that party is made to give the provocation who, in a moral sense, received it. But surely, if even the law makes allowances for human infirmity, when provoked beyond what it can endure,—we, in our brotherly judgments upon each other, ought, a fortiori, to take into the equity of our considerations the amount and quality of the offence. It will be objected that the law, so far from allowing for, expressly refuses to allow for, sudden sallies of anger or explosions of vindictive fury, unless in so far as they are extempore, and before the reflecting judgment has had time to recover itself. Any indication that the party had leisure for calm review, or for a cool selection of means and contrivances in executing his vindictive purposes, will be fatal to a claim of that nature. This is true; but the nature of a printed libel is, continually to renew itself as an insult. The subject of it reads this libel, perhaps, in solitude; and, by a great exertion of self-command, resolves to bear it with fortitude and in silence. Some days after, in a public room, he sees strangers reading it also: he hears them scoffing and laughing loudly: in the midst of all this, he sees himself pointed out to their notice by some one of the party who happens to be acquainted with his person; and, possibly, if the libel take that particular shape which excessive malice is most likely to select, he will hear the name of some female relative, dearer, it may be to him, and more sacred in his ears, than all this world beside, bandied about with scorn and mockery by those who have not the poor excuse of the original libellers, but; are, in fact, adopting the second-hand malignity of others. Such cases, with respect to libels that are quickened into popularity by interesting circumstances, or by a personal interest attached to any of the parties, or by wit, or by extraordinary malice, or by scenical circumstances, or by circumstances unusually ludicrous, are but too likely to occur; and, with every fresh repetition, the keenness of the original provocation is renewed, and in an accelerated ratio. Again, with reference to my own case, or to any case resembling that, let it be granted that I was immoderately and unreasonably transported by anger at the moment;—I thought so myself, after a time, when the journal which published the libel sank under the public neglect; but this was an after consideration; and, at the moment, how heavy an aggravation was given to the stings of the malice, by the deep dejection, from embarrassed circumstances and from disordered health, which then possessed me; aggravations, perhaps, known to the libellers as encouragements for proceeding at the time, and often enough likely to exist in other men's cases. Now, in the case as it actually occurred, it so happened that the malicious writers had, by the libel, dishonoured themselves too deeply in the public opinion, to venture upon coming forward, in their own persons, to avow their own work; but suppose them to have done so (as, in fact, even in this case, they might have done, had they not published their intention of driving a regular trade in libel and in slander;) suppose them insolently to beard you in public haunts; to cross your path continually when in company with the very female relative upon whom they had done their best to point the finger of public scorn; and suppose them further, by the whole artillery of contemptuous looks, words, gestures, and unrepressed laughter, to republish, as it were, ratify, and publicly to apply, personally, their own original libel, as often as chance or as opportunity (eagerly improved) should throw you together in places of general resort; and suppose, finally, that the central figure—may, in their account, the very butt throughout this entire drama of malice—should chance to be an innocent, gentle-hearted, dejected, suffering woman, utterly unknown to her persecutors, and selected as their martyr merely for her relationship to yourself—suppose her, in short, to be your wife—a lovely young woman sustained by womanly dignity, or else ready to sink into the earth with shame, under the cruel and unmanly insults heaped upon her, and having no protector upon earth but yourself: lay all this together, and then say whether, in such a case, the most philosophic or the most Christian patience might not excusably give way; whether flesh and blood could do otherwise than give way, and seek redress for the past, but, at all events, security for the future, in what, perhaps, might be the sole course open to you—an appeal to arms. Let it not be said that the case here proposed, by way of hypothesis, is an extreme one: for the very argument has contemplated extreme cases: since, whilst conceding that duelling is an unlawful and useless remedy for cases of ordinary wrong, where there is no malice to resist a more conciliatory mode of settlement, and where it is difficult to imagine any deliberate insult except such as is palliated by intoxication—conceding this, I have yet supposed it possible that cases may arise, with circumstances of contumely and outrage, growing out of deep inexorable malice, which cannot be redressed, as things now are, without an appeal to the voye de fait. "But this is so barbarous an expedient in days of high civilisation." Why, yes, it labours with the semi-barbarism of chivalry: yet, on the other hand, this mention of chivalry reminds me to say, that if this practice of duelling share the blame of chivalry, one memorable praise there is, which also it may claim as common to them both. It is a praise which I have often insisted on; and the very sublimity of prejudice I would challenge to deny it,

Burke, in his well-known apology for chivalry, thus expresses his sense of the immeasurable benefits which it conferred upon society, as a supplementary code of law, reaching those cases which the weakness of municipal law was then unavailing to meet, and at a price so trivial in bloodshed or violence—he calls it “the cheap defence of nations.” Yes, undoubtedly; and surely the same praise belongs incontestably to the law of duelling. For one duel in esse, there are ten thousand, every day of our lives, amid populous cities, in posse: one challenge is given, a myriad are feared: one life (and usually the most worthless, by any actual good rendered to society) is sacrificed, suppose triennially, from a nation; every life is endangered by certain modes of behaviour. Hence, then, and at a cost inconceivably trifling, the peace of society is maintained in cases which no law, no severity of police, ever could effectually reach. Brutal strength would reign paramount in the walks of public life; brutal intoxication would follow out its lawless impulses, were it not for the fear which now is always in the rear—the fear of being summoned to a strict summary account, liable to the most perilous consequences. This is not open to denial: the actual basis upon which reposes the security of us all, the peace of our wives and our daughters, and our own immunity from the vilest degradations under their eyes, is the necessity, known to every gentleman, of answering for his outrages in a way which strips him of all unfair advantages, except one (which is not often possessed,) which places the weak upon a level with the strong, and the quiet citizen upon a level with the military adventurer, or the ruffian of the gambling-house. The fact, I say, cannot be denied; neither can the low price be denied at which this vast result is obtained. And it is evident that, on the principle of expediency, adopted as the basis of morality by Paley, the justification of duelling is complete: for the greatest sum of immediate happiness is produced at the least possible sacrifice.* But there are many men of high moral principle, and yet not professing to rest upon Christianity, who reject this prudential basis of ethics as the death of all morality. And these men hold, that the social recognition of any one out of the three following dangerous and immoral principles, viz.—1st, That a man may lawfully sport with his own life; 2dly, That he may lawfully sport with the life of another; 3dly, That he may lawfully seek his redress for a social wrong, by any other channel than the law tribunals of the land: that the recognition of these, or any of them, by the jurisprudence of a nation, is a mortal wound to the very key-stone upon which the whole vast arch of morality reposes. Well, in candour, I must admit that, by justifying, in courts of judicature, through the verdicts of juries, that mode of personal redress and self-vindication, to heal and prevent which was one of the original motives for gathering into social communities, and setting up an empire of public law as paramount to all private exercise of power, a fatal wound is given to the sanctity of moral right, of the public conscience, and of law in its elementary field. So much I admit; but I say also, that the case arises out of a great dilemma, with difficulties on both sides; and that, in all practical applications of philosophy, amongst materials so imperfect as men, just as in all attempts to realize the rigour of mathematical laws amongst earthly mechanics, inevitably there will arise such dilemmas and cases of opprobrium to the reflecting intellect. However, in conclusion, I shall say four things, which I request my opponent, whoever he may be, to consider; for they are things which certainly ought to have weight; and some important errors have arisen by neglecting them.

First, then, let him remember that it is the principle at stake—viz., the recognition by a legal tribunal, as lawful or innocent of any attempt to violate the laws, or to take the law into our own hands: this it is and the mortal taint which is thus introduced into the public morality of a Christian land, thus authentically introduced; thus sealed and countersigned by judicial authority; the majesty of law actually interfering to justify, with the solemnities of trial, a flagrant violation of law; this it is, this only, and not the amount of injury sustained by society, which gives value to the question. For, as to the injury, I have already remarked, that a very trivial annual loss—one life, perhaps, upon ten millions, and that life often as little practically valuable as any amongst us—that pays our fine or ransom in that account. And, in reality, there is one popular error made upon this subject, when the question is raised about the institution of some Court of Honour, or Court of Appeal in cases of injury to the feelings, under the sanction of parliament, which satisfactorily demonstrates the trivial amount of injury sustained: it is said on such occasions that de minimis non curat lex—that the mischief, in fact, is too narrow and limited for the regard of the legislature. And we may be assured that, if

* Neither would it be open to Paley to plead that the final or remotest consequences must be taken into the calculation; and that one of these would be the weakening of all moral sanctions, and thus, indirectly, an injury to morality, which might more than compensate the immediate benefit to social peace and security; for this mode of arguing the case would bring us back to the very principle which his own implicitly, or by involution, rejects: since it would tell us to obey the principle itself without reference to the apparent consequences. By the by, Paley has an express section of his work against the law of honour as a valid rule of action; but, as Cicero says of Epicurus, it matters little what he says; the question for us is quam sibi convenienter, how far consistently with himself. Now, as Sir James Mackintosh justly remarks, all that Paley says in refutation of the principle of worldly honour is hollow and unmeaning. In fact, it is merely one of the commonplaces adopted by satire, and no philosophy at all. Honour, for instance, allows you, upon paying gambling debts, to neglect or evade all others: honour, again, allows you to seduce a married woman: and he would secretly insinuate that honour exempts all this; but it is evident that honour simply forbears to forbid all this: in other words, it is a very limited rule of action, not applying to one case of conduct in fifty. It might as well be said, that Ecclesiastical Courts sanction murder, because that crime lies out of their jurisdiction.

the evil were ever to become an extensive one, the notice of Parliament soon would be attracted to the subject; and hence we may derive a hint for an amended view of the policy adopted in past ages. Princes not distinguished for their religious scruples, made it, in different ages and places, a capital offence to engage in a duel: whence it is inferred, falsely, that, in former times, a more public homage was paid to Christian principle. But the fact is, that not the anti-Christian character of the offence so much as its greater frequency, and the consequent extension of a civil mischief was the ruling consideration with the lawgiver. Among other causes for this greater prevalence of duels, was the composition of armies, more often brought together upon mercenary principles from a large variety of different nations, whose peculiar usages, points of traditional honour, and even the oddness of their several languages to the ear, formed a perpetual occasion of insult and quarrel. Fluellen's affair with Pistol, we may be sure, was no rare but a representative case.

Secondly, In confirmation of what I have said about duelling, as the great conductor for carrying off the excess of angry irritation in society, I will repeat what was said to me by a man of great ability and distinguished powers, as well as opportunities for observation, in reference to a provincial English town, and the cabals which prevailed there. These cabals—some political, arising out of past electioneering contests; some municipal, arising out of the corporation disputes; some personal, arising out of family rivalships, or old traditionary disputes—had led to various feuds that vexed the peace of the town in a degree very considerably beyond the common experience of towns reaching the same magnitude. How was this accounted for? The word tradesman is, more than even the term middle class, liable to great ambiguity of meaning; for it includes a range so large as to take in some who tread on the heels even of the highest aristocracy, and some at the other end, who rank not at all higher than day-labourers or handicraftsmen. Now, those who ranked with gentlemen, took the ordinary course of gentlemen in righting themselves under personal insults; and the result was, that, amongst them or their families, no feuds were subsisting of ancient standing. No ill blood was nursed; no calumnies or conspicuous want of charity prevailed. Not that they often fought duels: on the contrary, a duel was a very rare event amongst the indigenous gentry of the place; but it was sufficient to secure all the effects of duelling, that it was known, with respect to this class, that, in the last resort, they were ready to fight. Now, on the other hand, the lowest order of tradesmen had their method of terminating quarrels—the old English method of their fathers—viz., by pugilistic contests. And they also cherished no malice against each other or amongst their families. "But," said my informant, "some of those who occupied the intermediate stations in this hierarchy of trade, found themselves most awkwardly situated. So far they shared in the refinements of modern society, that they disdained the coarse mode of settling quarrels by their fists. On the other hand, there was a special and peculiar reason pressing upon this class, which restrained them from aspiring to the more aristocratic modes of fighting. They were sensible of a ridicule, which everywhere attaches to many of the less elevated or liberal modes of exercising trade in going out to fight with sword and pistol. This ridicule was sharpened and made more effectual, in their case, from the circumstance of the Royal Family and the court making this particular town a frequent place of residence. Besides that apart from the ridicule, many of them depended for a livelihood upon the patronage of royalty or of the nobility, attached to their suite; and most of these patrons would have resented their intrusion upon the privileged ground of the aristocracy in conducting disputes of honour. What was the consequence? These persons, having no natural outlet for their wounded sensibilities, being absolutely debarred from any mode of settling their disputes cherished inextinguishable feuds: their quarrels in fact had no natural terminations; and the result was, a spirit of malice and most unchristian want of charity, which could not hope for any final repose, except in death." Such was the report of my observing friend: the particular town may be easily guessed at; and I have little doubt that its condition continues as of old.

Thirdly, It is a very common allegation against duelling, that the ancient Romans and Grecians never practised this mode of settling disputes; and the inference is, of course, unfavourable, not to Christianity, but to us as inconsistent disciples of our own religion; and a second inference is, that the principle of personal honour, well understood, cannot require this satisfaction for its wounds. For the present I shall say nothing on the former head, but not for want of something to say. With respect to the latter, it is a profound mistake, founded on inacquaintance with the manners and the spirit of manners prevalent amongst these imperfectly civilized nations. Honour was a sense not developed in many of its modifications amongst either Greeks or Romans. Cudgelling was at one time used as the remedy in cases of outrageous libel and pasquinade. But it is a point very little to the praise of either people, that no vindictive notice was taken of any possible personalities, simply because the most hideous license had been established for centuries in tongue license and unmanly Billingsgate. This had been promoted by the example hourly ringing in their ears of vernile scurrility. Verna—that is, the slave born in the family—had each from the other one universal and proverbial character of foul-mouthed eloquence, which heard from infancy, could not but furnish a model almost unconsciously to those who had occasion publicly to practise vituperative rhetoric. What they remembered of this vernile licentiousness, constituted the staple of their talk in such situations. And the horrible illustrations left even by the most accomplished and literary of the Roman orators, of their shameless and womanly fluency in this dialect of unlicensed abuse, are evidences, not to be resisted, of such obtuseness, such coarseness of feeling, so utter a defect of all the gentlemanly sensibilities, that no man, alive to the real state of things amongst them, would ever think of pleading their example in any other view than as an object of unmitigated disgust. At all events, the long-established custom of deluging each other in the Forum, or even in the Senate, with the foulest abuse, the precedent traditionally delivered through centuries before the time of Cæsar and Cicero, had so robbed it of its sting, that, as a subject for patient endurance, or an occasion for self conquest in mastering the feelings, it had no merit at all. Anger, prompting an appeal to the cudgel, there might be, but sense of wounded honour, requiring a reparation by appeal to arms, or a washing away by blood, no such feeling could have been subdued or overcome by a Roman, for none such existed. The feelings of wounded honour on such occasions, it will be allowed, are mere reflections (through sympathetic agencies) of feelings and opinions already existing, and generally dispersed through society. Now, in Roman society, the case was a mere subject for laughter; for there were no feelings or opinions pointing to honour, personal honour as a principle of action, nor, consequently to wounded honour as a subject of complaint. The Romans were not above duelling, but simply not up to that level of civilisation.

Finally, with respect to the suggestion of a Court of Honour, much might be said that my limits will not allow; but two suggestions I will make. First, Recurring to a thing I have already said, I must repeat that no justice would be shown unless (in a spirit very different from that which usually prevails in society) the weight of public indignation and the displeasure of the court were made to settle conspicuously upon the aggressor; not upon the challenger, who is often the party suffering under insufferable provocation (provocation which even the sternness of penal law and the holiness of Christian faith allow for,) but upon the author of the original offence. Secondly, A much more searching investigation must be made into the conduct of the seconds than is usual in the unprofessional and careless inquiries of the public into such affairs. Often enough, the seconds hold the fate of their principals entirely in their hands; and instances are not a few, within even my limited knowledge, of cases where murder has been really committed, not by the party who fired the fatal bullet, but by him who (having it in his power to interfere without loss of honour to any party) has cruelly thought fit—[and, in some instances, apparently for no purpose but that of decorating himself with the name of an energetic man, and of producing a public “sensation,” as it is called—a sanguinary affair]—to goad on the tremulous sensibility of a mind distracted between the sense of honour on the one hand, and the agonizing claims of a family on the other, into fatal extremities that might, by a slight concession, have been avoided. I could mention several instances; but, in some of these, I know the circumstances only by report. In one, however, I had my information from parties who were personally connected with the unhappy subject of the affair. The case was this:—A man of distinguished merit, whom I shall not describe more particularly, because it is no part of my purpose to recall old buried feuds, or to insinuate any personal blame whatsoever (my business being not with this or that man, but with a system and its principles;) this man, by a step well-meant but injudicious, and liable to a very obvious misinterpretation, as though taken in a view of self-interest, had entangled himself in a quarrel. That quarrel would have been settled amicably, or, if not amicably, at least without bloodshed, had it not been for an unlucky accident combined with a very unwise advice. One morning, after the main dispute had been pretty well adjusted, he was standing at the fireside after breakfast, talking over the affair so far as it had already travelled, when it suddenly and most unhappily came into his head to put this general question—“Pray, does it strike you that people will be apt, on a review of this whole dispute, to think that there has been too much talking and too little doing?” His evil genius so ordered it, that the man to whom he put this question, was one who, having no military character to rest on, could not (or thought he could not) recommend those pacific counsels which a truly brave man is ever ready to suggest—I put the most friendly construction upon his conduct—and his answer was this—“Why, if you insist upon my giving a faithful reply, if you will require me to be sincere (though I really wish you would not,) in that case my duty is to tell you, that the world has been too free in its remarks—that it has, with its usual injustice, been sneering at literary men and paper pellets, as the ammunition in which they trade; in short, my dear friend, the world has presumed to say that not you only, but that both parties, have shown a little of”—“Yes; I know what you are going to say,” interrupted the other, “of the white feather, Is it not so?”—“Exactly; you have hit the mark—that is what they say. But how unjust it is; for, says I, but yesterday, to Mr. L. M., who was going on making himself merry with the affair in a way that was perfectly scandalous—‘Sir,’ says I,—but this says I never reached the ears of the unhappy man: he had heard enough; and, as a secondary dispute was still going on that had grown out of the first, he seized the very first opening which offered itself for provoking the issue of a quarrel. The other party was not backward or slack in answering the appeal; and thus, in one morning, the prospect was overcast—peace was no longer possible; and a hostile meeting was arranged. Even at this meeting much still remained in the power of the seconds: there was an absolute certainty that all fatal consequences might have been evaded, with perfect consideration for the honour of both parties. The principals must unquestionably have felt that; but if the seconds would not move in that direction, of course their lips were sealed. A more cruel situation could not be imagined: two persons, who never, perhaps, felt more than that fiction of enmity which belonged to the situation, that is to say, assumed the enmity which society presumes rationally incident to a certain position—assumed it as a point of honour, but did not heartily feel it; and even for the slight shade of animosity which, for half an hour, they might have really felt, had thoroughly quelled it before the meeting, these two persons—under no impulses whatever, good or bad, from within, but purely in a hateful necessity of servile obedience to a command from without—prepared to perpetrate what must, in that frame of dispassionate temper have appeared to each, a purpose of murder, as regarded his antagonist—a purpose of suicide, as regarded himself. Simply a word, barely a syllable, was needed from the “Friends” (such Friends!) of the parties, to have delivered them, with honour, from this dreadful necessity: that word was not spoken; and because a breath, a motion of the lips, was wanting—because, in fact, the seconds were thoughtless and without feeling, one of the parties has long slept in a premature grave—his early blossoms scattered to the wind—his golden promise of fruit blasted; and the other has since lived that kind of life, that, in my mind, he was happier who died. Something of the same kind happened in the duel between Lord Camelford and his friend, Mr Best; something of the same kind in that between Colonel Montgomery and Captain Macnamara. In the former case, the quarrel was, at least, for a noble subject; it concerned a woman. But in the latter, a dog, and a thoughtless lash applied to his troublesome gambols, was the sole subject of dispute. The colonel, as is well known, a very elegant and generous young man, fell; and Captain Macnamara had thenceforwards a worm at his heart whose gnawings never died. He was a post-captain; and my brother afterwards sailed with him in quality of midshipman. From him I have often heard affecting instances of the degree in which the pangs of remorse had availed, to make one of the bravest men in the service a mere panic-haunted, and, in a moral sense, almost a paralytic wreck. He that, whilst his hand was unstained with blood, would have faced an army of fiends in discharge of his duty, now fancied danger in every common rocking of a boat: he made himself at times, the subject of laughter at the messes of the junior and more thoughtless officers: and his hand, whenever he had occasion to handle a spy-glass, shook, (to use the common image,) or, rather, shivered, like an aspen tree. Now, if a regular tribunal, authenticated, by Parliament, as the fountain of law, and, by the Sovereign, as the fountain of honour, were, under the very narrowest constitution, to apply itself merely to a review of the whole conduct pursued by the seconds, even under this restriction such a tribunal would operate with great advantage. It is needless to direct any severity to the conduct of the principals, unless when that conduct has been outrageous or wanton in provocation: supposing any thing tolerably reasonable and natural in the growth of the quarrel, after the quarrel is once “constituted,” (to borrow a term of Scotch law,) the principals, as they are called with relation to the subject of dispute, are neither principals nor even secondaries for the subsequent management of the dispute: they are delivered up, bound hand and foot, into the hands of their technical “friends;” passive to the law of social usage as regards the general necessity of pursuing the dispute; passive to the directions of their seconds as regards the particular mode of pursuing it. It is, therefore, the seconds who are the proper objects of notice for courts of honour; and the error has been, in framing the project of such a court, to imagine the inquiry too much directed upon the behaviour of those who cease to be free agents from the very moment that they become liable to any legal investigation whatever: simply as quarrellers, the parties are no objects of question; they are not within the field of any police review; and the very first act which brings them within that field, translates the responsibility (because the free agency) from themselves to their seconds. The whole questio revata, therefore, reduces itself to these logical moments, (to speak the language of mathematics:) the two parties mainly concerned in the case of duelling, are Society and the Seconds. The first, by authorizing such a mode of redress; the latter, by conducting it. Now, I presume, it will be thought hopeless to arraign Society at the bar of any earthly court, or apply any censure or any investigation to its mode of thinking.* To the principals, for the reasons given, it would be unjust to apply them; and the inference is, that the seconds are the parties to whom their main agency should be directed—as the parties in whose hands lies the practical control of the whole affair, and the whole machinery of opportunities, (so easily improved by a wise humanity)—for sparing bloodshed, for promoting

* If it be asked by what title I represent Society as authorizing (nay, as necessitating) duels, I answer, that I do not allude to any floating opinions of influential circles in society; for these are in continual conflict, and it may be difficult even to guess in which direction the preponderance would lie. I build upon two undeniable results, to be anticipated in any regular case of duel, and supported by one uniform course of precedent:—First, That, in a civil adjudication of any such case, assuming only that it has been fairly conducted, and agreeably to the old received usages of England, no other verdict is ever given by a jury than one of acquittal. Secondly, That, before military tribunals, the result is still stronger; for the party liable to a challenge is not merely acquitted, as a matter of course, if he accepts it with any issue whatsoever, but is positively dishonoured and degraded (nay, even dismissed the service, virtually under colour of a request that he will sell out) if he does not. These precedents form the current law for English society, as existing amongst gentlemen. Duels, pushed a l'outrance, and on the savage principles adopted by a few gambling ruffians on the Continent, (of which a good description is given in the novel of The most unfortunate Man in the World;) or by old bucaneeering soldiers of Napoleon, at war with all the world, and in the desperation of cowardice, demanding to fight in a saw-pit or across a table,—this sort of duels is as little recognised by the indulgence of English law, as, in the other extreme, the mock duels of German Burschen are recognised by the gallantry of English society. Duels of the latter sort would be deemed beneath the dignity of judicial inquiry: duels of the other sort, beyond its indulgence. But all other duels, fairly managed in the circumstances, are undeniably privileged amongst non-military persons, and commanded to those who are military.

reconciliation, for making those overtures of accommodation and generous apology which the brave are so ready to agree to, in atonement for hasty words, or rash movements of passion, but which it is impossible for them to originate. In short, for impressing the utmost possible spirit of humanizing charity and forbearance upon a practice which, after all, must for ever remain somewhat of an opprobrium to a Christian people; but which, tried by the law of worldly wisdom, is the finest bequest of chivalry; the most economic safety-valve for man's malice that man's wit could devise; the most absolute safe-guard of the weak against the brutal; and, finally, (once more to borrow the words of Burke,) in a sense the fullest and most practical, "the cheap defence of nations;" not indeed against the hostility which besieges from without, but against the far more operative nuisance of bad passions that vex and molest the social intercourse of men by ineradicable impulses from within.

I may illustrate the value of one amongst the suggestions I have made, by looking back and applying it to part of my last anecdote: the case of that promising person who was cut off so prematurely for himself, and so ruinously for the happiness of the surviving antagonist. I may mention, (as a fact known to me on the very best authority,) that the Duke of Wellington was consulted by a person of distinction, who had been interested in the original dispute, with a view to his opinion upon the total merits of the affair, on its validity, as a "fighting" quarrel, and on the behaviour of the parties to it. Upon the last question, the opinion of his Grace was satisfactory. His bias, undoubtedly, if he has any, is likely to lie towards the wisdom of the peace-maker; and possibly, like many an old soldier, he may be apt to regard the right of pursuing quarrels by arms as a privilege not hastily to be extended beyond the military body. But, on the other question, as to the nature of the quarrel, the duke denied that it required a duel; or that a duel was its natural solution. And had the duke been the mediator, it is highly probable that the unfortunate gentleman would now have been living. Certainly, the second quarrel involved far less of irritating materials than the first. It grew out of a hasty word, and nothing more; such as drops from parliamentary debaters every night of any interesting discussion—drops hastily, is as hastily recalled, or excused, perhaps, as a venial sally of passion, either by the good sense or the magnanimity of the party interested in the wrong. Indeed, by the unanimous consent of all who took notice of the affair, the seconds, or one of them at least, in this case, must be regarded as deeply responsible for the tragical issue; nor did I hear of one person who held them blameless, except that one who, of all others, might the most excusably have held them wrong in any result. But now, from such a case brought under the review of a court, such as I have supposed, and improved in the way I have suggested, a lesson so memorable might have been given to the seconds, by a two-years' imprisonment—punishment light enough for the wreck of happiness which they caused—that soon, from this single case, raised into a memorable precedent, there would have radiated an effect upon future duels for half a century to come. And no man can easily persuade me that he is in earnest about the extinction of duelling, who does not lend his countenance to a suggestion which would, at least, mitigate the worst evils of the practice, and would, by placing the main agents in responsibility to the court, bring the duel itself immediately under the direct control of that court; would make a legal tribunal not reviewers subsequently, but, in a manner, spectators of the scene; and would carry judicial moderation and skill into the very centre of angry passions; not, as now they act, inefficiently to review, and, by implication, sometimes to approve their most angry ebullitions, but practically to control and repress them.

THE PALACE-MOTHER.

A NEW YEAR'S CONGRATULATION, AND OFFERING OF HOPE, ON THE NOW MATERNAL CHARACTER OF HER MAJESTY.

BY ONE OF THE PEOPLE.

"How can my muse want subject to invent,
While thou dost breathe, that pour'st into my verse
Thine own sweet argument."—SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS.

PRaise to the vanished! to the old year praise!
It came with promise, went out promise-crown'd;
Even at its threshold bridal-wreaths it wound,
And, dying, left us in as proud amaze,—
The nuptials blest, the royal babe made known,
And now a queen-maternal on the throne.

O how the joy-bells rang their loudest peal,
The grateful news was carried through the land;
From spire to spire fast wrought the willing hand—
Glad tidings they, and gladome to reveal!
And still this New Year strengthens the delight,
And Hope's as eager to pursue the flight!

The cradle toys—and blissful babyhood,
Lo! then, the Palace-Mother at the sight
(Young in her years, and young in the delight)
Strange gazing in her self-found solitude—
The heart up-hushed, and every thought awe-charm'd
To see love's dreaming thus to life transform'd!

And very beautiful that life-bud is
In its fresh innocence—the lip, cheek, eye,
And the small hand put out so tryingly;
And still, by times, the feet, in freedom's bliss,
Working their gathering powers beneath the drape
That shows the movement, though it screens the shape.

And near that mother is another face,
 Suiting the scene—the mild, yet earnest sire
 And happy husband, with his hope on fire
 At what may be the future of his race—
 A daughter now, and other pledges yet—
 Star linked with star as never more to set !

Father and prince ! how rich the homage falls !
 Mother and queen is she—the favoured one ;
 But chiefly where the birth-pang sharp has gone,
 There Nature, the enthralling, most enthralls,—
 The inward woman tried and touched has been,
 And her new name is prouder even than Queen !

'Tis not in any state to take away
 The nature of our nature, or conceal ;
 The heart must throb or rot ; the feelings feel ;
 Our bearing's the condition of our clay :
 The diadem of glory decks the head,
 Yet cannot the feet leave the earth they tread !

And thou, high sovereign lady—Mother now !
 And thou dost know this, in thy inward thought :
 Nature, the teacher, hath this lesson taught,
 And all who watch thee, trace it on thy brow—
 The new sweet charge that takes the heart to school,
 And makes I LOVE be stronger than I RULE.

Liege lady—Mother ! yea, I judge it so,
 And have in this withal the better hope,
 That, swaying, as thou dost, thou wilt give scope
 To fullest sympathy for those below—
 The humble throng of mothers, from whose womb
 Britannia takes her greatness, or her doom !

Through the drear nooks where abject suffering lies
 In shivering pain, or dread incertitude,
 Where the dry nipple cannot give the food,
 And the weak, gum-mocked infant moans and dies,—
 There, as a mother of the mother think,
 And link around thee still the closer link.

The poor produce in pain—and so do all ;
 But ah ! how much is added to the same !
 How little of the nurse the hut can claim !
 How few the comforts found within that wall !
 A bed of straw perhaps, and cover thin,
 And the keen draughts for ever breaking in !

Some neighbour grandame, kindly as she's old,
 The only friend to lend, by times, a hand,
 Brush up the floor—do any small command,
 Hobbling from spot to spot with careful hold ;
 Yet what can she to help the greater woe !
 How give those features which such home should show !

Where is the caudle choice ! the curtained charm !
 Where each accompaniment we would espy !
 The ever-wanted change, all clean and dry,
 The wholesome gearing of the tiny form !
 The father prideful as the scene reveals !
 And the fond mother smiling as she feels !

There may, perchance, be other children, too,
 All gathered close together in that shed ;
 And some they strive to climb upon the bed
 And bring the little stranger to the view ;
 And now, anon, the place becomes all riot—
 The pale, thin hand vain beckoning to be quiet !

Nor is this all—nor yet the worst—for soon
 The needy wantons seek the cupboard door,
 And then it is the poor are truly poor—
 There is no dinner, though it be late noon !
 The babe, too, craves—and, yielding that request,
 She wishes for each mouth she had a breast !

Mother or Queen ! 'tis trying Winter time,
 The rain is wetting, or the frosts are cold,
 The snow before the vision thickly roll'd,
 Cheerless the grate, and chill the window grime :
 O mournful, therefore, in this season's fright,
 The wife who has not wherewith to delight !

Lo, thy own baby ! take it on the knee
 And watch the wistful glances upward cast :
 How much of hope is there ! and trial past !
 And every woman feels as fervently ;
 The great law conquers that outweighs all law ;
 And where's the mother can from it withdraw !

Nor doth this mighty thralldom stop even there :
 The father, brother, sister—every tie,
 Near or remote, in the affinity
 Of kindred, intertwisting, hath its share,—
 And thus still on, as still the claim extends,
 Till all the human host become as friends !

As Queen, Wife, Mother—thou, O madam, then,
 Hast noble state, and offering, to thee given,
 One of the few, as set apart by Heaven
 To wake high wish, and cherish it again ;
 And now to bind this duty closer still,
 Thy own sweet babe will but the better skill !

It were indeed most treason-like to doubt ;
 And yet, withal, the heart may be betray'd,
 And follow on—and follow but a shade !
 Though fair the promise, still no fruit come out !
 Proud words and holy phrases all o'erthrown,
 And, hideous INOR !—SELF be only known !

O ! woman, mortal !—weakly like us all,
 Be but the MOTHER and there is no dread ;
 Those soft attentions o'er the infant shed—
 The heed that nothing evil may befall—
 Each precept sage—each admonition kind,
 The heart enlarge, till all a share may find.

As thou would'st watch the time-up-growing shoot,
 Trace the weak virtues, strengthening every day,
 See reason opening to its proper sway,
 And every motive strike from wholesome root !
 As thou, the Royal Nursling, would'st befriend,
 So generous might'st thou work the wider end !

O 'twere blessed sight to see this scene reveal'd,
 The Queen, true mother of the millions all !
 Though in her Palace-Home, to yet recall
 The many deep ills round about conceal'd ;
 To make the doing good, and aiming well,
 The chief Ambition wherein to excel.

What are our party strifes, to such great aims !—
 If those be disappointed—these succeed !
 Ah ! very wantonness, and dross indeed !
 Virtue will show the more deserving claims :
 Take, then, thy baby—Mother ! to thy breast,
 And, looking there—REMEMBER ALL THE REST.

J. D. D.

OLIVER CROMWELL. EDITED BY HORACE SMITH, Esq.

THERE is an order of poems of which Byron has pithily said, "bad were better;" and there is an order of romances, much more limited in number than mediocre poems, which approximate so closely to a high standard of excellence that one regrets they are not quite perfect. Of this class is Oliver Cromwell—an anonymous work of mark and likelihood; but, from its very structure, wanting power to interest the reader—as the fortunes of its principal personages are already stamped by history,—and greatly wanting in what is artistically called, relief. It has few fictitious characters, and no subordinate personages, affairs, or interests; though these are fully as necessary, in truthfully and dramatically representing the game of life, as the heroes and heroines. In Old Mortality, for instance, Jenny Dennison and Cuddie Headrigg, with their humour, truthfulness, and minor agency in forwarding the plot, are, in their own place, as important as Claverhouse or Edith Bellenden. This holds of the fictions of all the great novelists as much as of the many-coloured life represented in Shakespeare's dramas. These, indeed, comprehend universal life, throughout its entire and complicated movements, and most minute ramifications.

In so far as what is called authentic history fails to display the internal movements, the impelling impulses, the checks and counter-checks of the vast machine of social life, history, like every thing human, is imperfect. Imagination and invention, claiming a wider range, step in, and by poetry, romance, and the drama, supply its deficiencies; and, by tracing what might be, with the creative and vivifying hand of genius, stamp lively fiction with a deeper impress of truth than dull history.

The romance of Cromwell has one special claim on notice. The romance writers, like the poets, are generally Tories; and must, we fear, continue so in spirit, whatever be their name, until opinion has completed its begun work of revolutionizing the world, and by sweeping away factitious dignities and conventional distinctions, unalterably stamped what is the true, the beautiful, and the noble, as the alone worthy to be admired and followed. But historians, as well as romance writers, are also too generally Tories—we use the word in a wide sense—and more especially the standard historians of England. Now, the author of Cromwell, if not a republican, is an enthusiastic liberal; and so far a partisan that he has often condescended to adopt the calumnies on royalty, as well as many questionable facts, of the age of which he writes: and this, not through the medium of his personages, where these Roundhead figments might have had propriety and dramatic effect, but gravely, in his own person, as the narrator of the story. His dislike of the royal martyr, (as Charles I. continues to be nicknamed, even by those who only condemn his execution from reasons of humanity and policy,) is only inferior to his dislike of the queen, Henrietta Marie; which is carried to an extreme that outrages the usual license of the historical romance:

for this species of composition has its laws; and these we consider violated when documents are produced, in which a few grains of traditionary fact are mingled up to colour a vast quantity of improbable invention. An instance of this is found in the intercepted letter of Charles to Henrietta, which is not only what the king did not write, but most unlike what he might have been presumed to have written; though there is some foundation for the fact of a letter having been intercepted in the romantic manner described.

With Cromwell for his hero—to develop whose strangely-mingled and powerful character all his care and ability are given—the author is more just and discriminating than the preface of the editor led us to expect: the shades are not wholly forgotten, though the lights sometimes overpower them; and if the picture is, after all, incomplete—and what picture of Cromwell can be otherwise, whether traced by the pen of sober history or of bright romance?—the reader learns something that is both new and true of that wonderful and perplexing personage, the English Napoleon, whose glories the national vanity eagerly appropriates, even while loyalty repudiates the principles and the course of conduct by which they were achieved. There is another use in this work, as in every historical romance proceeding from a man of talent and competent information;—the perusal, in some sort, supplies the place of history to those—and they are many—to whom history, in its undisguised form, is utterly repulsive. Nor was that eminent English statesman to be called unread, who owned that he knew the history of England only from Shakespeare's plays. But this advantage holds of Cromwell, and that in no faint degree. Milton, Hampden, Fairfax, and the master-spirits of that age, figure on the page, or carry forward the action, as well as Charles, Henrietta, and Falkland; and the bold attempt of "bidding these dry bones live"—of unaphering these immortals, is, of itself, worthy of commendation; and, where successful, of high praise. But there is, besides, a rich intermixture of pure and noble romance in "Cromwell;" a young hero cast in the mould of that exalted public virtue which the world has rarely seen; though its imagined existence is proof of its possible attainment. With this hero, the romance opens in the good old and approved style: nor shall we longer detain our readers from him.

EDGAR ARDENNE, a young Englishman of good family and estate, who, to the pure and ardent patriotism of Hampden, unites the intellect and military genius of Cromwell without any of the basenesses by which the noble qualities of the latter were foully alloyed, is just returned from a long residence on the Continent. In Greece and Italy he had enlarged his knowledge both of civil polity and the liberal arts, and gained the friendship of John Milton. Ardenne had afterwards served under the Great Gustavus. He is pushing onward to his father's seat in the north, heedless of the susans and alarms of mine host of the White Dragon, in Royston, who employs all a landlord's arts to induce this handsome, gallantly mounted, and most accomplished cavalier, to tarry under his roof over the night. But the noble cavalier, who is carefully elaborated at all points, from the plume dancing in his Spanish hat to the fetlocks of his Arabian courser, braves or scorns danger, and fares forth on a delicious autumnal evening to cross the bleak and barren hills which skirt the southern verge of Cambridgeshire. As the night fell into almost utter darkness the traveller was involved in the mazes of a scattered forest, in a path by the miry and entangled banks of the Cam. A violent thunderstorm succeeds the delicious evening; and Ardenne, to crown his difficulties, has a rencontre with a party of deer-stealers. He is bravely defending himself against the murderous cross-bows and quarter-staves of these six or seven misbegotten knaves, when the tramp of advancing horsemen is heard.

"What knaves be these?" inquired a loud and dissident voice, from the foremost of the new-comers, as the cavalier fell back toward his welcome rescuers,—"what knaves be these, that make this coil on the highway?"

"Down with the thieving Girgashites!" shouted another of the riders, ere an answer could be rendered to the querist; and, at the word, he fired a petronel at random, its momentary flash displaying the marauders struggling as best they might, through a strong black-thorn fence, which parted the road from a wild tract of coppice, glade, and woodland.

"Deer-stealers, Master Oliver," he continued, re-slinging his now useless weapon, "after the herds of my Lord de la Warr! but I have scared them for the nonce!"

"More shame to thee, Giles Overton," cried the same voice which had first spoken, "and more sin likewise, to use the carnal weapon thus in causeless strife; setting the precious spirit of a being like to, or—it may well be—better than, thyself, upon the darkling venture of chance-medley; and bartering a human life against the slaughter of a valueless and soulless beast! Go to! Giles Overton, see that thou err not in the like sort again!—But art thou hurt, good sir?" proceeded the speaker, turning in his saddle toward the traveller for whose safety he had come up so opportunely—"or have we, by the mercy of the Lord, who may in this—if it be not presumptuous in me, considering how unprofitable I am, and the mean improvement of my talent, so to judge of his workings—have vouchsafed to preserve thee for a chosen vessel,—have we, I would say, come in season to protect thee from these sons of Ammon?"

"Thanks to your timely aid, fair sir," replied the cavalier, not a little astonished at the strange address of his preserver, for he had but recently returned to his native land after protracted absence, and, at the time of his departure, the language of puritanism was not yet in vogue; "I am uninjured; and now, I pray you to increase yet further this your kindness, by informing me the straightest road for Huntingdon; it cannot be, I do suppose, far distant."

"Good lack—a stranger—by your questioning," answered he who had been called Oliver. "Huntingdon do I know right well—ay! even as one knoweth the tabernacle of his abode, and the burial place of his fathers; but I profess to you that it is distant by full thirteen miles, and those of sorry road. But ride thou on with me to Bourne, some three miles further, and I will bestow thee at a house where thou mayst tarry until morn—the Fox tavern I would say—Phineas Goodenough, my glove hath fallen, I pray thee reach it to me—a clean house truly, kept by a worthy man—yea, verily a good man, one that dwelleth in the fear of the Lord alway."

"A stranger am I, doubtless," returned the other, "else had I not inquired of thee that which then I had well known; and, of a truth, I know not now that I can do aught better than to accept your proffer frankly as it is made!"

"Be it so!" was the ready answer. "Will it please you to ride somewhat briskly—for myself, I am bound an hour's ride further, to worshipful master Pym's, nigh Caldecote."

"Ha! Pym, the friend of Hampden and John Milton. I knew not he lived hereabout," exclaimed the cavalier.

"And what knowest thou, so I may ask it," queried Oliver, "of Hampden or John Milton? Truly I took thee for a carnal-minded person, but, of a surety, it is not for a man to judge!"

"For what it liketh your wisdom to mistake me, I know not; nor, to speak frankly, do I care greatly," replied the other; "but, to satisfy your question, of Hampden I know nothing, save that the mode of his resistance to that illegal claim of ship-money hath reached my ears, even where the tongue of England would have sounded strangely. John Milton, if it concerns you any thing to hear of him, was, and that too for many months, my chosen comrade of the road, and my most eloquent tutor in the classic lore of Italy!"

"In Italy, saidst thou! In Italy, and with John Milton!" inquired Oliver, after a long meditative pause; and, as he continued, his voice had lost much of its harshness, and his manner not a little of its offensive peculiarity. "A better comrade couldst thou not have chosen than that pure-minded Christian—that most zealous patriot. Verily, I say to you," . . .

The result of this casual rencontre is, that Cromwell resolves to secure this brave young man to his party, and for this purpose to have him immediately returned as representative for his own native town of Huntingdon. On this subject he afterwards consults Milton, who, highly approving the design, yet counsels that Ardenne should be left unquestioned and unfettered, as the only conditions on which he was likely to accept of the invitation of the burghers of Huntingdon.

On their accidental meeting, there had been something in the hard-featured and ill-dressed, ungainly stranger which fascinated Ardenne, "forcing him, as it were, despite his senses, to admit that he was in some wise remarkable, above, and at the same time, apart from ordinary mortals, and not unlike to one who might be indeed the mover of great changes in the estate of nations."

But he cannot learn his name and rank from the landlord of the Fox, where Oliver bestows him for the night, holding on himself to his destination. This closes the opening chapter. And now we consult the tastes of that numerous class of readers, dear to our associations and sympathies, who care not much for history, and warmly relish a romance; and also do justice to our author by proving to every one's satisfaction that "Cromwell" is not all historical, nor yet political and "dry"—

Two days had elapsed, and the third was already drawing towards its close, since the encounter of the cavalier with his saintly ally; for the sun, scarce elevated thrice the breadth of his own disk above the horizon, was now almost perceptibly declining in the west, though he still darted long pencilled rays of light athwart the landscape, from between the folds of gauzelike mist which veiled his splendours from the eye.

One of the straggling beams had found its way into a nook, as sweet as ever poet sung, or fairy haunted. It was an angle in one of those broad green lanes, which form so beautiful a feature in the rural scenery of England. Carpeted with deep unfaded verdure, through which meandered a faint wheel-track; bordered by hedges so thick and tangled as to resemble natural coppices rather than artificial fences; embowered by the fragrant honeysuckle, and spangled with the dewy flowers of the yet sweeter eglantine,—that solitary nook might well have furnished forth a tiring-room for Shakespeare's wild Titania.

Nor, though the days of Puck and Oberon were already numbered with the things that had been, did that lone bower lack its presiding genius; for on a trunk, cushioned with hoary lichens, and overlooking a crystal basin, formed by the rill which undermined its tortuous roots, and had, perchance, in bygone ages, caused its decay and ruin, there sat a female form, loveliest of the lovely.

A beautiful white palfrey, with ribboned rein, and velvet housings, which stood unfettered at her side, awaiting, docile and gentle creature, the pleasure of his mistress, pawed, and tossed his head, till the silver bits rang audibly, and uttered once or twice a tremulous, impatient neigh, unheeded, at the least, if not unheard.

A vagrant spaniel of the Blenheim breed, with soft dark eyes, and ears that almost swept the ground—one from a number that had followed the fair girl, and now dozed listlessly upon the grass around her—had been for some time rustling among the dewy bushes, and now sent forth a shrill and clamorous yelping, as pheasant after pheasant whirled up on noisy wings into the higher branches, whence they crowded, with outstretched necks, defiance to their powerless assailant.

Still there was no sign in the demeanour of the lady to indicate that she had marked the sounds, harmonizing as they did with the spirit of the place and hour, and blending naturally with the low of the distant cattle, the cawing of the homeward rooks, and the continuous hum of the thousand insect tribes which were still disporting themselves in the September sunset, not the less merrily that their little glass of life had already run even to its latest sands.

But anon a noise arose, which, in itself by no means inharmonious, was not so much attuned to the rural melodies around, but that it jarred discordantly on the ear. It was the clear and powerful voice of a man, venting his feelings as he rode along—for at times the tramp of a horse might be distinguished, when his hoof struck upon harder soil than common, mingling with the measured tones, as perhaps unconscious of his occupation, the rider recited aloud such passages from the high poets of the day, as were suggested to his memory by all that met his senses.

As the words passed his lip, the horseman turned the last angle of the winding lane; and, for the first time discovering that the free outpourings of his spirit had found a listener, Edgar Ardenne—for the moralist was no other—paused in his sonnet and checked his steed, by a common impulse, and, as it seemed, a single movement. His eyes flashed joyfully, as they met the large and violet-coloured orbs which the fair girl had raised, at first in simple wonderment, but which now lightened with a gleamy radiance that he was not slow to construe into delighted recognition.

"Sibyl!—sweet Sibyl!"—

"Edgar, can it indeed be you!—welcome, oh, welcome home!"

We shall not tantalize the reader with this pretty scene. This accomplished pair are cousins, and—need this be told?—betrothed lovers. But as to what was said and done on this joyful occasion we leave that to the young reader's leisure and curiosity. It is enough "Ardenne was for the moment happy, absolutely, and, if aught mortal may be called perfect, perfectly happy."

And now we take leave of Woodleigh, the beautiful seat of Sir Henry Ardenne, in the fair county of Rutland, and its thrice-blessed inmates, and turn to another scene. It was near London, where, on a lovely and tranquil evening while the hunters' moon rode brightly through a cloudless firmament, well-nigh quenching the myriads of stars with her lustrous glory, that, rapt in the reflections which such a spectacle begets in a lofty and poetical mind, a man stood silently gazing on the night.

He was Milton; and thus our author informs the dead clay—

He stood awhile in silence, though his lips moved at intervals, perusing the bright wanderers of heaven with a gaze so fixed and yearning, as though his spirit would have looked into the very tabernacle and abode of the Omnipotent. At length he spoke articulately, in a voice deep, slow, majestic, and melodious, but in the unconscious tones of one who meditates or prays aloud, without reference or respect to aught external.

"Beautiful light!" he said, "beautiful lamp of heaven!—what marvel, that the blinded and benighted heathen should ignorantly worship thee? What marvel, that a thousand altars, in a thousand ages, should have sent up their fumes of adoration unto thee, the mooned Ashtaroth,—unto thee, the Ephesian Diana,—unto thee, the nightly visitant of the young-eyed Endymion? What marvel, that to those who knew not, neither had they heard of the One, Uncreate, Invisible, Eternal, thou shouldst have seemed meet Deity to whom to bend the knee,—thou first-born offspring of his first-created gift? thou blessed emanation from his own ethereal glory—what wonder, when I, his humble follower, his ardent, though unworthy worshipper,—when I, an honest though an erring Christian, do strive in vain to wean my heart from love of thee; indoctrinating so my spirit, that I may kiss the rod with which, I am assured too well, He soon will chasten me, in changing the fair light, that glorious essence in which my soul rejoiceth, for one black, everlasting, self-imparted midnight! Yea so it shall be. A few more revolutions of these puissant planets,—a few more mutations of the sweet-returning seasons—and to me there shall be no change again on earth for ever!—no choice between the fairest and the foulest!—no difference of night or day!—no charm in the rich gorgeousness of flowery summer, above the sere and mournful autumn!—no cheery aspect in the piled hearth of winter!—no sweet communion with the human eye compassionate!—no intercourse with the great intellects of old, dead, yet surviving still in their sublime and solid pages!"

He paused for a space, as though he were too deeply moved to trust his thoughts to language; but, after a moment, drawing his hand across his eyes—

"But if it be so," he continued, "as I may not doubt it will—if his fiat be pronounced against me, of dark corporeal blindness—what duty yet remains?—what, but to labour that the blindness be not mental also?—what, but to treasure up even now, during my brief-permitted time, such stores of hoarded wisdom, as may in part suffice, like to the summer-gathered riches of the industrious and thrifty bee, to nourish and to cheer me at the coming of my sunless season?—what, but to profit, even as best I may, by those good opportunities which his great mercy hath vouchsafed to me; to sow the seed even now, during the fertile autumn, that by his blessing it may swell and germinate during the brumal darkness of the approaching winter, and in his good time give forth to light a crop improved and gloriously surpassing that from which it sprung?—what, but to give thanks alway, and to praise the tender-heartedness and love of Him, to whom it were no harder task to plunge the mind in lunatic and senseless stupor, than to seal up the fount of light to the poor eye,—of Him who, giving all the thousand blessings I enjoy, judges it fitting to deprive me but of one, haply that, from its single loss, others may fructify, and bear good harvest to my use! Wherefore, oh! merciful and mighty one, be it unto me as thou wilt, and thou only! And oh! above all things be it unto me, as now, so alway, humbly to cry, and happily, 'Thy will be done!'"

Even as the pious scholar brought his meditations to a close, the footsteps of one advancing, though still unseen, through the mazes of the shrubbery, were heard upon the crisp and crackling gravel.

It was his grave-eyed servitor, Andrew, to announce Master Cromwell, Oliver St. John, and Hampden, who were ushered into "Master Milton's" library, which, among its other treasures, contained a "splendid organ;" while, on a table lay scattered a violin, a guitar, a couple of foils and wire-masks, some written music, and a heavy broadsword.

Each guest is minutely described. The conversation turns upon a new ally whom Cromwell sought, the Irish Rebellion, and the massacre of the Protestants, which, at that time, filled and horrified every mind in England. The "ally" sought is Edgar Ardenne, whom, as an enlightened patriot and lover of constitutional liberty, the aspect of public affairs is grieving and perplexing more and more, and rendering unhappy, even while basking in the smiles of his beautiful betrothed, and in the enjoyment of restoration to his paternal home. His father was a devoted, nay, a fanatical royalist; and his fair cousin shared in these ancestral prejudices and feelings; while Edgar's expanded intellect, and the strong convictions of every passing day, were, with the force of reason and truth, silently drawing him over to the national party, to the assertors of constitutional freedom; the party which his father, a fiery cavalier of the Peveril type, detested and despised.

While the younger Ardenne is secretly suffering under that peculiar position in which duty and affection point different ways, a grand stag-hunt takes place at Woodleigh, at which all the young royalists of the county attend, and which is painted in vivid tints, rendered the brighter from the contrast of a sentimental scene, in which Sibyl tenderly, and with womanly art, strives to learn the source of her lover's hidden dejection, and fondly seeks to share his grief. She conjures him to reveal his sorrows, to trust in her love. But they are called away to join the sportsmen; and it is soon found that Edgar had forsaken the gallant chase. He had left the field at the hottest, and, as was reported to his father, in company with a sour-looking knave with a cropped head, who had summoned him away.

"St George! and with a puritan!" cried one of the young Outrams, a hare-brained, light-hearted cavalier—"A rascally, starved roundhead!"

"He must be strangely altered then, I trow," muttered the aged huntsman—who, perhaps, had taught him when a boy to ride so well—"an he be gone home with a musty beggar; the hounds running breast-high too, over the tale of Bardsey!"

"Tush! tell me not; he is too true an Ardenne," cried his father almost angrily, "that he should e'er consort with base and brutal fanatics—Heaven's curse upon them!"

This puritan was the messenger who brought what proved Ardenne's passport into public life.

His entrance upon the political arena was critically timed—

All England was in confusion and dismay—and both these hourly increasing till the one half of the world was well nigh maddened by its fears, the other by the excitement of its own fierce and stormy passions. To-day a rumour was abroad of mighty armaments levied beyond the sea, and even now preparing to pollute with foreign weapons the free soil of England, and to erect the power of her monarch, already stretched beyond all limits of constitutional sway, into absolute and self-controlling tyranny. On the next, a tale was rife that Pym, the champion of the people's cause, and king of their affections, had been assailed, perhaps even murdered, by the hired emissaries of a sovereign, stern and cold by nature, and rendered merciless and cruel by the extremity of terror.

Then came the one great accusation, swallowing up in its atrocity all lesser charges, all inferior crimes, as the sunshine drinks up and blots from Heaven the fainter lustre of the stars! The one great accusation at that time generally credited by men of every class, except, perhaps, a few of the most confiding and most generous cavaliers, and since those days confirmed almost beyond the possibility of doubt,—that the Irish rebellion, with all its horrible features of midnight massacre, and mid-day conflagration, was the premeditated, coolly-calculated work of Charles and Henrietta;—the one great accusation, penetrating every breast, in every rank of persons, with mingled sentiments of pity, horror, hatred, and disgust; embittering still more against him the foes of the misguided sovereign, and alienating from his side many of those devoted and enthusiastic spirits, that never would have swerved from their allegiance, so long as they had sense or being, had he ever shown himself in the most trivial circumstances constant, not to his faithful servants, but to his own true interests, or even to himself.

The threatening aspect of affairs in Scotland, and the insensate attempts of the king to carry matters with the high hand of prerogative, had well-nigh proceeded to the last fatal extremity, when Ardenne was about to quit Woodleigh to take his seat in the House of Commons as the independent and untrammelled member for Cromwell's borough of Huntingdon. His father had finally become reconciled to Edgar representing that puritanical town, from the idea that he was to employ the power and influence which he had, unsolicited and unpledged, obtained from the Roundheads, to serve the king; and the doughty and frank cavalier mightily enjoyed the notion of "hoisting the knave engineers with their own petard." But the kind-hearted old knight was also deeply affected at witnessing the gloom and distress of his son, which he naturally imputed to leaving Sibyl; and he frankly proposed their speedy union, to which there was, as he apprehended, no obstacle whatever. He and his niece, he proposed, should follow Edgar to London as soon as a fit house had been provided for them; Sibyl would appear at the court of Henrietta Marie; and the marriage, which was to crown the happiness of the whole family, would immediately take place.

So much are people in these degenerate times accustomed to see young Tories marrying into Whig families, and even more frequently young Whigs marrying the daughters of Tories, that we confess modern observers may not be able to appreciate the mighty obstacles which the royalist predilections of Sibyl opposed to her union with her betrothed cousin, although he was a "gentleman of liberal opinions;" but in the age of Cromwell, either ladies were less tolerant, or lovers that "proposed" were more plentiful; and, at all events, this political and high-minded obstruction in the course of true love could not be dispensed with by the author, as the reader's interest in the hero and heroine—who is besides the only female character in this severe romance—hinges entirely upon these scruples, and the difficulty gives place to some of his finest scenes.

Edgar for a moment is strongly tempted to follow his father's counsel, and to wed without entering into explanation about his own opinions.

His strong frame quivered visibly with the excitement of his spirits, as he hurried from the hall to seek his beautiful betrothed—"Once mine, and all beside is nothing! Once mine, there will be no more struggle! Duty and pleasure will go hand in hand! Once wedded, and no difference of opinion then may put those asunder whom God has joined together!"

Such were the thoughts that thronged with irresistible impetuosity, and with the speed of light, upon his busy brain; but he had not made six steps beyond the threshold before reflection changed the prospect—"Would it be noble—honourable—upright," thus did he commune with himself—"would it be worthy of an Ardenne—the supporter of an unblotted fame of generations, nay, rather, would it not be sordid—base—dishonest and degrading to the lowliest gentleman, to win a credulous confiding woman by a fraud—by an implied, if not a spoken, lie! to let her wed, believing him she wedded a supporter of the cause she deemed most holy, a soldier armed for the warfare which alone she looked upon as just and sacred;—to let her wed in haste, and then find out at leisure that she had been deceived—deceived by whom—by him she had just sworn to honour? Not so!" he cried aloud—"It shall not be, by Heaven! She shall know all—everything! Knowing she shall accept my hand—or knowing cast me off, but not, at least, despise me!"

As his mind arrived at its mature though swift conclusion, he reached the door of Sibyl's oriel parlour—with a hesitating hand he struck the panel, and so slight was the sound that it conveyed no tidings to the inmate—at least it was unanswered. Again he knocked, and louder than before—he listened, and still all was silence. Supposing her he sought to have gone forth, he had already turned away to follow her, when a faint noise, as of a person breathing heavily, or perhaps gently weeping, attracted his attention; he knocked a third time, and then—though still unbidden, entered. She was within—she was alone! in the prostration—in the absolute abandonment of feminine and hopeless grief! Her face was buried in her hands, as she lay stretched at length on the broad pillowed settle which encircled the bay-window.

She gazed upon him for a second's space, wildly—distrustfully;—then, as she perceived his earnest air, and marked the hope that kindled in his smile, then brighter thoughts prevailed; and with the sudden strange revulsion, abandoning herself to the full tide of her warm passionate feelings, she sank half-fainting on the bosom of her lover.

"Oh, grant it, Father of all mercies! that this too mighty treasure shall indeed be mine!" he murmured fervently, as he supported her, and with considerate expressions of calm fondness recalled her gradually to her self-possession.

"Sibyl," he said at length, as her deeply-drawn sighs subsided, and her tears ceased to flow in such unnatural profusion—"dear cousin, soon—soon, I trust, to be addressed by a far dearer title, I have much—much that I would say to you before I go from hence, never unless at your permission to return!—much from my father—for myself yet more!—Dry your tears, dearest, dry them, I beseech you—it is agony to me to look on them!—Dry them and listen to me, that we may, if it be Heaven's pleasure, be happy as the happiest of earth's inhabitants!"

"Say on"—she difficultly faltered forth the words—"dear Edgar—with my whole soul I do attend you!"

"Not here," he answered, "sweet one—and not yet! But do your mantle on, and walk forth with me for a little space. You are too greatly agitated yet, calmly to hear, and freely to decide on that, which for your happiness—for your life's sake, you must consider warily and well! The pleasant sunshine, the fresh grateful air, and above all, the peaceful and quiescent scenery will tranquillize your mind; moreover, I would not that this sun should set unwatched by us twain together. You will go forth, then, dearest—will you not, Sibyl!"

A smile exquisitely sweet glancing from out her tears was her sole token of assent, as she disengaged herself half blushing from his supporting arms, and gathering her dishevelled tresses folded them simply, but in the most perfect taste, around her classically moulded temples.

Exquisite and dazzling is Sibyl's beauty when she reappears in her fur-bordered suit of velvet; and lovely is the scene through which the young pair wander to a solitary tarn in the mountains, where Sibyl was seated on a monumental stone, under the shadows of the Friar's Tree, while, stretched on the sparkling white sand at her feet, her lover Told her of his hopes, his doubts, his terrors—he told her how a cloud, he knew not wherefore, had overshadowed his horizon, chilling as it were the very sources of his most permanent and warm affections;—he told her how he valued her the most of all things earthly—the most of all things save his God, his country, and his honour! how to him her wedded love would be indeed the all-in-all—capable of making that which else were misery the highest and most pure enjoyment;—how, to win it, he would lay down willingly rank, name, fame, fortune, every thing save virtue! He told her, that without that crowning gift, he should, though wealthier than the wealthiest, bear but a beggared heart—though girt with myriads of friends, be desolate and lonely—though dwelling in his very birthplace, be a divorced and homesick exile! He told her of the violent and ceaseless strife between his passion and his conscience—of his profound devotion to herself, battling and scarcely to be overcome by his more deep devotion to his country's weal.

"It may be," he continued, "that I am but a timorous dreamer—but a trembling visionary, shaking at causeless and unreal terrors, that the trials, which I shudder merely at foreseeing, shall never come to the proof; but this is what I dread—and what, though dreading, I may not, if it come to pass, avoid or shrink from, even to win what were to me a thousand times more dear than life. The miseries of intestine war let loose to devastate our smiling country!—A wild and bloody strife, dividing brother against brother, sire against son, husband—sweet Sibyl—husband against wife! A strife between a king determined to be absolute—a people, to be free! If these things come to pass—though my life be barren, and my deathbed deserted—yea! though my heart be broken in the conflict—yet must I be for ever the sworn soldier of my country's freedom. It may, however, be—Heaven grant it so—that I do falsely calculate the signs of coming wrath;—it may moreover be that as I am, so are you a friend to liberty and justice, more than a worshipper of kings! and if so—all shall yet be well. My father, Sibyl, my old kind father, hath proffered freely his consent—hath urged me to obtain your promise, that you will be my own before this coming winter shall have made way for spring flowers—hath implored me 'that he may see us happy—such is his only wish this side eternity—before he go to his long home!'—Be mine, then, Sibyl—oh, be mine, ere the fierce storm shall burst, which may divide us, and for ever—be mine to cheer, to guide, to comfort, and to bless—be mine for weal and woe—for time and for eternity!"

While he had spoken, though her lips quivered often, and parted more than once as if she would have interrupted him—though her colour went and came in brief and fitful flashes—the lovely girl had never once withdrawn her eyes from his pale face, pale with the struggle of contending passions, nor yet relaxed her pressure of his cold damp hand; and as he paused from his deep-souled and eager pleading, she replied at once, though her voice faltered, and the big tears slid down her cheeks.

"It is, then," she said, "as I dreaded; and our y—" hopes have been but as a morning vision ! Oh ! Edgar, Edgar ! I have thought, I have hoped, I have prayed, that these things might not be ; and yet too—oh ! too surely have I known they must !” and she hurried onward with her speech, as if she feared that she should lack the strength to act up to her resolution. “Men will say,” she went on with increasing passion, “and say truly—but I care not—that it is unmanly in me to speak in words how madly, how devotedly, I love you ! My hope of hopes has been—you cannot doubt it, Edgar—no, no, you cannot—to know myself your wife ; and now my hopes are changed to anguish and despair. But, think not that I blame you—that I love you, honour you, adore you, one thousandth part the less, when I say—God grant me strength to bear it !—when I say, that we can never, never now be one.”

Sibyl makes a rather long but eloquent speech, thus concluding :—

Yours I can not be now—may not be ever !—but of this be certain ; wedded or single, royalist or republican, living or in death, you only shall I love, you only honour—honour and love more deeply, that I knew you greater in adherence to that which I must deem fancied and erroneous duty, than did you think as I. There is one hope for us, Edgar—my Edgar—one !—If this wild storm pass by—if the green homes of England be unstained with native blood—and how more fervently than ever shall I now pray they be so—then may we yet be happy !”

The blood rushed coldly to his heart as he heard her out.

“One kiss,” he murmured through his set teeth ; “one last kiss, my own lost Sibyl !” and she fell upon his bosom unresisting, and her white arms were twined about his neck with a convulsive clasp, and their cold lips mingled in a long embrace that had no taste of passion or of pleasure, and their tears flowed together in that gush of unchecked misery.

Before an hour had passed, Ardenne had left the mansion of his fathers. The old knight wondered, and was grieved, but silent ; he saw at an eye’s glance that his own hopes, his first-born’s happiness, had been dashed rudely down ; but to imagine wherefore, conjecture was itself at fault. He wept upon his neck, blessed him, and sent him forth ! A pale form, indistinctly seen through the fast-gathering twilight, stood in the oriel window as Edgar slowly mounted ; but the burst of agonizing sobs that followed his departure, was distinctly audible.—Enough !

The scene now changes to public life. We are made spectators and listeners in the most exciting parliamentary debates of those stirring times ; and their most illustrious chiefs pass before us, each in his true character, fulfilling his allotted part.

The appearance of the streets, and the aspect of the House of Commons, at this agitating period, are well described. One particular day witnessed the crisis of the popular party, and saw Ardenne enrolled among the patriots. It was the second day’s debate on the famous General Remonstrance ; and the House of Commons is placed before the reader with great dramatic effect at an hour when England’s most illustrious sons did their noblest. We shall only notice Cromwell and Falkland, overtaken and overheard by Ardenne as, wearied in body and in mind, he and the other members sought their homes :—

“Ha !” said Falkland, with a quiet smile not wholly free from irony—“Ha ! Master Cromwell, think you there hath been a debate to-day !”

“Another time,” replied the puritan,—“another time, and I will take thy word—but verily, I say to you—verily, as the Lord Jehovah liveth, had this Remonstrance rejected, then had I sold mine all of wordly substance on the morrow—ay ! and had taken up my staff, and girt me with my sword upon my thigh, and never had seen England any more !”

“Nor you alone, perchance !” answered the youthful noble, after a moment of reflection, “methinks, I have heard others named for a like resolution !”

“Perchance me no perchance !” cried Oliver, with a triumphant smile—“Had the malignants carried it, I tell you that their victory had robbed old England of her truest spirits !—But now, my lord, mark well my words !—and you too, friend—if that you be—as I do partly think you are—and if you be not, and I be in error, then may the Lord enlighten and amend you—a friend to liberty,—mark well my words !—There shall be no stint more, nor let, nor hindrance ! Papists and tyrants in this soon-to-be regenerated land shall no more hold dominion ! The name of Englishman, now scorned and scoffed at throughout Europe—you, Edgar Ardenne, you do know the truth of that which I aver—shall be as far and wide revered, as ever was the name of antique Roman !—for verily I tell ye—and I tell ye truth—that now the Lord’s good time hath come, when he shall choose him out a MAN !—I say not whom—nor were it meet that I, the vilest and most worthless of his instruments, should judge whom the Lord listeth to appoint—but verily I say a MAN, who shall bring mighty things to pass in Israel !”

A bill followed this bold measure, which was disturbed by the well-known insolent protest of the Bishops, who, turned out of parliament themselves, declared all acts null and void that were passed during their absence : exactly, we apprehend, as they might, though forewarned, do again in like circumstances. The House passed a vote for the committal of the prelates ; and the king’s fatal measure of attempting the arrest of the members whom he charged with treason, quickly brought matters to extremity. The House refused to give up the members to the king’s sergeant ; and a scene in the palace, on the evening of the day when the abortive attempt had been made, places the Queen, Charles, and their court, dramatically before us.

In the realm of fiction the romance-writer has absolute dominion ; though, when he enters the domain of pure history, he cannot, we apprehend, claim the same latitude of privilege, where records are precise and explicit. The author has not rigidly observed this rule in his graphic account of the king going in person to the House next day, followed by armed men, to arrest the members. He uses the license of the fictionist to heighten the effect of that remarkable transaction, and to depreciate the ill-advised monarch. Yet the scene is powerful and striking, though its simple historical truth scarce wanted the aggrandizement of fancy and art. Having received the memorable answer from the speaker, Lenthall, so familiar to all English readers—“I have, sir, neither eyes to see, nor tongue to speak in this place, but as the House is pleased to direct me, whose servant I am,”—the king, who had taken the speaker’s chair, is thus described :—

Stepping down from the chair, he walked, uncovered still, but at a quicker pace than that with which he entered, toward the lobby ; but now as he departed, his looks were not turned haughtily from side to side, but sadly bent upon the floor ; nor was his passage silent as before—for member after member started up as Charles went past him, with bent brow and clenched hand ; and groans both loud and deep saluted him.

As he came nigh the seat of Cromwell, the king raised his visage, haggard now and pale, as with an anxious curiosity to look upon the man before whose eye he felt himself to have recoiled; and, as he met it, Oliver sprang upon his feet, his long tuck rattling in the scabbard as he rose, and stamping on the floor with fury, shouted aloud, in tones not mild nor measured, the word "Privilege!" A dozen voices took it up, though not so loudly, nor with so marked defiance as the first daring speaker, and the whole House was in the wildest and most uncontrolled confusion.

Delightedly would the despotic prince, had he but dared it, at that moment have cried on!—have given the word, expected by his myrmidons, for massacre and havoc—have bid the swords, which were already thirsting in their scabbards, leap forth and drink their fill of that most noble blood of England. But thanks to Heaven, he dared not! There would have been no object worthy of the risk—no gain to justify the detestation he would have so heaped upon his head! He did not dare; and, therefore, smothering for the time his virulent and vengeful fury, he departed.

The story is not continuous, nor is any pains taken to connect its dis severed links. Months are passed over without notice; the queen has escaped to Holland, and civil war had fairly commenced. The royal standard had been raised at Nottingham, and Prince Rupert had taken command of the king's army; while the Earl of Essex was commanding the army of the parliament, in which Edgar Ardenne was now an able and trusted officer. Battle after battle succeeds, somewhat tediously, or, at least, without due relief, from the battle of Edgehill, through almost every field, down to the action of Naseby. In many of these really spirited scenes, Ardenne—who throughout sustains the part of a patriot-hero—comes into contact with Cromwell, whose remarkable capacity for military affairs, and still more extraordinary vigour and energy of character, are now bursting powerfully forth, and fast bearing their possessor to his true place. Cromwell, among his saintly soldiers, and in his strangely mingled nature in its higher and its grosser elements, is often vividly placed before the reader; and though the following extract be long, it is impossible to convey the author's idea of the Protector, at this stage of his upward progress, in less space. Ardenne, in making a reconnaissance before the battle of Edgehill, has outridden his party, and is surrounded by some of Cromwell's troops, who conduct him, at his request, to the headquarters of their commander.

"And tell me who commands yon horse brigade?"

"Stout Colonel Cromwell," answered the soldier more respectfully, "stout and courageous Colonel Cromwell! He will, I do believe, rejoice at this encounter. This way, good sir, yonder he sits on the black horse beside the standard, awaiting our return. Lo you, he sees us, and the files move onward!"

And he spoke truly, for as the cavalry perceived the videttes moving orderly and slowly back, they filed off, troop succeeding troop, toward the entrance of the lane, advancing on a gentle trot in regular and beautiful array. As they passed Ardenne, many a scrutinizing eye perused his figure and equipments, and in most instances a sanctified and solemn sneer disturbed the dark repose of their grave features, called up, as it would seem, by the rich dress and courtly air of the young officer, which in their wonted parlance were denounced as "fleshy lusts that war against the soul," devices of the evil one, fringes, phylacteries, and trappings of the beast.

Nor in the meanwhile did Edgar turn a heedless or inquisitive glance toward those with whom, discarding friends and kindred, birthright, and rank, and chivalrous association, as things of small avail compared to the great common weal, he had now cast his lot for ever. The first emotion of his mind was deep anxiety—the second wonder—and the third unqualified and unmixed admiration. Never he thought, in Germany, or France, never among the veteran legions of the Lion of the North, the Protestant Gustavus, had he beheld superior discipline, or men more soldier-like and promising. Mounted on strong black chargers, of full sixteen hands in height, their furniture of the most simple kind, but well-designed and in the best condition—their iron panoply, corselet and helm and taslets, stainless and brilliant—and above all, their bearing and demeanour—their seats upon their horses, firm yet easy—their muscular and well-developed limbs—their countenances full of resolution, and breathing all—despite the difference of individual character, and the various operations of the same affection on minds of different bias—a strange expression of religious sentiment—solemn in some, and stern, or even sullen—in others wild, fanatical, exalted, and triumphant—yet in all more or less apparent as evidently forming the great spring and motive of their action.

Still, though attentive in the first degree to the essential rules of military discipline, keeping an accurate and well-dressed front, and managing their heavy chargers with precision, there was not any of that deep respectful silence among these military saints which Edgar had been used to look for in the strictly-ordered service of the Netherlands, and to esteem a requisite of soldier-ship; but, on the contrary, as every troop rode past him, there was a constant hum, suppressed indeed and low, but still distinctly audible, of conversation; and he might mark the knotted brows and clenched hands of the vehement disputers, arguing, as it would seem from the decided gestures, and the texts which he occasionally caught lending an elevated savour to their homely language, and more than all from the continual appeal to the well-worn and greasy bibles which each of these stern controversialists bore at his girdle—on questions of religious discipline, or points of abstruse doctrine.

Although this mixture of the soldier and religionist, this undue, and, as it seemed to him, irreverend blending of things good and holy with the dreadful trade of blood, jarred painfully on his correct and feeling mind, he could not but acknowledge that this dark spirit of religious zeal, this confidence in their own overweening righteousness, this fixed unwavering belief that they were the elected and predestined instruments of the Most High—"to execute," as he could hear them cry aloud, "vengeance upon the heathen, and punishment upon the people!"—to bind their kings in chains, and their nobles in fetters of iron!" fitted them well for their mission.

Here was indeed a mighty and effective agent to oppose that chivalrous enthusiastic bravery, that loyal self-devoting valour, which inflamed the highborn army of the cavaliers to deeds of noble daring. Nor did he entertain a doubt, when he perceived the extraordinary person who commanded them occupied in preaching, or expounding rather the mysterious prophecies of the Old Testament to which especially the puritans inclined their ear—to an attentive knot of officers, grouped, some upon their horses, and yet more dismounted, around the regimental standard—but that he had some reason far more cogent than mere feelings of devotion for thus encouraging a spirit so unusual in the breasts of his stout followers.

The colonel—for to such rank had Cromwell recently been elevated, more even in consideration of the powerful and trusty regiment which he had levied from the freeholders and yeomanry of Huntingdon by his own personal and private influence, than of his services performed already, not either few or inconsiderable, keeping the cavaliers in check, surprising many of their leaders, anticipating all their meditated risings, and cutting off all convoys whether of money or munitions, throughout the counties of the Eastern association—the colonel, as he met the eye of Ardenne, was seated on his powerful black war-horse, bestriding him, as it would seem, with giant strength and perfect mastery of leg and hand, but with an air wholly unarmy and devoid of ease or grace—sheathed nearly cap-a-pie in armour of bright steel, heavy and exquisitely finished, but utterly without relief or ornament of any kind. A band or collar of plain linen, with a broad hem, fastened about his short herculean neck, varied alone the stern simplicity of his attire. No feather waved above his low and graceless casque—no shoulder-knot or scarf bedecked his weapon, which was girt about his middle, by a belt of buff three inches at least in width, and balanced on the right side by a formidable dudgeon and the brass-bound case of the familiar bible, which he now held extended in his left hand, while with the finger of his right he vehemently smote the open pages at each emphatic pause of his discourse.

Cromwell's features showed not now so sanguine or so kindled as when Ardenne last beheld them; but on the contrary there was a mild half-veiled expression about the heavy eye, and though the lines were strong and marked as ever, there was more of deliberate and quiet resolution than of imperiousness denoted by the firmness of his mouth. It was the countenance he thought of a calm visionary, pensive and meditative in his mood, and rather steady in the maintenance of his own fixed opinions, than zealous to prescribe or controvert the fancies or the rights of others.

But Edgar had little time for noting the expression, changed as he fancied it to be, of his superior, much less for marking the diverse features of the martial auditors, for, as he drew nigh to the spot whereon they stood, Cromwell had ended his discourse, and with a word or two of military precept was dismissing his attendants to their several stations.

"Ha! Master Ardenne!" exclaimed Oliver, his eye joyfully flashing as he recognised him—"Right glad am I to see you—not carnally, nor with a worldly-minded and selfish pleasure, but in that there will be work to do anon, in which the righteous cause shall need all the arms of its supporters! Have you a power at hand? Where be they—in what force!—Not travel-worn, I trust me!"

The troops are found in fine condition; and Ardenne is directed by Cromwell to proceed forthwith to join Essex.

"I shall be with him by nine of to-morrow's clock. Ha! heard you nothing?"

He broke off abruptly, as a deep distant sound rolled heavily upon the air, and, before Ardenne might reply, the sullen rumbling was again repeated, like the faint muttering of a rising thunderstorm or the premonitory growling of an earthquake.

"It was not thunder!" answered Edgar, but in the voice of one asserting, rather than questioning—"there are no clouds aloft, nor yet on the horizon!"

"Ordnance!" exclaimed the other—"Ordnance—and heavier too than ours!—Listen, now listen!"—And again the heavy rolling sound came surging down the wind, which freshened slightly from the westward—again it came, after a momentary pause, yet louder than before and more distinct, and then continued without interval the deep unquestionable voice of a hot cannonade.

"Away, sir—God go with you!" cried the stern puritan, excited now beyond the bounds of self-restraint; "Tarry not on the way, nor loiter! Gird up your loins, I say—Ride on!—ride on and conquer! Verily, but that it is the Lord's own doing, verily, Edgar Ardenne, I would have envied thee thy fortune. Ride on!—thou shalt be yet in time. Ride on—Amen! Selah!"

While he yet spoke, the officers and men, stirred up already by the near sound of battle, and almost maddened with excitement by the exulting and prophetic cries of Cromwell, were vying with each other, these to give forth, those to obey, and almost to anticipate, the needful orders—and as he uttered the last words at the full pitch of his piercing voice, the trumpets rang a thrilling flourish—the squadron, with a single shout, unbidden and unanimous, that spoke the burning feelings of the troopers, swept on at a hard trot, and in an instant not a sound was to be heard save the thick-beating clatter of the hoofs, mixed with the clang of spur and scabbard, and now and then a boom of the deep kettledrum timing the pace of the advance.

Some time after the battle of Edgehill, and while both armies were lying in winter quarters, Edgar stole away on a secret visit to Woodleigh; where, himself unseen, he beheld his father, clad in a military garb and armed, previous to joining the king at Oxford with his retainers, and engaged with an attorney, whom he commanded to make his will before he left home, disinheriting his rebel son, and leaving his whole estates to Sibyl. She passionately remonstrates against this injustice, and he exclaims:—

"No! plead to me no more—for never, never shall a traitor—a fanatic and hypocritical traitor—inherit aught from me, save the high name he hath disgraced. I have—and I bless heaven that I have it—through his own act of treason, the right to sunder this entail, and sundered shall it be ere sunset! He hath no corner of my heart—no jot of mine affections—himself he hath cut out his path, and—rue it as he may—by that path must he travel now unto the end—dishonoured—outcast—disinherited—accursed!"

"Oh, no! no, no!" she shrieked in frantic tones, drowning his utterance of a word so terrible, when coming from a parent's lips—"curse him not!—curse him not! or never shall you taste of peace again. Father, curse not your son—your first-born, and your only!—Sinner, curse not your fellow!—Christian, curse not a soul, whose hopes are thy hopes also!—curse not, but pray!—Pray—not for your erring child, but for your rash and sinful self! Pray, uncle, pray for penitence and pardon!"

Sir Henry will not be moved from his stern purpose; and Sibyl is true to her noble and generous nature. "I tell you," she exclaims,—

"I tell you, uncle, that I am no whit less strong—nay, ten times stronger than yourself—in faith, in loyalty, in conscience, in resolve! If I may not approve his actions—and, of a truth, I do not—I may not but revere his motives! and if those actions must half sever the strong links that join us, and render me, for very conscience' sake, a widowed maiden—his motives pure and sincere and fervent as an angel's faith, shall, at the least, forbid me to misjudge, much more to wrong him. Weakness! I tell you I adore him—adore him even more for this his constancy to what he deems the better cause, when every fibre of his heart is tugging him to the other—when loss of name and fame, and fortune must be the guerdon of his unflinching and severe devotion to a mistaken creed! Yet deeply, singly as I love him, never will I wed Edgar Ardenne while he unsheathes a rebel blade or prompts a rebel council. I tell you I adore him, yet will I die a maiden, unless—"

The father and son part in estrangement, yet is the scene delicately managed. When ordered from his father's house and presence, "to be gone for ever," Edgar stood as if transfixed, and Sibyl sunk into insensibility.

It was but for a minute that he stood, doubtful and unresolved—his pulse beat hurriedly, his sinews quivered, his lip paled with anguish—yet in one little minute was the paroxysm ended. "Bless you, my father, bless you!" he exclaimed, in piteous and heart-rending tones.

He turned, and ere a word could be pronounced, or a motion made to intercept him, vanished into the darkness of the hall. Then, and not till then, did the hot anger of the old man's heart relent.

"Edgar," he gasped, in faint and faltering tones,—
"my boy—my boy!"

But so low was the intonation of his voice, that it reached not the ears of him who would have welcomed those half-uttered words, even as a voice from heaven.

Sir Henry Ardenne joined the king at Oxford; and, the winter being spent in fruitless negotiations, the cavaliers, hitherto the victors, again took the field. Cirencester and Birmingham surrendered to the arms of Prince Rupert, and Hampden fell gloriously on the field of Chalgrove. Fairfax was beaten by the Earl of Newcastle on Atherton Moor, the latter pressing on to recover Gainsborough, when Colonel Cromwell and his Ironsides interposed to prevent his advance, though compelled, by the impetuosity of the royalists, to fall back upon Lincoln and Boston. This point of the story affords a favourable specimen of the author's powers of description.

It was a glorious morning in the latter part of June, when, at an hour so early that the heavy dews of summer were yet hanging unexhaled on wold and woodland, although the sun had lifted his broad disk above the clear horizon, the two armies came in view on Winsley field, near Horncastle. It was a gallant and a graceful spectacle as ever met the eye of man. The scene was a broad and waving tract of moorish meadow-land, checkered with many a patch of feathery coppice—birch, ash, and alder—tufts of furze full of its golden bloom, and waving fern; and here and there a bare gray rock peering above the soil, or a clear pool of water reflecting the white clouds that hung aloft, all motionless in the blue firmament—and over this romantic campaign a magnificent array of horse, four thousand, at the least, in numbers, contracting or extending their bright squadrons, now falling into column, and now deploying into line, as best they might among the obstacles of this their battle-ground—their polished armour, and their many-coloured scarfs, now flashing out superbly as the sunshine kissed their masses with its golden light, now sobered into mellow hues as some great cloud fitted across the sky, and cast its sweeping shadow over them—their trumpets ever and anon waking the echoes of the woodlands that surrounded them on every side, with their exulting notes, and their gay standards fluttering in the breeze—their gallant chargers, arching their necks against the curb, bounding and curvetting along as if they panted for the onset—while toward the eastern limits of the plain, upon a gentle elevation, flanked on the one side by the gully of a deep and stony brook, and on the other by a coppice, tangled with ancient thorns, and matted with wild rose-briers, which protected likewise the whole rear of his position, Cromwell had formed his line.

Nor, though inferior far in numbers, and lacking all that chivalrous and splendid decoration which their floating plumes and gorgeous dresses lent to the cavaliers, could the puritans' dark squadrons have been looked upon without attention, ay, and admiration also, by the most unromantic of observers. The admirable discipline and perfect armature of the stern zealots who composed the ranks—the plain, but soldierly and bright accoutrements—the horses superior even to the chargers of the royalists in blood and bone and beauty, and above all, in that precise and jealous grooming, without which, all the rest are little worth—the grim and stubborn countenances of the riders—some animated with a fiery zeal that would have smiled exultingly upon the stake of martyrdom, some lowering with a dark and sullen scowl, but all severe and resolute and dauntless! a single glance sufficed to tell that every battle-field to them must be a triumph or a grave!

Silent they stood and motionless—their long array drawn up, two deep, by squadrons at brief intervals—solemn and voiceless—presenting a strange contrast to the shifting movements and the intricate manœuvres of their approaching enemy. Not a man moved in his saddle, not a sound broke the quiet of their discipline, save now and then the stamp and neigh of an unruly charger, or the sharp clatter of his steel caparison. And now the cavaliers, within a short mile's distance, having already cleared the broken ground, might be seen halting on the further verge of the smooth space, which swept away toward them in a gentle slope, unmarred by bush or brake or obstacle of any kind to the career of the most timid rider; when, with some three or four of his most trusty captains, Cromwell advanced before his lines.

Of stout ungainly stature when dismounted, none showed to more advantage on his war-horse, and in full caparison of battle, than did the colonel of the Ironsides. It was not that his seat was graceful, or that he ruled his charger with the ease of the manège, but that he swayed him with an absolute dominion, which seemed to arise rather from his mere volition, than from the exercise of strength or skill. His whole soul seemed engrossed by the approaching conflict—careless of self—exalted, and enthusiastic. His eyes flashed with a brightness almost supernatural, from the dark shadow of his morion, and his whole visage wore an aspect so irradiate with energy and mind, that Edgar wondered how he ever could have deemed him ill-favoured or ungraceful. His horse, a superb black, bore him as if he too were conscious of divine authority; and such was the commanding greatness of his whole appearance, that no human eye could have descended to remark the plainness of his war array.

Of the small group of officers who rode beside the bridle of their leader, the most were ordinary-looking men, burghers of Huntingdon, or small esquires of the surrounding country, selected for the stations which they occupied by the wise politician who had levied them, on account of those morose and gloomy tenets which, with an early prescience, he discovered to be the only power that might cope with the high spirit of the gentlemen, who formed the bulk of their antagonists—men who affected, or imagined, visions and transports—who believed themselves predestined instruments, and deemed that in the slaying of malignants they were doing an especial service to the God whose chosen servants they asserted themselves, with a conviction of the truth which rendered them almost invincible.

Among these plain and heavy-looking soldiers towered the form of Ardenne, high-born and full of the intuitive and untaught grace of noble blood, gallantly armed, and handsomely attired. . . . At a quick trot they swept along the lines, inspecting their array, with now a word of commendation, and now a short reproof, to the dark fanatics who had been chosen lance-peesades or sergeants for their savage and enthusiastic humour. Just as they finished their career, a long and cheery shout, accompanied and blended with the clang of kettle-drums and the shrill flourish of their trumpets, burst from the columns of the cavaliers, now wheeling into line, and eager for the onset. No shout, nor burst of instruments replied from the parliamentarians, but their leader at the sound checking his charger from his speed till he reared bolt upright, threw forth his arm with a proud gesture of defiance.

"Brethren!" he called aloud in accents harsh, but clearly audible, and thrilling to the heart—"Brethren and fellow-soldiers in the Lord—the men of Belial are before you—the persecutors of the saints—the spillers of the innocent blood—godless and desperate—slayers of babes and sucklings—ravishers of maids and matrons—revilers of the prophets and the law—accursed of the Lord Jehovah! Wherefore, faint not, nor be of feeble heart, for surely, on this day, shall the Lord yield them up into your hands, that ye may work his vengeance on their heads, and execute his judgments. For said he not of old, 'Lo! I will tread them in my anger, and trample them in my fury!' and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in my heart, and the year of my redeemed is come.' So saith the Lord of Hosts. Amen! Amen! Selah!"

And with a deep and sullen hum, the puritans took up the words—"So saith the Lord of Hosts.—Amen! Amen! Selah!"

"And are not we," continued the fierce zealot, with increasing energy, "and are not we—blinded although we be, and ignorant and sinful—I ask ye, brethren, are not we the chosen of the Lord, and shall we not obey his bidding? Smite them then—smite the idolatrous besotted followers of the old antichrist, even as just Elijah slew the priests of Baal down at the brook of Kishon. Be strong, and fear ye not; for lo! the Lord hath said, 'Ye shall not suffer one of them to live!' and who are we, that we should now gainsay the bidding of the Lord, even the Lord of Hosts! Lift up your voices, then, that you malignants may perceive in whom we put our trust."

Again, and in a sterner and more heartfelt shout, the approbation of the puritans greeted their leader's ears; and, as he ceased, with brandished blades, and inflamed features, and with voices that drowned utterly the feeble music of the cavaliers, already confident of victory, and maddened with religious zeal, they thundered forth their favourite hymn.

In the action which follows these preliminaries, Cromwell appears equally great, calm, and self-possessed. In the course of the engagement, Ardenne had the good fortune to save the life of Cromwell, whom he rescued, when the fiery zealot was stoutly contending, single-handed, against six or seven cavaliers, hewing at him, all at once, with their broad swords, while he laid around him like a very incarnation of St. George. The field of Winsley was that day won; nor does any thing of interest, in the personal history of either of the heroes of the romance (Cromwell and Ardenne,) afterwards occur until the battle of Marston; previous to which, Cromwell harangues his troops in the same scriptural or canting style, as on former occasions. Those readers who enjoy battles, may satiate themselves amid these scenes. Cromwell, as heretofore, is the soul of the field.

At the close of the action, Ardenne saves the life of his father, and is himself made a prisoner by a party of royalists, who had come up to the rescue of Sir Henry Ardenne. The repose of Cromwell's soldiers after the victory of Marston Moor, and the night-watch are picturesquely traced; but it ushers in a scene of a more impressive or more ambitious character, in the description of the incipient workings of ambition in the disturbed mind of the victor. It is to be remembered that, if tradition tells truth, Cromwell, when a boy, saw the vision of a stately woman, who assured him he was to be the greatest man in England. He is here alone in his quarters:—

Upon a table close before the hearth, on which a dozen fast-decaying boards silently smouldered, stood with its wick tall and unsmuffed a solitary lamp, casting a feeble and uncertain light about the room, which served however to display a brace of horseman's heavy pistols, an open map, a telescope, a worn and greasy bible, and a leader's truncheon lying beside it on the board, as well as a confused assemblage of steel armour piled in a large armed chair and glancing with obscure reflections from the shadow of a distant corner.

It was, however, the inmate of the chamber that lent its chief attraction to the scene—a strong-built and stern-featured man, clad in a military suit of buff, such as was then worn under the corselet and thigh-pieces of the cavalry; his cumbersome jack-boots were still about his legs, garnished with spurs as when he left the saddle, though all his other armour had been doffed in consequence of recent wounds, as it would seem from many a speck and splash of dingy crimson on the leathern cassock, and from his left arm bound up by a silken sling.

It was the leader of the Ironsides.—There was a strange, almost a wild, expression on his grim features as he passed and repassed the light, and a glare in his deep-set eye, almost like that of the insane. He muttered at times in audible and articulate sounds, but mostly in a half-uttered inward key; striding the while with heavy but uneven steps, now fast, now slow, across the echoing floor. His hands were now crossed firmly on his breast, now tossed aloft as if they brandished the war-weapon, and now they gripped each other with so stern a pressure that it almost seemed as if the blood would start from beneath his nails. It might be that the fever of his wounds had terminated for the moment to his brain; it might be that a darker fit than common of his fanatic hypochondriasm had occupied his mind: but on this night the wise and crafty conqueror of Rupert resembled rather the mysterious energumenes, the possessed, fiend-tortured, maniac of holy writ, than the cool, self-controlling, scientific leader he had that day approved himself.

"King!—King!" at last he exclaimed audibly, pausing from his uneasy walk, with an expression of uncertainty and even terror distinctly marked in every feature. "Didst thou say King!—No! no! not King!—Avaunt, Beelzebub!—Get thee behind me, Sathanas!—It said not, 'King!' that solemn and tremendous shape, that drew the curtains of my boyish couch at the unhallowed hour of midnight!—The greatest one in England, but not King!—Ho! have I foiled thee there!—Ha ha!—well art thou called the prince of liars—get thee behind me! tempt me no more! away foul slave! By the Lord's help I spit at and defy thee!"

He took two or three turns across the room more quickly than before, and again pausing cried, "A trick of fantasy!—who saith it was unreal—have we not ears to hear, and eyes to see; and shall we not believe what we do hear and see!—Did not a spirit pass before the face of Job, that the hair of his flesh stood up!—Stood it not still, yet he could not discern the form thereof!—Was there not silence, and he heard a voice!—And came it not to pass so likewise unto me, and much more also!—Again: Did not the evil-minded Saul call up, through her at Endor, the living spirit of the departed prophet, that it did prophesy to him!—And yet again: Did not the Roman Brutus, idolater although he was and heathen, hold converse with the shadow of his kingly victim, that was his evil genius at Philippi!—And may not I—I, that was written down before the world began—I, that have been predestinate of old to execute the wrath of the Most Highest, and press the wine-press of his vengeance—may not I too commune with disembodied ministers that walk in the night season! Go to! go to! I heard its mighty accents as I started from my slumber, and they yet tingle in my fleshly ears—Arouse thee, thou that shalt be first in England!—But not—it said not—King!"

There is more of this wild scene, before the captain of the watch enters to speak with General Cromwell, and to announce a damsel—"a damsel decked with comeliness, with the loveliness of the flesh"—who solicited a private interview with the commander.

"Tush! tell not me of comeliness!" cried Oliver very sharply. "Of God's truth, Abaziah Kingsland, thou art a fool, thus to disturb my meditations for a most frail and painted potsherd—a Dalilah, I warrant me—a Reechab, yea, and a painted Jexabel,—a harlot from the camp of the Egyptians—cast her forth straightway!—leave me, I say—begone!"

"It is not so!" replied the other sturdily—"It is not so, an you will hear me out!—It is a maiden of repute—she rode up to our outpost on the western road with three stout serving-men, seeking the captain of the night, and verily when I was brought to her she claimed to speak with General Cromwell, touching the young man Edgar Ardenne—"

"Admit her, and that too without tarrying. And bid them fetch in fuel—for lo! the fire hath burnt low while I did watch and pray, and the night air is chill, though it be summer—and lights and wine, I say, and creature comforts, such as may fit the tender and the delicate of women!"

The words were yet upon the lips of Cromwell when a tall female figure, marked by that indescribable, yet not to be mistaken air of grace which is seen rarely but in persons conscious of the possession of high station and pre-eminent endowments, was ushered into the dim-lighted chamber. The coarse dark-coloured riding-cloak, wrapped closely round her form, could not entirely conceal the elegant proportions, which it was evidently intended to disguise; and still less could the wide-leaved hat of country straw, tied closely down upon the cheeks by a silk kerchief, mask the aristocratic mould of the fair features, or hide the rich luxuriance of the light-brown hair, which hung uncured and damp with the night-dews far down upon her shoulders.

The reader need not be told that this maiden is Sibyl, who has broken through all the ordinary restraints of maidenhood, to come hither to beg the general to rescue Ardenne; whom the cavaliers had doomed to death, at day-break, as a traitor and rebel. After a protracted scene, the eloquence of Sibyl, or the strength of native tenderness and generous feeling in Cromwell's heart, prevails; and, entirely subdued by the nobility of her spirit, he muttered, while his eye softened, and the muscles of his mouth worked:—

"Noble heart! well hath the prophet spoken 'a virtuous woman is beyond the price of rubies!'"

Then, raising his voice, he said distinctly and aloud—
"Before the Lord, my Judge and my Redeemer, and by my hopes of grace, I promise thee it shall be done as thou wouldst have it. How many, and where lie they!"

"Three hundred horse—in the small town of Wetherby-on-Wharfe."

"Sound trumpets—boot and saddle; mine own first Ironsides to horse; let them all carry petronels. Despatch! despatch! Saddle me Thunder for the field—I will myself to horse! Find me three trusty guides that know each yard of country for ten miles around! For life! for life! no tarrying!"

Sibyl gives the most minute directions for the conduct of the enterprise, and thus they part:—

"Nay, thou art right in all things," Cromwell answered; "and as thou wilt it shall be. Kingland, conduct the maiden in all honour to her own attendants. Lady," he added, taking her by the hand with a benevolent expression lighting his gloomy features, "lady, thou art a goodly and a glorious creature; and this night hast thou done a deed worthy the noblest of earth's daughters. A soldier's blessing, although he be not of thy faith, nor of thy faction, cannot disgrace or harm thee. The God of Israel bless thee then, and guide thy feet aright, and give thee peace and happiness and understanding. Farewell, and doubt not that I will deal with thee righteously; for if I fail thee, to transgress my promise, may He whom I profess to serve—with frailty, it is true, and fainting, yet with sincere heart-zeal—do unto me so likewise at mine utmost need, and much more also!"

He let fall her hand as suddenly as he had taken it, and, as if half ashamed of the emotion he had shown, abruptly turned away, and scanned the map which lay upon the table with intense scrutiny; while Sibyl, wondering at the singular emotion and unexpected conduct of the hated independent, silently left the house to hurry homeward, with an easier heart than she had carried to the quarters of the puritans.

Before a half-hour had elapsed, five hundred chosen horsemen were under arms and in the saddle—the very flower of Cromwell's finest cavalry—and he himself, despite his wounds, his arm yet hanging in a sling, mounted, and at their head.

Ardenne, now, for the first time, began to suspect the ultimate objects of his commander, and to express dislike of the means he scrupled not to employ to gain his ends: for Ardenne is the single-minded, high-souled patriot of romance; Cromwell the bold, but ambitious, subtle schemer and dissembler of true history.

Cromwell could join in the rude and boisterous mirth of his Ironsides, as well as lead their devotions, and, by his spiritual exhortations, inflame their zeal and kindle their enthusiasm. A scene of this sort is cleverly described: It takes place on the eve of the battle of Naseby, when Oliver, who fared as hardly as the soldiers, contrives to make over the creature-comforts—the delicate supper and rich wines preparing for his principal officers—to his pious soldiers, who lustily consume the viands; while Ireton, Rossiter, and Desborough are hastily summoned to a council of war, to facilitate the carouse.

Next day witnessed Cromwell's great battle of Naseby, in which Sir Henry Ardenne receives his death-wound. This misfortune is tenderly announced to Ardenne by the victorious Cromwell, who had caused the mortally wounded cavalier to be carefully attended in the house of the Episcopalian priest; and Ardenne flew to that sweet retired vicarage, and to his dying father. Sir Henry had now seen the folly of his obstinate devotion to Charles, and the error of his intolerance in commanding the obedience of his son, where conscience issued her higher mandate. He reproached himself as the destroyer of the happiness of Ardenne; and as the murderer of Sibyl, "wasting away," he said, "before her time; sinking by inches into the cold, dark grave, blessing her slayer as she drops!"

Father and son, alike the victims of the unnatural and wicked contest provoked by the king, exchange forgiveness; and thus the dying cavalier judges his prince:—

"Edgar, when I am gone, say to my poor, poor Sibyl, that on my happy deathbed my sole regret was that I could not join her hand with yours for ever. She will be yours now—now, that this miserable war is ended—for it is ended, Edgar, and I regret its termination less, that I have lately seen much in Charles Stuart—in the King—that I had disbelieved, or shut my eyes upon, before—a good man, but—it will out—a bad king. . . . Weak, obstinate, and prejudiced he is, beyond all doubt, proud and uxorious. I know that he stands pledged in private to his queen, never to give peace to his people unless by her consent. And all this done against the counsels and without the knowledge of those men who have a right to counsel him—ay! and to know his measures—since for him they have risked their all!—done in deep malice to his enemies—in deeper guile to whom he calls his friends!—Out! out, I say, upon such kingcraft!—But enough of this."

This tale is not very skillfully woven. A period of full two years passes with no event of any kind, until the surrender of the king brings Cromwell again prominently forward, and increases the doubts and suspicions of Ardenne, who saw little to choose between the aggressions on constitutional freedom,—to which Charles was urged by the counsels of his queen,—and a fierce fanatical military government, which must be utterly subversive of liberty, civil and religious.

Still, such were the rare talents of Cromwell, such his inexplicable influence over the minds of all whom he encountered, that while Sir Edgar doubted, he was compelled to grant that he had no cause for doubt, which he could make clear to himself, much less to others. At times he fancied his religious ecstasies mere hypocritical jargon, adopted so to mystify all eyes, and veil his deep ambition;—at others—and that too most soberly and often—he believed him a wild self-deceiving hypochondriac, an erring though sincere enthusiast.

Hitherto all that Oliver had done, had doubtless been of service to the cause of veritable freedom; and it was certain that his present opposition to the Presbyterians might prove quite as unselfish—quite as beneficial to the commonwealth, as his preceding opposition to the king. Still it was too apparent to escape the foresight of a politician so clear-headed and far-reaching as Sir Edgar, that if the military faction should gain firm foothold in the state, Cromwell would not lack either talent, opportunity, or power, to mount even to the topmost summit of ambition if he should feel the inclination to attempt it. And who, when all things most magnificently tempting shall lie prone, subject to his mere will, yea!—courting him to grasp them—when to dare almost seems a virtue—to refrain a despicable weakness—who can, in such a situation, answer for another—who even for himself!

Revolving such thoughts in his mind, and eager to unbosom himself to some true friend, Sir Edgar took his way, as has been said, the second evening after the occupation of the city by the troops, toward the dwelling of John Milton. The controversialist had changed his domicile during this troubled period, and now occupied a smaller house in Holborn, opening backward upon Lincoln's Inn.

The dwelling, the lovely evening, the appearance and occupations of the poet, are carefully described. He is reciting a few lines of Il Penseroso, and is in the act of improvising that exquisite poem. The conversation turns upon public affairs and the character of Cromwell, the main object of Ardenne's visit. Each discourses wisely and eloquently; and Milton finally expresses—

Wonder—that you should doubt, or anywise distrust, the purest and sincerest patriot—the most upright judge—the stoutest man of war—the truest and most painstaking Christian, that the Lord hath raised up, since the old days of Israel's glory, to vindicate the liberties, and wipe away the sorrows of an oppressed and groaning people.

Ardenne is, in turn, surprised to find that Cromwell was, at this moment, meditating, on certain conditions, the restoration of Charles to the throne; which Milton disapproved, having much less confidence in the king. Milton then indulges in a strain of eloquent Utopian rhapsody, enthusiastically painting the elevation of a people “freed from the soul-galling yoke of monarchy, and the spirit-killing sway of prelatists;” in which he employs the swelling language which has come down to us in some of his prose works; while Ardenne exclaims, “Dreams, dreams, beautiful dreams, but baseless!” and points to the fall, one by one, of all the great republics of antiquity. Milton might, we think, have found an answer; but the subject is waved, and the discourse turns to poetry.

A very pleasing scene introduces us to Charles, a prisoner, if nominally free, caressing and counselling his children in Hampton Court. Here he is sought by Cromwell, who, at a long interview, imagines he has induced the king to agree to those terms which, together with the prerogatives of the crown, secured the liberties of the people. The king makes many specious and hollow promises, and tempts the ambition of Cromwell with the offer of an earldom, which the latter in his own mind contemptuously spurns. At the close of this interview, which is pure fiction, the king and Cromwell are thus placed in contrast; the latter pleading duty as an excuse to hasten his departure:—

“Duty, sir, needs no license,” Charles replied, smiling most graciously, and rising from his seat and even taking three steps towards the door, as the blunt soldier moved to leave the presence; “and till we meet at Westminster, rest in the full assurance of possessing your liege sovereign's gratitude and favour.—“Ha!” he continued, as the door closed and he found himself alone—“Deep as he is, I have out-generated him.—Now he suspects not any thing—Ha! ha! the garter and the Earl of Essex—a precious clown in faith to grace an earldom!—But now or Lauderdale and Hollis!—the dull fools—we will outwit them all, and yet reign, as our father did before, a king in something more than name.”

But the enthusiast strode forth, the tessellated floor of the proud gallery ringing beneath his massive stride, exulting and triumphant; and as he passed the vestibule, where there was no one to mark his actions, he clasped both his hands above his head, and cried out in a voice husky and stifled with emotion, “My country—oh, my country!—have I then—have I won for thee, peace, happiness, and freedom!”

A good roistering scene, a travesty of a real incident, follows, in which Cromwell, Ireton, and Ardenne intercept those secret despatches of the king to Henrietta, which display his double treachery.

When the letter, obtained by boldness and finesse, is read by Cromwell—the letter, be it remarked, which is almost wholly fictitious—

“Whose dogs are we!” he cried in fierce and ringing tones, “that we should be thus scandalously dealt with! As the Lord liveth, he shall die the death!”

“But three days since,” said Cromwell—“hypocrite that he is! base knave, and liar!—he proclaimed, through me, his full acceptance of the army's terms—his last words were, ‘and for myself henceforth I hold me bound by them!’ And I, fool that I was, I did rejoice and triumph in my heart, that England should have peace!—And now—he will hang both of us! ay, HANG!—Can there be any trust in such a man!”

“None!” answered Edgar, mournfully—“There can indeed be none!—It is long since I have even dreamed there could! He is unstable as the sands of the sea-shore, and false—as fortune!”

“Alas!—alas! for England!” Oliver exclaimed, in deep, impressive tones—“If it be thy will, Mighty Lord, that this thy servant be a prey and victim to this man of Belial, truly I am prepared. But for this godly and regenerate land, for this oppressed and miserable people, in whose behalf, already many times, thou hast displayed the wonders of thy might—the miracles of thine invincible right hand—not for myself—not for myself, O Lord, poor sinner that I am, and leaky vessel, do I presume now to remonstrate—to strive earnestly—to wrestle, as did Jacob in the dark, against thy great decrees—but for this lovely isle—this precious England!”

“With Caiaphas—I say!” returned the fiery Ireton—“With Caiaphas! Jew though he was, unrighteous judge, and murderer of the Lord's Anointed! ‘Ye know not’—’tis to you I say it, my friends and fellow-soldiers—nor consider that it is expedient for us, that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not!’”

The time wore on: the king's escape was the signal for the renewal of war; and, in the meanwhile, in many subsidiary scenes, the character and career of Cromwell, on whom the whole interest of the tale gradually gathers, is traced and developed, along with the history of public affairs, until Cromwell returns, in triumph, from Scotland, and the death of the king is resolved on by the military leaders. This is done in defiance of the remonstrances of Ardenne, who urged that Charles should, even in good policy, be spared; but for ever banished from the land he had betrayed and embroiled.

The writer has put forth all his powers in the solemn scene of the trial; in which no historical circumstance is omitted that can heighten the effect,—not even the frantic interruptions of Cromwell's daughter, Lady Fairfax; and his own half-mad conduct, which, at the close of the trial, left Ardenne in perplexed wonderment. Ardenne went next day to remonstrate against the execution of the king; and boldly to warn Cromwell against the consequences of his own guilty ambition. Cromwell is immovable. He makes a characteristic reply, full of the worst of the falsehood and hypocrisy which blackened his nature.

The execution of the king, and many private scenes, displaying the fierce strife of passions in the bosom of Cromwell pass, ere Ardenne is summoned to Woodleigh to witness the last hours of Sibyl, another victim of those national troubles caused by the lawless encroachments of Charles on the constitution of the country. On her deathbed, Sibyl, like her uncle the father of Ardenne, shamed not to confess and lament that error of judgment—that fantastical attachment to the royal cause and the fortunes of the king—which had robbed her lover of all chance of happiness on earth, and herself of life; while Ardenne, “half repentant, as has been shown already, of the part which he had played, and morbidly dissatisfied with the result of the experiment, sat groaning in spirit by her pillow, and confessed in very hopelessness of heart that he had cast away his all for a mere vision—for a most vain and senseless fancy.”

Such are the fruits of civil strife; of wars, whether for princes or partisans! Sibyl died; and Ardenne, without one tie in his native country, which he feared was as far from rational freedom as at the commencement of the struggle, and much farther from the calm of established peace, left England untempted by the splendid offers of Cromwell, who, possessed of every thing save true friends, anxiously desired to attach so able a counsellor, so brave a soldier, and so honest a man, to his rising fortunes. He offers Ardenne the hand of his youngest daughter, and to place him next in power to himself, now already Lord-lieutenant of Ireland and Generalissimo of the army; and here the hero of poetic fancy again soars above the mere mortal hero of human clay and mortal story. And now Cromwell's onward career, his deep dissimulation, and those struggles and misgivings of conscience which, however, never offered any obstacle to his ambitious designs, occupy the whole page; and we only incidentally hear of Ardenne from his correspondence with Milton. The poet is now blind, but exulting in the elevation of Cromwell, and disclaiming his former admiration of democracy. Milton concludes by entreating his friend Ardenne, who, like Blake, had been supporting the glory of England on the seas, to return home; his country had need of him; and, five years later, Ardenne did return, to confess his error in having distrusted the Lord Protector, and to bear testimony to all that he had achieved for England; to watch by his dying pillow, and witness the last fearful struggle of the frenzied mind, to which every great event of life was present in maddening hurry; and to pronounce his eulogium: thus the curtain falls.

Our readers will perceive that this is no everyday romance. Its greatest fault as a work of fiction is, as we have noticed, want of relief. There is too much “Cromwell,” too many regular battlefields, and too little of ordinary English life, in times when the current of life ran freshly and vigorously. But it combines, with a grand scheme of action, many beauties and felicities of execution; and will, we make no doubt, be received at the high value which the editor has set upon it, as “an interesting, manly, and vigorous production.”

LITERARY REGISTER.

The Works of Daniel De Foe; with a Memoir of his Life and Writings. By William Hazlitt. Vol. I. London: Clements.

It is a long while since a work having so many claims as this on the English reading world, in all its sections, has appeared; and, we may add, or one having so many attractions. There is perhaps, after the Bible, no book in the world so generally read, because so generally admired, as Robinson Crusoe; and yet very little, indeed, is known of the personalities of the author of that universal favourite, though he was one of the most conspicuous persons of his age; and comparatively little of works, nothing, if at all, inferior in literary merit, to the Adventures of Crusoe. De Foe was, for nearly fifty years, one of the most fertile writers of any time; and it is worthy of notice, that he had been, for more than thirty years, a constant writer of political pamphlets, and periodical papers of a political character, before he composed any one of his enduring works—his rare fictions. They were poured out with rapidity from a mind long-matured, and rich in the experience of actual life in all its aspects.

The Memoir of De Foe, on which Mr. Hazlitt appears to have bestowed the utmost care, and which he has written in a candid, affectionate, and even reverential spirit, we consider no unimportant portion of a volume which contains, with lesser pieces, the “Life of Colonel Jack;” “Moll Flanders;” the “Memoirs of a Cavalier;” “Roxana, or the Fortunate Mistress;” and the “New Voyage round the World;” in short, many volumes in one: while the original Memoir alone, and list of De Foe's writings, would make a good-sized volume. In these works may be found the true fountain-head of what has now swelled into a mighty and majestic stream:

in the fictions, and the periodical writings of De Foe, are found the germ of the national English novel, and of periodical literature. De Foe is as much the predecessor of Richardson and Fielding, as these writers are, in turn, the prototypes of Bulwer and Marryat, and of whatever is most eminent in fictitious narrative.

The personal history of De Foe, though unfortunately not told by himself, who, in simple narration, has never yet been equalled, is not, as we have said, the least interesting portion of the bulky volume. Besides being a man of fine original genius, and of competent learning, De Foe was one of the busiest men of his time—a universal schemer, continually occupied with one project or another; and all were meant for the public advantage. He was often employed in public affairs, by the ministers of the day, as an unaccredited agent; and even in matters of such delicacy and moment as the Union of England and Scotland—of which he wrote a history. His zeal as a Presbyterian Dissenter—upon all occasions ready with his pen in support of the Dissenters—might have been among his recommendations to this office. With a great deal of public virtue and purity, as times went, the pen of De Foe was often employed in support of the different governments of the day; and if sturdy and stanch on the topic of religious dissent, even to martyrdom, he was sufficiently moderate on many other points; frankly pleading the gratitude to which he was personally bound by the kindness of Godolphin and Harley, who, when he was in prison, in consequence of his memorable prosecution during their administration, sent him money to pay his fine, and to supply the wants of his family.

There have, however, been few public writers connected with, and dependent on men in place, more pure than De Foe; but as ministerial patronage will always be liable to suspicion, so is it to be regretted that any of the number should ever require to accept of either pecuniary, or any other favours, from men in power. De Foe, while courted and paid by Queen Anne's Tory ministers, often complains of the neglect and want of support which he experienced at the hands of the Dissenters, for whose cause he had suffered so much. To posterity it must appear that there were faults upon both sides.

De Foe gave great offence to many of the leading Dissenters in the corporations, by his denunciations of what is termed occasional conformity; that is, Dissenters, when in office, going to church in their official character and costume, just as they do at present: for they are not yet allowed, we imagine, to repair, in that fashion, to their own places of worship, though there may be no statute against it. Hazlitt (we mean the father of the editor of the works of De Foe,) himself born a Dissenter, and alive to their weaknesses, remarks on the subject of De Foe, who was often furiously attacked by his own body of religionists: "Nothing could be clearer than that, if it was a point of conscience with those persons not to conform to the service of the Established Church, their being chosen Mayor, Sheriff, or Aldermen, did not give them a dispensation. But many of the demure and purse-proud citizens of London resented their not being supposed at liberty to appear at church in their gold-chains and robes of office, though contrary to their usual principles of non-conformity, as children think they have a right to visit fine places, in their new clothes, on holidays." This argument against occasional conformity remains of equal force as in the days of De Foe, and involves Dissenters in not a little inconsistency. We know of no Dissenter in office who has behaved so well, or, at all events, so consistently, as that Provost of Paisley who boldly went to his own meeting-house in his robes of office: and while church-going continues a part of official duty, we cannot see how consistent Dissenters can adopt any other course, unless they relax in their principles. And, indeed, the mode of worship which, officially attended for a series of years, is considered harmless in the forenoons of Sunday, cannot be very injurious in the afternoons. It is not easy to understand the principle of the compromise to which De Foe and Hazlitt objected.

How much more of the voluminous writings of De Foe are to be comprehended in this edition of his voluminous works, we are not informed; but, independently of his numerous pamphlets, enough remains for another volume of equal dimensions, and equal value, with the one already published; and we hope soon to welcome it. The present one gives us a portrait of De Foe, looking like a lord, in one of those magnificent, flowing periwigs, which we meet so often in his tales, and hear of costing sixty guineas, when sixty guineas were of far greater value than at present.

Letters Illustrative of the Reign of William III.

3 vols. 8vo. London: Colburn.

This original correspondence, extending from 1696 to 1708, was addressed by James Vernon, Esq., private secretary to the Duke of Shrewsbury and afterwards a secretary of state, to his patron the duke, after his grace had retired from office. It is now first published from the original letters—about the authenticity of which there can be no doubt, wherever they may have been lying—and is edited by G. P. R. James, Esq., the well-known romance writer. To the student of English history (and this is a rather numerous class) the entire work will have interest; but the reading public in general might have been contented that Mr. James had exercised his judgment and discretion in suppressing and selecting. Much of a correspondence, going on from day to day, in which the private secretary performed the part of a daily or weekly newspaper, was of no great interest at the time, and is now of none whatever. Besides, the writer is heavy and cautious, and was not in any cordial intimacy with his aristocratic colleagues when, by the chances of an intrigue, he was pitched into office, to keep out a man obnoxious to the king.—Altogether, Vernon was a man of routine—a respectable clerk. Yet, it was impossible to form a record of passing events, during a critical period, and for a whole dozen years, without saying something that must interest posterity—and without displaying a good deal of the arcana of the government, particularly in the intrigues and hatreds of courtiers and ministers; the arts of spies or "intelligencers," as they were then called; the scheming of conspirators, and the secret agency of females. Small traits of character and manners are also naturally introduced, generally proving that "human nature is much the same at all times."—The Jacobite conspiracies, and alleged attempts to assassinate the king, and the excessive pains taken by the government to detect and punish the authors of these plots, occupy a great deal of the correspondence. The case of Sir William Fenwick alone fills more than half a volume. Mr. Vernon was particularly zealous and active in unravelling plots, and yet he was not himself credulous.

Those of our readers who may imagine that the ballot was never heard of until the days of Jeremy Bentham, or perhaps the Examiner, will be surprised to learn that an attempt was made about 140 years since to have the Speaker of the House of Commons chosen by ballot; at the time that it was carried, that election committees should be chosen by ballot. Mr. Vernon describes the measure as, "The ballot introduced upon questions relative to elections." Balloting for the speaker was at once resisted; but Mr. Vernon fears the principle (of ballot) "may hereafter be carried farther;" and "how convenient that will be to a Court and a Monarchy, time will show." The house was then as much in the dark about how balloting was to be performed, as when Mr. Grote exhibited the box which so many worthy Whig and Tory conservatives fancy as dangerous as that of Pandora; and against which Mr. Wordsworth, considering said box an atrocious novelty, has penned a sonnet. The venerable novelty against which Mr. Vernon adduces those undeniable reasons, which many feel and none avow, is thus described by Mr. Vernon in February 1707, after mentioning "a small duty laid on Irish yarn, that English spinners may get a living."

Mr. Benson reported to-day the manner of balloting, which was received with laughter, but yet was agreed to. It consisted of several articles: first, that a balloting-box and balls should be provided; that it be carried by the two clerks, one having the box, the other the balls; that the speaker appoint two members to attend the box; and that the member voting take the ball in his bare hand, and holding it up between his finger and thumb, before he put it into the box; that the members keep their places till the box be brought back to the table, and the balls there told over.

All this is nothing; but we are edified by the "All hail hereafter!" "the inconvenience to a Court and a Monarchy," i. e. to the influence of the crown, which honest voting might occasion.

Memoirs and Remains of the Rev. John Griffin of Portsea. By his Sons. 1 vol. 8vo, with Portrait. Pp. 531.

The subject of this memoir was a celebrated and highly esteemed minister of the Independent or Congregational denomination, well known for his writings, and distinguished for the active and zealous discharge of his functions, and of every relative and social duty. The story of his equable and useful life, which is told by his sons with propriety and modesty, affords nothing startling or wonderful; but much that is instructive, especially to individuals of his profession. He was of humble but respectable parentage; and was early left the son of a widowed and pious mother, "whose tears were more than he could bear." He felt those common stirrings of youthful ambition, which, in a youth of pious disposition situated as he was, naturally took the direction of the pulpit, for which he made some wholly unassisted efforts to prepare himself by studying the Latin grammar. His training as a preacher was under the Rev. Cornelius Winter at Painswick; and the expenses of his education, and those of a few fellow-students, were defrayed by the truly good John Thornton. His first labours as an itinerant preacher were in South Wales, and in different places of central or southern England. They were attended with the success which his zeal and fervent piety almost insured; nor is it unworthy of remark, though we do not pretend to account for the fact, that the majority of the early converts of the young and earnest preacher were young women. But he had more eminent converts. Among them was Captain Wilson, the commander of the first missionary expedition to the South Seas, whose memoirs Mr. Griffin afterwards wrote; and who, when they were first accidentally thrown together, entertained sceptical if not deistical opinions. Mr. Griffin was settled in the Independent Church at Portsea, early in life, and immediately married the object of a long and prudent attachment. He passed the many remaining years of his pilgrimage in great esteem among his brethren; consistently supporting the character of a good and able pastor, and a valuable and useful member of society. His diaries, domestic history, the narratives of his itinerant expeditions, and anecdotes connected with his ministry, make a readable and agreeable book even for those not particularly interested in the sect with which Mr. Griffin was connected; and the extracts from his papers furnish many valuable lessons to young candidates for the pastoral office. In the course of his peregrinations, he visited Scotland, more than thirty years since, at the request of Mr. James Haldane, and preached in the open air on the Calton Hill of Edinburgh. The expedition seems to have made a lasting impression on the family. He at that time dined at the house of Dr. Stuart (of Dunearn,) and was surprised, as we should have been, to find that the conversation, turning on some biblical topic, almost every gentleman, lay as well as clerical, produced as his usual pocket-companion, a Greek Testament. An old lady, of the Antiburgher persuasion, whose giddy niece had, on a recent visit to London, been converted by hearing Mr. Griffin preach at the Surrey Chapel, called on him to manifest her lively gratitude; embracing him, and shedding floods of tears, while she concluded—"Weel, and see you're preachin' in Edinboro; but ye ken I'm myself an Antiburgher, and canna come to hear you—for I would na like to be seen gaun; but I would just like to be at a window, where I could hear the Word frae your dear lips, without being seen."

Mr. Griffin's eldest son was bred to the ministry; and as a brief specimen of the father's style of thought, we shall extract the following passage from one of his letters, on the Art of Preaching, addressed to the young man:—

"You have several times wished me to give you some instructions respecting preaching. I feel quite disposed to meet your wishes; but I have not leisure now to accomplish my own, so far as regards the manner of doing it. Indeed, I consider that good preaching, or what constitutes a good preacher, and as some would say a pulpit orator, is so little the effect of art, that I am more afraid that the rules which art prescribes will rather cramp and fetter genius than expand its powers, and facilitate its operation. Nature and personal religion should be almost totally left to their native and unbiassed combinations and influence. The science of preaching should, in the first instance, be principally applied to guard the preacher against what is unnatural, or merely artificial. More good preachers have been spoiled, and made inefficient ones, by studying the art of preaching too attentively, than bad ones have been made good ones by it. A river always looks more beautiful to me than a canal. In one, the waters seek and find their course; in the other, it is dug for them. Let grace and nature run like water in the channel which they make for themselves, and they will be both useful and beautiful. Some of the Chinese are reported as putting the feet of their children, which are always growing, into shoes that will neither wear out nor expand: is it any wonder that they are club-footed!"

Though Mr. Griffin contended for freedom of manner, he is represented as having been exceedingly careful in preparing his sermons.

The Works of Dr. Channing. In 5 volumes.
Glasgow: Hedderwick.

The writings of few Americans have obtained the celebrity in Britain which those of Channing have attained. As a proof of their popularity, this Glasgow edition is the third which has appeared, within a few years, in that city. This edition has had the advantage of Dr. Channing's manuscript corrections and emendations, and is a very well-printed and well-arranged work. It has also a portrait of Channing, taken from a painting by an Italian artist, which Miss Martineau pronounces "a speaking likeness;" "the finest likeness she almost ever saw." But Channing's brief Preface to the edition is even more valuable than the portrait. From it we cite one or two sentences explanatory of the object of all his writings. After noticing the favourable reception which his works have met with in Great Britain, and hoping that this augurs well of them, he proceeds—"These volumes will show that the author feels strongly the need of deep social changes, and a spiritual revolution in Christendom; of a new bond between man and man; of a new sense of the relation between man and his Creator. At the same time, they will show his firm belief that our present low civilisation, the central idea of which is wealth, cannot last for ever; that the mass of men are not doomed hopelessly and irresistibly to the degradation of mind and heart in which they are now sunk; that a new comprehension of the end and dignity of a human being is to remodel social institutions and manners; that, in Christianity, and in the powers and principles of human nature, we have the promise of something holier and happier than now exists. It is a privilege to live in this faith; and a privilege to communicate it to others."

If it be the enunciation of these pure and lofty views which gives the works of Channing their popularity in this country—and to a certain extent it must be so—we hail the omen; and believe that there are many—and these a daily-increasing number—who will fervently pray that edition upon edition may be multiplied. The preface is concluded by the author's assurance that this Glasgow edition of his works is the only correct and complete one.

POEMS.

The Poems of Joanna Baillie.

At the end of a half century or more, which has elapsed since she began to write, Miss Baillie has collected her "Fugitive Verses" into a volume! The event comes upon the public with pleasureable surprise; nor can we say whether the welcome legacy will be most valued for the sake of the author or the merits of the verses. In a preface remarkable for good sense and propriety of feeling, and for the absence of affected modesty and false pride, this venerable and admired authoress states her reasons for bestowing this parting gift with her own hands.

When Joanna Baillie began to write, not one of the eminent modern poets had even been heard of; and the empire of verse was divided between Mr. Hayley and Miss Seward. What a literary history is included in the subsequent years!—Few of the poems in the volume are absolutely novel; but many of them can now be little if at all known, and the collection contains, besides, all the Scottish songs, and nearly all the rare and precious gems of Joanna's fugitive verse; such as The Kitten, The Blackcock, To a Child, &c., &c. It might perhaps have interfered with existing copyrights, or many would have rejoiced to find the exquisite lyrics of her dramas included in the collection. One or two legendary ballads, and some hymns and sacred verses written long, long ago, when Logan was composing the Paraphrases of the Church of Scotland, are entirely new to us; and the closing Scottish songs, so richly imbued with the genuine humour of the native muse, without any alloy of her coarseness, will be new to many of our southern readers. Yet as a specimen of Miss Baillie's welcome gift, we select a copy of verses that appear to have been addressed to her sister-in-law, the wife of the late Dr. Matthew Baillie, which, for delicacy of perception and quiet unobtrusive beautiful sentiment, almost merit to be coupled with Wordsworth's "Phantom of Delight," as maiden and matron.

VERSES SENT TO MRS. BAILLIE ON HER BIRTHDAY.

A judgment clear, a pensive mind,
With feelings tender and refined;
A generous heart in kindness glowing,
An open hand on all bestowing;
A temper sweet, and calm, and even,
Through petty provocations given;
A soul benign whose cheerful leisure
Considers still of others' pleasure;
Or, in its lonely graver mood
Considers still of others' good;
And, joined to these, the visioned eye
And tuneful ear of poesy;
Blest wight! in whom these gifts combine,
Our dear Sophia, sister mine!
How comes it that, from year to year,
This day hath passed without its cheer,—
No token passing time to trace,
No rhymester's lay to do it grace!
Love was not wanting, but the muse,
Reserved, unpliant, and recluse,
Sat in her unreal kingdom, dreaming
Through baseless scenes of airy seeming,
And could not turn her 'wildered eye
On plain, unfancied verity.

Yet, be it so! once in my life
I'll hold with her a gen'rous strife;
With or without her aid, my lay
Shall hail with grateful lines this day:—
The day when first thy infant heart
Did from inactive being start,
And in thy baby bosom beat,—
Its doubtful, dangerous, fragile seat,—
A heavenly spark that downward came
To mount again a brighter flame:
Meantime, a warm and fostering blessing,
More precious felt in long possessing,
'Tis lent to those who daily prove
Its gentle offices of love.
Ah! for their sake, long be the date
Of this its more ignoble state!
I who, so near its influence set,
Owe it a long and pleasing debt,
In course of nature launched before
From mortal nature's foggy shore,
Would fain behind me leave some token
Of friendly kindred love unbroken,
Which, in some hour retired and lone,
Thine eyes may sometimes look upon
While in thy saddened tender breast,—
Ah, no! I may not think the rest,
Lest, both bereft of words and strain,
My silent thoughts alone remain:
This token, then, do thou receive.
I will not tell thee to believe
How in my heart its spirit glows,
How soothly from my pen it flows.
Through years unmarked by care or pain,
Oft may this day return again,
Blessed by him whose rough career
Of toil and care thy love doth cheer:

Whose manly worth by Heaven was fated
To be through life thus fitly mated ;
Blessed by those thy youthful twain,
Who by thy side their place maintain,
Still nestling closer to thy bosom
As the fair flowers of reason blossom ;
By all who thy dear kindred claim,
And love to see thy face, and love to hear thy name.

And so I end my simple writing,
The muse in fault, but love enditing
That which, but for this love alone,
I thought not ever to have done,—
A birthday lay. Then, sister mine,
Keep thou in kindness this propine ;
And through life's yet untrodden scene
Still be to me what thou hast been.

Moore's Works. Volume III.

We did not think to have been so soon with Moore again : but in this new volume he comes forth in all his strength, and all his fascination—irresistible ! The Twopenny Post-Bag—which, of itself, might make the fortunes of an ordinary volume—is the smallest merit. This contains, besides the Irish Melodies, three serious satires, which are still quite as good as manuscript. They were published anonymously in 1808 ; and fell nearly dead-born from the press. They will now find life, and one of them fame, if not immortality. It is entitled Corruption ; and is so truly liberal and catholic in spirit, that Mr. Moore now finds it necessary to make a rather ungraceful, or lame apology, for its sins against Whiggery. It is the only one of his productions, by the way, for which he seeks seriously to apologize ; and, of all his sins of youth, the one least requiring apology. An Irishman, born with all an Irishman's national feelings, and attached by personal ties to a few of the Whig aristocracy, Mr. Moore has hitherto stood forward as the lyricist of his unfortunate country, and the lampooner of the Tory party : but the author of Corruption possesses even higher claims than these ; and one regrets to find Mr. Moore now half ashamed, or rather afraid, of their consequences, and trying to father upon the writings of Bolingbroke, and others, those pure sentiments, which must, for the time, have been those of his own heart, however he may repudiate them now, when his friends and patrons have attained power. There is another view of the case. An impartial public cannot forget that George prince of Wales, whatever were his vices and failings, was exactly the same man, the same husband and father, while the object of Whig laudation, as after he had committed the only sin for which the Whigs had no forgiveness—that of deserting “his early friends,” or their party, and retaining his father's Tory ministers in office. That his fickleness, or treachery, saved them from the snare into which too many of them were sure to have fallen, merits some gratitude. But the Regent—the hero of the Twopenny Post-Bag—is not to the present purpose.

Whatever he may have become in 1832, Mr. Moore, in 1807, was not a “Revolution Whig”—not, indeed, a Whig in any sense could the man have been, who, in the preface to a poem on Political Corruption, wrote thus :—

No nation was ever blessed with a more golden opportunity of establishing and securing its liberties for ever than the conjuncture of Eighty-eight presented to the people of Great Britain. But the disgraceful reigns of Charles and James had weakened and degraded the national character. The bold notions of popular right, which had arisen out of the struggles between Charles the First and his parliament, were gradually supplanted by those slavish doctrines for which Lord H—keeb—ry eulogises the churchmen of that period ; and as the Reformation had happened too soon for the purity of religion, so the Revolution came too late for the spirit of liberty. Its advantages accordingly were, for the most part, specious and transitory, while the evils which it entailed are still felt and still increasing. By rendering unnecessary the frequent exercise of Prerogative,—that unwieldy power which cannot move a step without alarm,—it diminished the only interference of the Crown, which is singly and independently exposed before the people, and whose abuses therefore are obvious to their senses and capacities. Like the myrtle over a celebrated statue in Minerva's temple at Athens, it skillfully veiled from the public eye the only obtrusive feature of royalty. At the same time, however, that the Revolution abridged this unpopular attribute, it amply compensated by the substitution of a new power, as much more potent in its effect as it is more secret in its operations. In the disposal of an immense revenue, and the extensive patronage annexed to it, the first foundations of this power of the Crown were laid ; the innovation of a standing army at once increased and strengthened it, and the few slight barriers which the Act of Settlement opposed to its progress have all been gradually removed during the whigish reigns that succeeded ; till at length this spirit of influence has become the vital principle of the state,—an agency, subtle and unseen, which pervades every part of the Constitution, lurks under all its forms and regulates all its movements, and like the invisible sylph or grace which presides over the motions of beauty, “ Illam, quicquid agit, quoquo vestigia flectit, Compositi furtim subsequiturque.”

The cause of Liberty and the Revolution are so habitually associated in the minds of Englishmen, that probably in objecting to the latter, I may be thought hostile or indifferent to the former. But assuredly nothing could be more unjust than such a suspicion. The very object, indeed, which my humble animadversions would attain is, that in the crisis to which I think England is now hastening, and between which and foreign subjugation she may soon be compelled to choose, the errors and omissions of 1688 should be remedied ; and, as it was then her fate to experience a Revolution without Reform, so she may now endeavour to accomplish a Reform without Revolution.

In speaking of the parties which have so long agitated England, it will be observed that I lean as little to the Whigs as to their adversaries. Both factions have been equally cruel to Ireland, and perhaps equally insincere in their efforts for the liberties of England. There is one name, indeed, connected with Whiggism, of which I can never think but with veneration and tenderness.

The honoured name is that of Fox. Now, it is not Bolingbroke that is speaking here, but Moore, who may now be seriously asked—“Is, then, the reform at length accomplished ?” The satire is in the form of an epistle sent from Ireland to an English friend, glorying in the name of “a Whig of 1688.” This “constitutional Whig” is thus addressed :—

Yet pause a moment—and if truths severe
Can find an inlet to that courtly ear,
Which hears no news but W—rd's gazetted lies,
And loves no politics in rhyme but Pye's,—
If aught can please thee but the good old saws
Of “Church and State,” and “William's matchless laws,”
And “Acts and Rights of glorious Eighty-eight,”—
Things, which though now a century out of date,
Still serve to ballast, with convenient words,
A few crank arguments for speaking lords,—
Turn, while I tell how England's freedom found,
Where most she look'd for life, her deadliest wound ;
How brave she struggled, while her foe was seen,
How faint since influence lent that foe a screen ;

How strong o'er James and Popery she prevail'd,
How weakly fell, when Whigs and gold assailed.*

While kings were poor, and all those schemes unknown
Which drain the people, to enrich the throne;
Ere yet a yielding Commons had supplied
Those chains of gold by which themselves are tied;
Then proud Prerogative, untaught to creep
With bribery's silent foot on Freedom's sleep,
Frankly avow'd his bold enslaving plan,
And claim'd a right from God to trample man!
But Luther's schism had too much rous'd mankind
For Hampden's truths to linger long behind;
Nor then, when king-like popes had fallen so low,
Could pope-like kings escape the levelling blow.
That ponderous sceptre (in whose place we bow
To the light talisman of influence now,
Too gross, too visible to work the spell
Which modern power performs, in fragments fell:
In fragments lay, till, patch'd and painted o'er
With fleurs-de-lys, it shone and scourged once more.

'Twas then, my friend, thy kneeling nation quaff'd
Long, long and deep, the churchman's opiate draught
Of passive, prone obedience—then took flight
All sense of man's true dignity and right;
And Britons slept so sluggish in their chain,
That Freedom's watch-voice call'd almost in vain.
Oh England! England! what a chance was thine,
When the last tyrant of that ill-starr'd line
Fled from his sullied crown, and left thee free
To found thy own eternal liberty!
How nobly high, in that propitious hour,
Might patriot hands have rais'd the triple tower
Of British freedom, on a rock divine
Which neither force could storm nor treachery mine!
But no—the luminous, the lofty plan,
Like mighty Babel, seem'd too bold for man;
The curse of jarring tongues again was given
To thwart a work which rais'd men nearer heaven.
While Tories marr'd what Whigs had scarce begun,
While Whigs undid what Whigs themselves had done. ‡

But, gentle Whig reader, Mr. Moore disclaims all this; and ascribes the sin of his youth to the writings of Bolingbroke and Sir William Wyndham, and other statesmen of that "factions period, when the same sort of alliance took place between Toryism and what is now called Radicalism, which is always likely to ensue on the ejection of the Tory party from power." So Mr. Moore is now an orthodox believer in Tory-Radicalism, and never seems to have heard of the more obvious nuisance of Whig-Toryism, of which tokens are to be seen every day he rises. In the satires on the Regent—if these light effusions may be designated by so grave a name as satire—Mr. Moore can see no cause of offence, and nothing to repent; nor, we apprehend, the cant of loyalty apart, does any one else. But it is worthy of remark, that while these squibs were admired and applauded, and while their author escaped unmolested, things not more pungent, and much less indecorous, drew the fiercest persecution of the government upon Leigh Hunt and his brother, under the libel law. But our limited space will be better occupied by another extract from what Mr. Moore in one place describes as his "somewhat rash effusion," for two lines in which a Whig friend took him to task: they are those quoted below, and will make a good motto to political articles in the newspaper:—

As bees, on flowers alighting, cease their hum—
So, settling upon places, Whigs grow dumb.

It must be kept in mind, that the working of the parliament, and the condition of the people, as described in this extract, refer to a period a quarter of a century anterior to the Reform Bill.

While parliaments, no more those sacred things
Which make and rule the destiny of kings,
Like loaded dice by ministers are thrown,
And each new set of sharpeners cog their own.
Hence the rich oil, that from the Treasury steals,
Drips smooth o'er all the Constitution's wheels,
Giving the old machine such pliant play,
That Court and Commons jog one joltless way,
While wisdom trembles for the crazy car,
So gilt, so rotten, carrying fools so far;
And the duped people, hourly doom'd to pay
The sums that bribe their liberties away,—

* The chief, perhaps the only advantage which has resulted from the system of influence, is that tranquil course of uninterrupted action which it has given to the administration of government. If kings ~~were~~ be paramount in the state (and their ministers for the time-being always think so,) the country is indebted to the Revolution for enabling them to become so, quietly, and for removing skilfully the danger of those shocks and collisions which the alarming efforts of prerogative never failed to produce.

† The drivelling correspondence between James I. and his "dog Steenie" (the Duke of Buckingham,) which we find among the Hardwicke Papers, sufficiently shows, if we wanted any such illustration, into what dotting, idiotic brains the plan of arbitrary power may enter.

‡ The monarchs of Great Britain can never be sufficiently grateful for that accommodating spirit which led the Revolutionary Whigs to give away the crown, without imposing any of those restraints or stipulations which other men might have taken advantage of so favourable a moment to enforce, and in the framing of which they had so good a model to follow as the limitations proposed by the Lords Essex and Halifax, in the debate upon the Exclusion Bill. They not only condescended, however, to accept of places, but took care that these dignities should be no impediment to their "voice potential" in affairs of legislation; and although an Act was after many years suffered to pass, which, by one of its articles, disqualified placemen from serving as members of the House of Commons, it was yet not allowed to interfere with the influence of the reigning monarch, nor with that of his successor Anne. The purifying clause, indeed, was not to take effect till after the decease of the latter sovereign, and she very considerably repealed it altogether. So that, as representation has continued ever since, if the king were simple enough to send to foreign courts ambassadors who were most of them in the pay of those courts, he would be just as honestly and faithfully represented as are his people. It would be endless to enumerate all the favours which were conferred upon William by those

"apostate Whigs." They complimented him with the first suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act which had been hazarded since the confirmation of that privilege; and this example of our Deliverer's reign has not been lost upon any of his successors. They promoted the establishment of a standing army, and circulated in its defence the celebrated "Balancing Letter," in which it is insinuated that England, even then, in her boasted hour of regeneration, was arrived at such a pitch of faction and corruption, that nothing could keep her in order but a Whig ministry and a standing army. They refused, as long as they could, to shorten the duration of parliaments; and though, in the Declaration of Rights, the necessity of such a reform was acknowledged, they were able, by arts not unknown to modern ministers, to brand those as traitors and republicans who urged it. But the grand and distinguishing trait of their measures was the power they bestowed on the Crown of almost annihilating the freedom of elections,—of turning from its course, and for ever defiling that great stream of Representation, which had, even in the most agitated periods, reflected some features of the people, but which, from thenceforth, became the Pactolus, the "aurifer amnis," of the court, and served as a mirror of the national will and popular feeling no longer. . . . The dangerous power, however, of creating peers, which has been so often exercised for the government against the constitution, is still left in free and unqualified activity; notwithstanding the example of that celebrated Bill for the limitation of this ever-budding branch of prerogative, which was proposed in the reign of George I. under the peculiar sanction and recommendation of the Crown, but which the Whigs thought right to reject, with all that characteristic delicacy, which, in general, prevents them when enjoying the sweets of office themselves, from taking any uncourtly advantage of the Throne. It will be recollected, however, that the creation of the frederic peers by the Tories in Anne's reign (a measure which Swift, like a true party man, defends) gave these upright Whigs all possible alarm for their liberties.

Like a young eagle, who has lent his plume
To fledge the shaft by which he meets his doom,—
See their own feathers pluck'd, to wing the dart
Which rank corruption destines for their heart !
But soft ! methinks I hear thee proudly say,
" What ! shall I listen to the impious lay,
That dares, with Tory license, to profane
The bright bequests of William's glorious reign !
Shall the great wisdom of our patriot sires,
Whom H—wks—b—y quotes and savoury B—rch admires,

Be slander'd thus ! shall honest St—le agree
With virtuous R—se to call us pure and free,
Yet fail to prove it ! Shall our patent pair
Of wise state-poets waste their words in air,
And P—e unheeded breathe his prosperous strain,
And C—nn—ng take the people's sense in vain !"

The people !—ah, that Freedom's form should stay
Where Freedom's spirit long hath passed away !
That a false smile should play around the dead,
And flush the features when the soul hath fled !
When Rome had lost her virtue with her rights,
When her foul tyrant sat on Capres's heights
Amid his ruffian spies, and doom'd to death
Each noble name they blasted with their breath,— Even then, (in mockery of that golden time,
When the Republic rose revered, sublime,
And her proud sons, diffused from zone to zone,
Gave kings to every nation but their own,)
Even then the senate and the tribunes stood,
Insulting marks, to show how high the flood
Of Freedom flow'd, in glory's by-gone day,
And how it ebb'd,—for ever ebb'd away !

Look but around—though yet a tyrant's sword
Nor haunts our sleep nor glitters o'er our board,
Though blood be better drawn, by modern quacks,
With Treasury leeches than with sword or axe ;
Yet say, could even a prostrate tribune's power,
Or a mock senate, in Rome's servile hour,
Insult so much the claims, the rights of man,
As doth that fetter'd mob, that free divan,
Of noble tools and honourable knaves,
Of pension'd patriots and privileged slaves ;—
That party-colour'd mass, which nought can warm
But rank corruption's heat—whose quicken'd swarm Spread their light wings in Bribery's golden sky,
Buzz for a period, lay their eggs, and die :—
That greedy vampire, which from Freedom's tomb
Comes forth, with all the mimicry of bloom
Upon its lifeless cheek, and sucks and drains
A people's blood to feed its putrid veins !

Thou start'st, my friend, at picture drawn so dark—
" Is there no light !" thou ask'st—" no lingering spark
Of ancient fire to warm us ! Lives there none,
To act a Marvell's part !"—alas ! not one.
To place and power all public spirit tends,
In place and power all public spirit ends ;
Like hardy plants, that love the air and sky,
When out, 'twill thrive—but taken in, 'twill die !

Not bolder truths of sacred Freedom hung
From Sidney's pen or burn'd on Fox's tongue,
Than upstart Whigs produce each market-night,
While yet their conscience, as their purse, is light ;
While debts at home excite their care for those Which, dire to tell, their much-lov'd country owes,
And loud and upright, till their prize be known,
They thwart the King's supplies to raise their own.
*But bees, on flowers alighting, cease their hum—
So, sitting upon places, Whigs grow dumb.*
And, though most base is he who, 'neath the shade
Of Freedom's ensign plies corruption's trade,
And makes the sacred flag he dares to show
His passport to the market of his foe,
Yet, yet, I own, so venerably dear
Are Freedom's grave old anthems to my ear,
That I enjoy them, though by traitors sung,
And reverence Scripture even from Satan's tongue.
Nay, when the constitution has expired,
I'll have such men, like Irish wakers, hired

To chant old " Habeas Corpus" by its side,
And ask, in purchas'd ditties, why it died !

There are tersely versified passages, and fine sentiments, in the other two satires, and also learned notes ; but we limit ourselves to Corruption ; and which comes as pat at the opening of another session of a Whig parliament, as the letters of the Twopenny Post-Bag did on their first appearance. With a few lines from the Sceptic, we shall conclude :—

Wo to the Sceptic, in these party days,
Who wafts to neither shrine his puffs of praise !
For him no pension pours its annual fruits,
No fertile sinecure spontaneous shoots ;
Not his the meed that crown'd Don H—kh—m's rhyme,
Nor sees he e'er, in dreams of future time,
Those shadowy forms of sleek reversions rise,
So dear to Scotchmen's second-sighted eyes.
Yet who, that looks to History's damning leaf,
Where Whig and Tory, thief opposed to thief,
On either side in lofty shame are seen,
While Freedom's form hangs crucified between—
Who, B—, who such rival rogues can see,
But flies from both to Honesty and thee !

Either our memory fails, or Mr. Moore has omitted some rather piquant lines in the Intercepted Letters ; but they may belong to other poems which are yet to appear. The rest of the volume is filled up with the beautiful Irish Melodies ;—and who requires to be reminded of them !

The Poems of Lady Flora Hastings.

The literary remains of this lamented victim of malice and intrigue, or of thoughtlessness scarcely less culpable, have found with the public an interest altogether independent of poetical merit. There were, we believe, few hearts so callous as not to have been moved by the cruel and wanton injuries inflicted upon this patient and innocent lady ; and though she has happily gone " where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest," yet few will regard with indifference the tokens which she left of highly cultivated literary taste, and of gentle and warm affections. It was well known in her own family circle, that Lady Flora had composed a great deal of beautiful verse, in various styles, and that she had sketched out, or rather written, fragments—isolated scenes—of two tragedies. She had been repeatedly urged by her friends to publish her poems ; but, with the genuine modesty which is ever the attendant, nay, the surest sign, of real genius in woman, she shrunk from the notoriety of authorship ; and, at her death, without any particular directions, left all her papers to the sole care of that affectionate sister who has now given them to the world. This is done with some necessary explanations, and also, as we should imagine, superfluous reasons or apologies. The poems that are finished, do not, so far as we can judge, evince either haste or negligence ; still they may want that careful pruning and those delicate touches which the author alone could have bestowed. Some are mere first sketches, incomplete, laid aside, and probably were never intended to see the light. The volume contains ballads and translations from the German ; but, above all its contents, will be prized those copies of verses breathing that pure domestic affection and cordial family union which appear to have been the original source of Lady Flora's poetical inspiration. From them we choose our few specimens.

The following lines were written in 1834, on the birthday of her affectionate mistress, the Duchess of K—whose conduct to Lady Flora was not only honourable, but magnanimous, situated as the duchess then was :—

Fain would I waken, for thy natal day,
The sweetest tones that poet's lyre can breathe :
For thee pour forth the glad and festive lay,
And for thy brow a rosy chaplet wreath.

But deeper thoughts forbid—I may not bring,
With thoughtless gaiety and sportive glee,
To thee, so light, so vain an offering—
This day is full of memory for thee.

Voices long hush'd are whispering to thee now,
The loved—the lost—the absent round thee press ;
The true heart, the early friends laid low,
Whose presence wont in former years to bless :

Not with such hallowed memories as these,
May the light flow of minstrel numbers blend ;
They bid the votive strains of fancy cease—
More fervent homage shall on thee attend.

In simple phrase, with lips sincere, for thee,
Lady, I breathe a blessing and a prayer :
Long be thy precious days vouchsafed, to see
The bless'd results of thy maternal care.

Few be thy trials, and, thy path to cheer,
Be many a ray of gracious mercy given ;
And earth more happy each revolving year,
Be the bright earnest of a brighter heaven !

Our next specimen we consider even finer than the above. The lines are addressed to her little nephew and niece, the children of the Marquis of Hastings, Lady Flora's only brother. The poem is so sweet and pretty, that it cannot fail to become a favourite with all children :—

Get up, little sister ! the morning is bright,
And the birds are all singing to welcome the light :
The buds are all opening, the dew 's on the flower ;
If you shake but a branch, see there falls quite a shower.

By the side of their mothers, look under the trees,
How the young fawns are skipping about as they please ;
And by all those rings in the water I know
The fishes are merrily swimming below.

The bee, I daresay, has been long on the wing,
To get honey from every flower of the spring ;
For the bee never idles, but labours all day,
And thinking—wise little insect—work better than play.

The lark's singing gaily ; it loves the bright sun,
And rejoices that now the gay spring is begun :
For the spring is so cheerful, I think 't would be wrong,
If we did not feel happy to hear the lark's song.

Get up ! for when all things are merry and glad,
Good children should never be lazy and sad ;
For God gives the day-light, dear sister, that we May rejoice like the lark, and may work like the bee.

The following poem may not possess very great literary merit, but it is one of those ever-welcome trifles to which the greatest minds have unbended, when amiably seeking to amuse their friends and family circle ; and it moreover tells of days when this lamented lady was herself both cheerful and gay. It was written in consequence of a friend asserting that few rhymes could be found for Ashby de la Zouch,—a place closely connected with the history of the Hastings family, as representatives of the Earls of Huntingdon. The subject of the playful poem is thus explained :—

Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire, was long the residence of the Earls of Huntingdon, who had a castle there, which was destroyed by the parliamentary army in the time of Charles I. It is the property of the Marquis of Hastings ; and, within the last few years, a building has been pulled down which adjoined the ruins of the castle, and was called "the Old Place," or Palace, and which was always considered, from traditional authority, to have been built by Henry, fifth Earl of Huntingdon, for the accommodation of the suite of King James I. It is well known that it was a part of that monarch's policy to visit any of his subjects whose power and riches rendered them formidable, and, by his long residence at their expense, to diminish their fortunes. Amongst the rest, his majesty, attended by a numerous suite, visited the Earl of Huntingdon, and was splendidly entertained. I do not suppose the tradition to be strictly correct, which is still assigning three weeks or two months as the duration of the royal visit ; but his arrival is thus mentioned in a MS. history of the Hastings family :—

"1st September 1617.—King James being on his return from Scotland, towards which he went on 15th March preceding, was entertained, together with the whole court, by this Earle at his house in Ashby de la Zouch ; the king lodging there all night."

The author addresses the courteous public.

Ye gentles gay
List to my lay,
On lofty themes I touch—
A song I'll sing
Of James the King,
And Ashby de la Zouch.

Royal musings.

The monarch sate
In regal state,
As chroniclers will vouch ;
Absorb'd—for nought
Could claim a thought
But Ashby de la Zouch.

Anticipatory reflections.

Nor yet renown
Had made it known
For baths,* hot, cold, and douche ;
Nor Scott to fame
Consign'd the name
Of Ashby de la Zouch.

Rumour telleth of the magnificence of Earl Henry.

But fame declared
Earl Henry fared
As kings to fare would grudge—
His banquet-hall
Was free to all,
In Ashby de la Zouch :

Of the illustrious guests.

To every squire
In Leicestershire—
And there were many such—
And chivalry
Of high degree,
At Ashby de la Zouch.

The resolve.

Outspake the King—
"A settled thing !
I'll taste no more hotch-potch,
Till I shall know
How matters go
At Ashby de la Zouch.

The plan unfolded.

"I'll down and share
My cousin's fare :
I'll mount the heavy coach,
And it shall drop
Me from its top,
At Ashby de la Zouch.

Objections answered.

"'Tis not the thing
To suit a king,
My ministers avouch ;
But I will jog
Along—incog.—
To Ashby de la Zouch."

Effect produced.

On all men near Fell doubt and fear—
He might have spoken Dutch :
They puzzled long,
That courtier throng,
O'er Ashby de la Zouch.

* Salt-water from Lord Hastings' coal-mines, famous for the cure of rheumatism, and now brought to Ashby.

The constitutional advisers of the crown alarmed. Could it be meant As precedent For future kings to clutch ! Use his own eyes Instead of spies, At Ashby de la Zouch !

The author moraliseth. Oh ! dream too free For majesty ! Could truth to thrones approach, James had gone down From town alone To Ashby de la Zouch.

A threatened resignation. The premier knelt ; He said—he felt He must from office trudge, Should etiquette The king forget, For Ashby de la Zouch.

La nuit porte conseil. Ere morning's light Had banish'd night, The monarch left his couch ; And straightway sent To this intent, To Ashby de la Zouch.

A gracious letter. " He did not fear He on his dear Kind kinsman could encroach ; He'd be, he knew, Le Bien-venu At Ashby de la Zouch."

A humble reply, and animadversions thereon. The Earl profess'd Himself most bless'd ; (The premier mutter'd " Fudge !") And all the court Did straight resort To Ashby de la Zouch.

Préparation. But wo the while ! What haste, what toil, To build, and eke to botch ; To brew, to bake— To mend, to make— In Ashby de la Zouch !

Perplexities. Earl Henry stood In thoughtful mood— The countess tore her mutch ; She thought of all That might befall Poor Ashby de la Zouch.

More definite apprehensions. Her buttery, stored With many a hoard, Where erst none dared to poach, Would rifled be, She could foresee, At Ashby de la Zouch.

The countess anticipateth an incursion of the Picts and Scots. " He will bring down," She cried, " from town, Hosts of his starving Scotch ; They'll find no kail, Nor parritch meal, At Ashby de la Zouch !"

The King arriveth. On foot, on horse, All rush'd of course, With sword, bow, staff, or crutch, The king to meet, And gladly greet, At Ashby de la Zouch.

The King fares sumptuously. Great was the guest, As great the feast, And none could thrift reproach ; Of buck and roe They had enow, At Ashby de la Zouch.

A word in favour of the Trent. Gillwiska's stream* Could not, I deem, Afford pike, perch, or roach ; But generous Trent A tribute sent To Ashby de la Zouch.

The Malmsey butt is broached. He gave the word, That princely lord, The Malvoisie to broach ; The fatal wine† Was thought " divine" At Ashby de la Zouch.

" De omnibus rebus—et multis aliis." I might as well Attempt to tell The feats of Scaramouch, As all the " sport Of that gay court" At Ashby de la Zouch.

The finale, where-in lurketh a moral. The bells did ring, The gracious king Enjoy'd his visit much ; And we've been poor— Er since that hour, At Ashby de la Zouch.

ONE OF THE HASTINGS.

Jairah, a Dramatic Mystery ; and other Poems.

By Lady E. Stuart Wortley.

The first attempts of this lady were so extravagantly bepraised by the critics, that sober-minded people were revolted. Now when her fermenting imagination is working itself clear, and her poetry evinces growing strength and coherence, no one speaks about her. However, Lady Emmeline does not seem to require the stimulus of praise. Her gallant spirit pricks on her muse ; and song proves its own reward, "Jairah" is a lady's Cain, or Prometheus Unbound. The miscellaneous poems are of varying character. We meant to take for our specimen the brave Song of Falconry ; but that will keep, and this is evanescent ; at least we hope the occasion of its birth will pass away. Lady Emmeline was always a Tory, but now she becomes a partisan.

A VARIATION ON THE OLD ENGLISH GENTLEMAN.

I will sing you a very steady song, made by some steady pates, Of some fine old English gentlemen who live on our estates ! Do-nothings well might be their name, for they do this at all rates, And help each other this to do, like kind and loving mates !

Chorus.—Those fine old English gentlemen, some of the present time.

They think that they take care, meanwhile, of this our English land !

They have plotted, and have pottared,—they have plundered and have planned, How to win fresh booty for themselves, through many a slight-of-hand.

While the country in a curious plight, on a giddy point doth stand,

Through those fine old, &c.

They're a very philosophic sort of stoical old set ! For whate'er the land's dire losses be, at least they do not fret.

—No doubt we owe them large arrears, and a weighty national debt !

And if times should change a little, why, we may repay them even yet,

Those fine old, &c.

* A stream that runs close to Ashby.

† Fatal to George duke of Clarence, Lord Huntingdon's ancestor.

What though they nothing do themselves, yet a wondrous deal is done !

Hark ! what rumours of rebellions come, and of battles lost and won !

But Cupid's Doves, and guileless Lambs, do well such strife to shun—

While from all sides those strange reports must the ears so lengthy stun,

Of those fine old, &c.

Yes !—some slight troubles have occurred, and occur still every day ;

And the country groans and grumbles much, and some wise people say—

That nought can aid her now, since even Canada spurns her sway !

But—whist !—she still is rich enough her rulers to pay,
The fine old, &c.

* * * * *

Old England's likely now to meet, with many a sad mishap,

While one a small flirtation makes, and the other takes a nap ;

We name no names, but tight and close fits the unbecoming cap ;

The Lion's ancient strength is lost, as he slumbers in her lap ;

Through these fine old, &c.

Now the wrong'd Chinese defy her power, and war's dread banner rear ;

John Bull in that big China Shop will break his horns I fear !

Tea-totallers are looking black—very poor will be their cheer—

Henceforth their 'minished dose of Tea they will water with a tear—

Through those fine old, &c.

* * * * *

Oh ! they prate and potter, fuss and fume—nor their business understand,

And whate'er is set on foot by them, is still done under-hand ;

While one bog-trotting knave can rule their whole tame truckling band.

Up ! all you high-souled Englishmen—rouse up, and rid your land,

Of these weak old, &c.

Up ! all ye true-born Englishmen—and nobly do and dare !

Nail—nail your colours to the mast !—let the Lion leave his lair !

Now, the thunders of his haughty strength let him fearfully prepare,

And yet turn the terrors of your wrath, since that they ill could bear,

From those poor old English gentlemen, &c.

* * * * *

Foreign lords and masters we must brook, once Earth's rulers—Ocean's lords !—

Strike th' insulted flag !—slight th' outraged shrine !—sheath these stain-dishonoured swords !

On our manors dares to poach the Bear, with his northern barbarous hordes !—

Brave Circassia 'gainst him stands alone, while no aid that crew affords,

Of queer old English gentlemen, not of the ancient time !

This is very clever, and more like the witty "Lady Mary" than anything that her fair connexion (who we were not till now aware was of the Vixen faction,) has yet produced. We wish she could find an image for Russia trampling down England, less sectional or like a Justice of the Quorum, than that of poaching on our manor.

The Saga of Frithioff. Translated from the Swedish of Tegner by Oscar Baker. Bull. Pp. 171.

We recommend this spirited new translation of "The Saga" to all who prize that bold and vigorous, if rude national poetry, in which the primitive character and manners of a people are embalmed. We cannot go quite the length of Mr. Laing, and class "The Saga" with the productions of Homer, Shakspeare, and Scott ; but they hold the place, to the northern nations, of our old ballads and metrical romances, the "Percy Reliques," and "Border Minstrelsy ;" and that we consider a high station in popular literature.

The Comic Almanac.

RIGDUM FUNNIDOS, gent., has, this year, mercifully delayed his stated appearance until Christmas fare had imparted additional strength of lungs, and of risible muscles, to readers, upon whose side-shaking powers he never before made calls so irresistible, and so incessant. What we prize in this exquisite droll, is that undercurrent of wisdom and humanity which, though still and unseen, flows through much of his drolling.

TALES AND ROMANCES.

Adventures of Susan Hopely ; or, Circumstantial Evidence. 3 vols. Saunders & Otley.

After the "Causes Célèbres," and the many curious trials which the history of criminal jurisprudence furnishes, it is not very easy for any author, however gifted, to compose an effective series of tales turning upon circumstantial evidence ; but independently altogether of this objection, we have, in Susan Hopely, an entertaining novel, and a clever and faithful picture of ordinary English life, with little of romance, (though a good deal of improbability,) and with no pretension : pleasing, natural, humorous, and, in the right place, truly pathetic ; and, altogether, an excellent fiction, though, perhaps, somewhat wanting in what Dr. Johnson called "concoction." Susan herself is an English Jeanie Deans ; and the episodes of the clerk of the Post-office, who abstracted money from a letter ; and the story of Mrs. Ayton, who was impeached with stealing lace and silks ; with the entire history of the unfortunate girl, Julia Clark, are quite beautiful. We regret that the work has reached us at so late a period of the month, that we cannot give our readers a fuller account of it.

Poor Jack. By Captain Marryat. Illustrated by Clarkson Stanfield. 1 vol. 8vo.

After "Peter Simple," we consider "Poor Jack" as the best of Captain Marryat's novels ; and even before the popular Peter in approximation to the purely national standard of Fielding and De Foe—whether in humour, naturalness, truthful simplicity, or the entire absence of all kinds of pretension. The moral of the story is wholesome and cheerful ; and it possesses the grand quality of being, without any violent effort at excitement, well-sustained and entertaining. The book forms, moreover, a very handsome library (not merely circulating library) volume ; and the illustrations are the best, out of sight, which we remember to have seen in any late work of this sort. Some of them are, indeed, more like finished designs of the Flemish school, than semi-caricature sketches to illustrate a tale. Captain Marryat has pressed a few excellent Yankee and salt-water lyrics into the service with good effect. As a fair specimen of the "Memoirs of Poor Jack," we select the following scene, which has the recommendation of completeness. We must premise that Jack, or rather Tom, is leaving home to be apprenticed to a Channel pilot at Deal :—

It was a beautiful sunshiny morning when I arose ; and as Bramble intended that we should leave Greenwich the next day, I thought I might as well call at the house of Dr. Tadpole, and try if I could see him before I went. When I arrived there, he was not at home ; but my namesake, Tom, was, as usual, in the shop. Tom was two or three years older than me, being between seventeen and eighteen ; and he had now grown a great tall fellow. We always were very good friends when we occasionally met ; and he generally appeared to be as good-tempered and grinning as ever : but when I entered the shop, I found him very grave and dejected ; so much so, that I could not help asking him what was the matter.

"Matter enough, I think," said Tom, who was pounding something in the mortar. "I'll not stay here, that's flat. I'll break my indentures, as sure as my name is Tom Cob ; and I'll set up an opposition ; and I'll join the Friends of the People's Society, and the Anti-Bible Society, and every other opposition Anti in the country."

"Why, what has happened, Tom ?"

"I'll make speeches against Church and against State ; and against the aristocracy and Habeas Corpus ; and against physic ; and against standing armies and Magna Charta ; and every other rascally tyranny and oppression to which we are subjected : that I will."

Here Tom gave such a thump with the pestle that I thought he would have split the mortar.

"But what is it, Tom ?" inquired I, as I sat down.

"What has the Doctor done ?"

"Why, I'll tell you : the liquorice is all gone ; and he won't order any more."

"Well, that is because you have eaten it all."

"No I haven't ; I have not eaten a bit for these five weeks : its all been used in pharmacoepy ; honestly used—and he can't deny it."

"Who used it ?"

"Why, I did : he said he wouldn't stand my eating liquorice ; and I told him I shouldn't eat any more. No more I have ; but I ain't well, and I prescribes for myself. Haven't I a right to do that ! Mayn't I physic myself ! I'm a doctor as well as he is. Who makes up all the medicine, I should like to know ! Who ties up the bottles, and writes directions ! Well, my insides are out of order, and I prescribes for myself black draughts—'omnes duas horas amendum ;' and now, says he, as the ingredients are all gone, I shan't take any more."

"And pray what were the ingredients, Tom ?"

"Why, laxative and alterative, as suits my complaint. Extract. liquor. aqua pura—haustus."

"And what is that ?"

"Liquorice and water to be sure : there's nothing else I can take. I have tasted everything in the shop, from plate powder to aqua fortis ; and everything else goes against my stomach."

"Well, Tom, it's a hard case ; but perhaps the Doctor will think better of it."

"He'd better, or I'll set up for myself ; for I won't stand it any longer : it ain't only for myself, but for others, that I care. Why, I have a hankering for Anny Whistle (you know her, don't you ?) a pretty little girl with red lips ; lives in Church Street. Well, as long as I could bring her a bit of liquorice when I went to see her, all was smooth enough, and I got many a kiss when no one was nigh ; but now that I can't fork out a bit as big as a marble, she's getting quite shy of me, and is always talking with Bill, the butcher's boy. I know he gives her bulls'-eyes ; I seed him one day buying a ha'porth. Now, ain't that hard !"

Tom's plans for completing his medical education and surgical practice—when thus compelled, by the cruelty of his master, to think of setting up for himself—are quite as good as this ; but the necessity of putting them in action is prevented by the Doctor yielding in this wise :—

"The Doctor and I must come to a proper understanding. I didn't clean his boots this morning. I wish, if you see him Jack, you'd reason with him a little."

"I'll see what I can do : but don't be rash. Good-by, Tom ; mind you tell the Doctor that I called."

"Well, I will ; but that's not in my indentures."

I called in at the widow's [a gay and amiable young Irish widow, who keeps a cigar-shop—is very kind to Jack, and has great influence with the Doctor,] and communicated the intended rebellion on the part of Tom.

"Well," said Mrs. St. Felix, "I'll not forget to make the Spanish claim, and prevent Tom from walking Spanish. The Doctor is very inconsiderate ; he forgets that Tom's regard for liquorice is quite as strong as his own for a cigar. Now, if the Doctor don't promise me to have a fresh supply for Tom, I won't let him have a cigar for himself."

The Doctor was compelled to surrender at discretion. The next waggon brought down a hundred-weight of liquorice ; and Tom recovered his health and the smiles of Anny Whistle.

Longbeard, Lord of London : A Romance. 3 vols.

The best thing we can say for this romance is, that we have read it out-and-out, and found the third volume the most exciting of the series. It partakes of the character of a historical romance, without being called one ; and gives the reader fresh and delightful glimpses of London, and its jolly Saxon burghers, in the olden time—a time so old as the Crusaders and Cœur de Lion. Longbeard, the hunch-backed hero, is, moreover, made a champion of the rights of the people—of the Saxons still smarting under the oppression of their Norman invaders ; and the book, from this cause, breathes the generous spirit of liberty. We must tell the author, as a secret, that after his rambling gleeman had done such gallant and chivalrous service to the high-minded heroine and her sister (the old tanner's daughters of London Bridge and Bermondsey,) we were disappointed at finding him not turn out Richard himself—executing justice, and taking revenge, in this disguise, upon his lovel Norman courtiers. We can recommend this romance as one which—if not of the rare few forming the highest order—perfectly fulfils the main purpose of such works ; namely, the entertainment of the reader, with a little instruction agreeably insinuated in the course of his amusement.

Popular Traditions of England. First Series.

Lancashire. By J. Roby, Esq. 3 vols. Colburn.

This work was published about ten years since, and very well received ; but the price—from the style of printing, and expensive illustrations—was so high, that the Traditions have been sealed books to the great body of the reading public. The work has been republished in a manner which makes it accessible to all who can contrive to obtain a sight of new works, either by purchase, or the happy contrivance of circulating libraries. In an ingenious introductory essay upon tradition in general, Mr. Roby says little or nothing of those specific traditions which he has worked up into tales, illustrative of the manners, usages, superstitions, and antiquities of the English. Yet each of them has some foundation in traditionary legends, or old chronicles, and county and family histories, and genealogies. Whatever scope may have been allowed to fancy in adorning the tale, the author always takes care to give that air of reality which attends a genuine "local habitation" and name. His historical, antiquarian, and topographical knowledge render the use of these effective in the construction of the tales.

Naomi; or, The Last Days of Jerusalem. By Mrs. J. B. Webb.

A very pleasing tale, which gives the reader—whether young or old—a lively idea of the manners of the Hebrew people; and of the Holy City, and Palestine. The scene is Jerusalem during the siege by the Emperor Titus; and some of the characters being Romans, and the early converts to Christianity among the noblest families of the Jews, the ingenious authoress finds abundant materials for giving her narrative both variety and interest.

The Priest of the Nile; a Tale of Ancient Egypt. By Mrs. Charles Tinsley. 2 vols.

This work, in the frame-work of a fiction, is intended to illustrate the Mystic History of the Egyptian Osiris. The work is only adapted to that "fit audience though few," which, in these times, is all it is likely to obtain.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Olla Podrida. By the Author of "Peter Simple," &c. &c.

Captain Marryat has here gathered together the most valuable of his odds and ends, scattered through the various periodical works with which he has been connected whether as editor or contributor. He commits them to the public in the confidence of obtaining all the justice which he has a right to expect. Here, moreover, appear all of those miscellaneous pieces which this fertile writer wishes posterity to regard as advisedly and deliberately published as his—all that he adopts and wishes to acknowledge as the fugitive offspring of his brain. A "Diary on the Continent," originally published in one of the magazines as the Diary of a Blast, occupies a considerable space in the three volumes. With many superfluities, it displays much of the humour, shrewdness, and plain direct off-hand good sense, which characterize all Captain Marryat's writings. No one better understands the obvious weak points of human nature, and especially those of the nature of John Bull. But, unfortunately, Captain Marryat's prejudices spring from the same root with his good-sense, and they are equally vigorous in their growth. We would advise English people about to visit the Continent, to enlighten their ignorance, and qualify their enthusiasm, or, haply, their personal and national conceit, by a previous perusal of Captain Marryat's remarks in this diary.

Captain Marryat has attempted a drama of the tragicomic kind; and he has succeeded in clever satirical directions for the composition of a fashionable novel, and a modern book of travels. "Set a thief to catch a thief," does not altogether apply here; though the author does know a trifle or two of the mysteries of modern book-making.

The Seer, or Commonplaces Refreshed. Part I.

Under this quaint title, Mr. Moxon has published a number of those stray Essays of Leigh Hunt, which have hitherto been scattered through the periodicals of the day. For our own parts, our memories require no refreshing. The amiable and delightful fireside philosophy of "Breakfasts," and that genial criticism of the elder poets, in which Mr. Hunt, like a skilful wine-merchant, propitiates our taste and judgment, by giving us a liberal trial-sip, are matters not easily forgotten. And yet, it is desirable to have them collected and at hand, were it only to supply the "Book," which of itself goes far to render the "Breakfast," or the "Window," or even "Sunday in London," a source of enjoyment and instruction.

The Parlour Table-Book.

This is a volume of short extracts, from the best English writers; and generally those of a grave and reflective cast. It is very handsomely printed and done up, and forms altogether an elegant and suggestive collection of aphorism, reasoning, and description. The compiler has not overlooked a certain Mr. Wilmott, with whose works we were not before acquainted; though the specimens given justify, in his case, a dispensation from a self-denying ordinance, and also Mr. Wilmott's claim to appear in the best literary company—though perhaps not quite so often.

Family Prayers for every Morning and Evening of the Year. By John Morison, D.D.

In this manual of family devotion, Dr. Morison has drawn from every pure and approved source within his reach. He has studied brevity, rightly considering short prayers the safer extreme in conducting family worship. He has endeavoured to frame the work in that catholic spirit which may render it acceptable to all sects and denominations, "writing neither as a Churchman nor a Dissenter, but as a Christian," and in a style simple, concise, and scriptural. Seven hundred and fifty-eight prayers, though each is limited to a single page, (of goodly dimensions,) form a large and rather imposing volume, (in size and appearance resembling a handsome royal Family Bible,) and one which is well worth the attention of those requiring such a help.

The Grammar of Botany. By G. Francis.

This gentleman, whose former botanical work, "The Little English Flora," we lately had occasion to notice with high praise, has composed this Grammar with a view to cheapness, simplicity, and readableness, and the desire of obviating the objections which some persons—more nice certainly than really delicate—have made to the study of botany in schools, because reference is made to the sexual distinctions of plants. The work is remarkable for good arrangement, and the consequent clearness of its details. It is very neatly and copiously illustrated, and altogether forms a work highly deserving of commendation as an easy and popular introduction to botany.

Persecution of Christian Converts in Madagascar.

The Rev. Mr. Ellis' "History of Madagascar," recently published, laid before the public the persecution to which, after the death of King Radama, his queen, who usurped the throne, and her new counsellors subjected the native Christians. The mission schools were dispersed; the missionaries, and indeed all the English residents were ill-treated; and a vigorous attempt was made by the queen to eradicate Christianity from her dominions, and by persuasion, or punishment if necessary, to restore her subjects to the faith of their ancestors. But many of the converts have held fast by their profession, and several have suffered martyrdom. Some of the persecuted Christians escaped to the Mauritius, and are now in Great Britain. The profits of the volume which narrates their sufferings are to be devoted to their benefit. We therefore heartily wish for its success.

Just and Earnest; a Series of Essays.

These brief Essays are of the character of those which, in a light vein, adorn periodical literature. They display just thinking and lively talents.

The Comic Songster: a Collection of Scotch, English, and Irish Comic Songs. Glasgow.

Some merry and mirth-loving soul appears, for years back, to have been keeping a sharp look-out for whatever might serve the purpose of shaking the sides; and, considering the admitted difficulty, in this ticklish department of literature, of separating "one man's meat from another man's poison"—the wheat from the chaff—he has picked up a great deal. Altogether, there is a wonderfully rich, if not rare collection. We are glad to find that those good old ditties, that have stood the test of many a merry Christmas, are duly prized.

The Forester's Offering. By Spencer Hall, a native of Sherwood Forest.

This is a very pleasing little book, descriptive of forest scenery; of the days of Robin Hood and his merry men; and of many charming woodland and rural rambles, enjoyed by the author and his friends. And surely his work is not less deserving of attention that it is the production of the leisure hours of an intelligent and tasteful artisan.

The Dictionary of Mottos.

This is a collection of the mottos assumed by the nobility and gentry, corporations, towns, &c. &c., selected from the book of Family Crests, and is a curiosity in its way.

Baronetage of the British Empire, for 1841.

We have here a complete list of the baronets of the United Kingdom; and a history of the Order, with its rights and privileges.

Gibson's Etymological Geography.

This little work is meant to be supplementary to elementary geographical works; and a useful supplement it forms—giving, if not the exact meaning of every name of a place, town, river, &c., at least a clew to the meaning. Thus, when the pupil learns that Aber signifies the Mouth or Embouchure of a River, or a Roadstead, he also knows what Aberdeen, Aberbrothwick, Aberconway, &c., signifies. And, in like manner, the various prefixes and postfixes being explained, the names of places ranged under them are easily understood. We are somewhat surprised to find the places with postfixes—as bad, bie, borugh, bourn, den, cole, ford, &c. &c.—more numerous than those of which the names are formed by prefixes.

Maunder's Scientific and Literary Treasury.

We have, in this portly, or Dutch-built volume, as much of a popular Encyclopedia as it is well possible to compress into the space; and really an immense fund of useful information. The type, though small, is sharp and clear.

JUVENILE BOOKS.

Bible Stories. By G. M. Bussey.

A Lilliputian quarto—the favourite size for the Juvenile Library—is illustrated with neat cuts from those designs of Martin and Westall, of the Scriptural subjects of these artists with which the public is already well acquainted. The possession of the book will make the little folks too proud, if its lessons do not counteract the propensity.

The Orphan; or, the True Principles of Religious Education Illustrated.

A pleasing little juvenile story, intermingling slight sketches of Natural History with the inculcation of benevolent feelings.

Fables and Proverbs for Children. Edited by G. M. Bussey.

We have here a selection of the best Fables of every age and country, couched in language calculated to be easily understood by children, and to interest them. The moral, instead of being left to be guessed at, or lightly told, is compressed in a text of Scripture, a Proverb, or brief sentence from some good author. The little volume is neatly illustrated.

DRAMAS.

EVA; or, THE ERROR: A Play, in Five Acts. By Lady Emmeline Stuart Wortley.

THE LOVERS: A Play in Five Acts. By M. Healy, Esq.

THOMAS A BECKET: A Play in Five Acts. By John Garwood.

SERIAL WORKS.

THE POPULAR CYCLOPEDIA; or, CONVERSATIONS LEXICON. [This valuable work is completed by the publication of a Fifty-sixth Part; which forms the conclusion of the Supplement.]

THE DEVIL ON TWO STICKS. Part VIII.

STANDARD AMERICAN LITERATURE.—LECTURES TO YOUNG MEN. By George W. Burnap; and SCENES IN LIFE. By Mrs. Ellet.

WORKS OF JOSEPHUS. Part X.

SHAKESPEARE ILLUSTRATED. Part XX.

HISTORY OF NAPOLEON (Tyas.) Part XXIII.

YARREL'S BRITISH BIRDS. Parts XX. and XXI. [These Parts of this charming work treat of the Plovers, and their congeners; and of Bitterns, *Heron*s, &c. &c. The plates are as beautiful as ever.]

HISTORY OF BRITISH STAR-FISHES.—Part III.: HISTORY OF THE ANIMAL KINGDOM. By Thomas Rymer Jones, F.Z.S. Part XIII.

NUCES PHILOSOPHICÆ; or, THE PHILOSOPHY OF THINGS; as developed in the study of the Philosophy of Words. By Edward Johnson, Esq. Part I. [This is an attempt to popularize the study of intellectual philosophy.]

LEGENDS OF LANCASHIRE.—Part I. THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE BATTLE OF WIGAN LANE. [We fear this little work is a great deal too high-priced for the present state of the literary market.]

MEMORIALS OF CAMBRIDGE. By Le Keux. Part IX.

HISTORY OF PRINTING. Part IX.

PAMPHLETS.

MEHEMET ALI, LORD PALMERSTON, RUSSIA, and FRANCE. By William Cargill, Esq. [A clever pamphlet, by a writer deplorably affected with the Russo-phobia.]

LETTERS ON THE CURRENCY; ADDRESSED TO CHARLES WOOD, Esq. M.P. By William Leatham, Banker, Wakefield, Yorkshire. [We recommend this able pamphlet to all who wish to arrive at the true principles of this most vexed and complicated question.]

REPORT of the DIRECTORS of the LIVERPOOL MECHANICS' INSTITUTION, for 1840.

ILLUSTRATIONS of the PRACTICAL OPERATION of the SCOTTISH SYSTEM of MANAGEMENT of the POOR. By W. P. Alison, M.D. [The papers read by Dr. Alison, before the Statistical Section of the British Association at Glasgow, last autumn, were subsequently published in the Quarterly Journal of the London Statistical Society; and have since appeared as a separate pamphlet. They confirm, by a great amount of additional testimony, whatever has been alleged by the philanthropic Dr. Alison, and others, of the unsuspected extent of actual destitution which prevails, both in the towns and among the rural communities of Scotland; and thus display the total inadequacy of the present system of Poor-laws.]

FINE ARTS.

Nichol's Cities and Towns of Scotland Illustrated.

Part I. Aberdeen.

Independently of its masterly execution, the object of this work must recommend it to every patriotic native of Scotland; but especially to those who have a taste for the Fine Arts. But the intrinsic merits of this series of views form the best recommendation of a work which is fully entitled to the name of National. The views are in tinted lithography, in the style of the late works of Roberts, Stanfield, and Harding: they are of ample dimensions—twenty-two inches by fifteen; printed on good drawing-paper; and neatly done up in cloth boards.

The First Part is the City of Aberdeen—a place which furnishes many admirable pictorial subjects; and, in the several views, a highly promising specimen of this spirited undertaking. Both the architectural and scenic views possess the merit rare in such delineations, of combining fidelity and accuracy with effect. The work is to appear in Quarterly Parts; and Perth, Glasgow, Paisley, and Dumfries, are announced as in a state of forwardness. An accompanying sheet is filled with plans, topographical details, &c. &c. We are not sure that we like two views on the same sheet, as is done in some instances, though it should be the better a bargain as to the number of plates. It is worthy of notice, as a symptom of the late pictorial enterprise of the Scottish publishers, that this fine work issues from Montrose.

HEATH'S WAVERLEY GALLERY, Part IX., contains—Isabella Vere in the Black Dwarf; Poor Madge Wildfire, beautiful, and wild enough; and the demure and pretty Alice Bridgenorth. Without being remarkable for excellence, the plates are all good, and the portraits much more in consonance with the idea of the persons represented, than is sometimes the case in similar works.

THE SCOTT MONUMENT.—[A fine engraving of the Monument intended to be erected in Edinburgh to the Memory of Sir Walter Scott has been published by Adam and Charles Black. It is upon a large scale, and makes a handsome picture, worthy of becoming a household monument with the admirers of Scott.]

POSTSCRIPT—WALSALL ELECTION.

LIMITED as is our space, we cannot allow the occasion to elapse, without one word expressive of hearty satisfaction at the decided movement of the Anti-Corn-Law League. From the attitude the League has assumed, whatever may be the immediate result of the election—and we anticipate triumph—the most beneficial consequences must arise. The Chartists and working classes will now be convinced that the members of the League are in earnest in the pursuit of that great object, which has been misrepresented as a trick of the middle classes to divert the people from those fundamental reforms more necessary to their well-being; and those of the Ministry, who are capable of serious reflection, must now believe that something more is required to satisfy the abolitionists than the hocus-pocus of Open Questions. A proof like this was wanted to carry conviction both to that insensible government, who despatched the unlucky young gentleman, at such a crisis, to such a constituency, and to those misled persons,—on this point grossly misled,—who imagine that they have an interest opposed to that of the Corn-Law abolitionists. In the present critically balanced state of factions and votes in Parliament, the Ministerial prints are, of course, furious at any step which may endanger the places of their patrons;—security in office, “keeping in the Whigs,” being the Alpha and Omega of their desire for the general weal. The real Reformers, also, would, in this particular instance, be doubly grieved and disappointed if the Tory candidate was returned; yet, even that calamity were tolerable, under the conviction of the advantages that must result from the step advisedly taken at Walsall, and which will be repeated as often as a similar crisis arises. Did the Whigs, when they sent down that raw young gentleman, believe that the Anti-Corn-Law Association was not sincere in the declarations put forth, that, with them, the repeal of the bread-tax was to be the testing question of every candidate? In these circumstances, the appearance of Mr. Littleton at Walsall looked like premeditated defiance and insult. It was Lord Melbourne's speeches against repeal put into action; and upon every ground of principle, expediency, and consistency, challenged opposition the most decided, let the consequences be what they might. The lesson which this energetic line of conduct has taught, will make the Whigs more cautious how they put forth a candidate—forwarded per order—whose only claim is aristocratic connexion and Treasury influence. It is of those who sent him that Mr. Littleton has to complain, and not of the deputation of the League, who only performed a duty to which the League was deliberately pledged, as the Government well knew. But both the Ministry and their tools have been so long accustomed to see every national object give way to “keeping in the Whigs,” that they have come to believe that the same game was to be played for ever, in despite of every assurance put forth to the contrary. The Liberal party, and even many members of the League, have, like the Dissenters, given them but too much cause for this false security. This is at an end, so far, at least, as regards Cheap Bread and Free Trade; and this is no mean gain to the popular cause: while the utmost that is hazarded is one vote, which may be subtracted from the small Ministerial majority.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

MARCH, 1841.

THE PRESENT STATE OF PARTIES.

THE present state of political parties is a subject of important and curious speculation; yet to the public (however serious the inquiry may be to the parties themselves,) perhaps more curious than important, because, no matter which of the existing political sections becomes dominant in the House of Commons, the general tendency of their scheme of government must be in accordance with the public feeling. That public feeling is now of a very different description from the spirit prevailing in the times of the old Tory domination. Improvement, however slow, has at length told upon the people: much, indeed, remains to be accomplished in the work of public instruction; but still much has been done; and the immediate effect of this change will be felt by the Tory party on their advent to power. Their acts must be shaped to suit, in some degree, the novel exigency of the times. Tories they may be, in name; but the old-fashioned Tory, in deed, they will be no longer. Still, in the changes of the coming time, even as regards the situation of parties, there is much to interest all, though not participant in the strife and its immediate consequences. A vast change will follow the change in our political rulers. We, who are ever sanguine in our hopes for mankind, believe that much of good is destined to result from the alterations which we fancy we can foresee; so that the future, to us, does not seem fraught with that misery which by many is anticipated.

But what are these changes?—What are their causes—what their effects? An answer to these inquiries does not seem difficult, and may be useful.

The present administration is verging to its fall. Before this paper is published it may have ceased to exist. Every parliamentary election pares down the small majority by which its frail existence has, for the two last sessions, been maintained; and soon the rampant Tories, eager for place as well as power, will compel their leaders to take office; and the Whig administration will have ceased to exist. "Here, then, we see," some sentimental admirer of Whig politics will exclaim, "here is another instance of popular fickleness and ingratitude. Ten years since, these now discarded Ministers were carried into office on the people's shoulders, in defiance of the aristocracy, and the well-known wishes of the then sovereign. Now, so short-lived is public favour—so changeable is the public taste, these same men drop out of office —no one cares how—no one cares when. Alas! how frail is the tenure by which popularity is held." Such, doubtless, will be the sort of moral, which, by many a disappointed politician, will be drawn from the history of the Whig administration. To us a very different conclusion presents itself. Not looking solely to the popularity of the Whigs at one period, and the neglect which now attends them, but following them in their acts, from the time of their coming into power down to the present moment, we can well understand why they have fallen in public estimation; and we are prepared to prove, at the proper season, that if change is to be laid as a charge at any one's door, it must not be put down at that of the people; that the people have not swerved, but that the Whigs have forgotten their professions; that the people have not been fickle, but that the Whigs have proved untrue.

When, in obedience to the declared popular will, the Whigs, in 1830, were permitted to assume power, the people had faith in their professions. These professions are to be found in the speeches and conduct of the great Whig party from 1807 down to the very period of their coming into power. A history of this party, during this long trial of opposition, would prove an instructive narrative for all coming time; and if a contrast were made between their language before and after their taking office, the history would prove not merely instructive, but amusing. It is the fashion of the present day to rail at the extreme opinions, the violent language, the headstrong violence of some of the Radical leaders, who, from time to time, appear as opponents of the Ministry. Let any one peruse the debates of the times of which we have been speaking; let any one go a little farther back, and become acquainted with the language and principles of Mr. Fox, the great Whig leader, he who is the very type of the whole party, and he will quickly perceive that the language of these modern days is gentleness itself as compared with the outpourings of ancient Whig eloquence; and, farther, he will not be long in discovering how the popular goodwill was obtained; and why, viz. with what hopes the people thrust the Whigs into office. Though the declarations of the Whigs since 1807, and of Mr. Fox before that time, never went to the length of demanding anything like a thoroughly reformed House of Commons; yet they were never tired of affirming that they, as a party, were opposed to all the evil deeds, and evil principles of the Tories in power. They declared that if such a change were made as they desired, viz. 1st, a change in the administration, substituting themselves for their Tory opponents; 2d, a reform of the House of Commons, such as they would propose; why, then England would see what a good and virtuous government really was. By constantly repeating these assertions, by bitterly, violently, criticising all the evil acts of the then ministers, — by eloquent denunciations of the Tory bad deeds, and equally eloquent descriptions of their own good intentions, they persuaded the people, at length, to believe in their good faith. The Whigs were substituted for the Tories; the Whig reform of the House of Commons was effected; and, in 1833, on the meeting of the first reformed parliament, began the trial of Whig professions. The people say that these professions, have not been fulfilled,—that the magnificent promises made, have been openly, shamelessly, violated,—that the machine of government, as proposed and made by the Whigs, has not produced the benefits foretold,—that the substitution of the Whigs for the Tories has not worked the miracles they were taught to expect,—that all the old evils, of which the Whigs so loudly complained, still exist; and, that principles as well as professions have been forgotten. Thinking thus, (and we are not now going over the ground to prove the people right, but are merely accounting for the present unpopularity of the once popular Whigs,)—thinking thus, the people have withdrawn their favour from the Whig party; and surely, if the facts be as is commonly said, no one can properly accuse the people of fickleness and ingratitude. The change is not in them, but in those who have deceived them.

The people having withdrawn their favour, the inevitable result has followed,—inevitable, we say, because of the nature of the government under which we live. The Whigs, professing liberal opinions, can only be kept in office, in the existing condition of our Legislature, by keeping the people in a state of high excitement. The not seeing this, has been the great political error of the Whig party. Suppose them to have acted up to all their professions; suppose them to have exhibited the spectacle long desired, but never yet seen by the people of this country, of a frugal, just, and wise government; the time must have arrived at which the Whigs, by the mere force of our institutions, would have been pushed from office. No people can be kept long in a state of high excitement—neither is it right that they should be so. Things recurring to their ordinary state, the common every-day principles of action would have come into play. The Whigs, by breaking faith, have only brought about this result sooner than it otherwise would have happened. They have made the people apathetic. The constituencies, therefore, are now exposed to all the common and every-day motives, and influences. The result has been just what was long ago foretold, when the Whigs were professing patriots out of office. The House of Commons, as now chosen, must be an aristocratic assembly. From time to time excitement may arise in the great body of the people, and, for a period, the aristocratic predominance yields;—then a liberal government may be formed and maintained for a time. But so soon as the excitement dies away, the aristocratic power is manifest at every election; day by day the character of the House of Commons is changed, and the natural representatives of an aristocratic government take their places on the Treasury benches. This observation is in no degree opposed to the remarks with which our paper commences. Although the Tories come into office, they must govern under the correction of the public opinion. A despotism amid a highly instructed people is not the same sort of government as a despotism in the midst of a barbarous one. The people of this country have, in the present century, greatly changed; and their government, no matter what may be its form, must change likewise. Aristocratic it still is, and in so far as it is aristocratic it is mischievous. But this dominion, in obedience to the dictates of the time in which we live, will prove less hurtful than heretofore. It is this circumstance, among so many others, that makes every well-wisher to mankind anxious for the general instruction of the people. A good government with an ignorant people is impossible; a bad government, with a highly instructed nation, is equally so. The slow but sure reformer of every government is he who imparts instruction to mankind.

The Reform Act is, then, now working in what may be called its natural condition, and producing its natural results. It is doing so sooner than it otherwise would, owing to the conduct of the present administration. Still, the present is that condition which will generally prevail. The Whigs are going out of office, for the excitement is gone which brought them into power; and the Aristocracy are about to resume the position to which they are destined by the present constitution of the House of Commons. That this which we have called the natural result of our institutions, will satisfy the nation is what we do not believe. The moderated mischief of the Tories will soon again anger and excite them; and the natural result of that excitement will again be seen. But have the Whigs, as a party, looked forward to those times? has any one of them endeavoured, for himself, to ascertain the character of the crisis that will then come, and of the part which the leaders of the next move will be forced to play? We think not. The consequences of such neglect of the future are nevertheless all important to the Whigs as a party.

Doubtless many of them—nay, perhaps all of them—who have thought about the matter, believe that the next move will be like the last, and that their position will then be as it was in 1830; that, sooner or later, the change, so much desired by them, must come about; that they, by denunciations after the old fashion, will hasten it; that, foremost in the van of opposition, they must be the stuff of which a new ministry is to be made. Looking to the past as the type of the future, they are prepared for their old character of an opposition, with the firm belief that the time of their probation will not again, as before, extend to nearly a quarter of a century. Like gamblers who have lost a throw, they will throw again, relying on the established chances of the game. The more sagacious of them are apparently looking forward to this change. There are some symptoms which look like preparing the ground for making a stand in opposition. The way in which these longer-sighted partisans reason with themselves, may be supposed to be as follows:—

“The ministerial majority is gone. We are, in reality, out. The great inquiry is, For how long shall we be out? This will greatly depend upon the manner of our exit. If we simply expire like a flickering lamp, stinking in all men's nostrils, then the day of our return will, indeed, be a distant one; but if we go out with a great blaze—if we die flamingly liberal—then we shall excite sympathy; and, what is still more important, we shall have prepared subjects for liberal eloquence. Spite of the most careful preparations, our game will be a difficult one; for we have cut the ground from under ourselves on many important subjects. In the old times, Economy was a topic of unflinching use; it was a commonplace on which everybody might display himself. That is now gone. There is, however, this one consolation: The Radicals, who will join us in opposition, may occupy this ground. They have always talked economy: in fact, they have never been in office; so it was all natural and proper that they should do so. But, after what we have done as ministers, we can have no pretext for our old abuse of our old opponents on this head. War, too, used to be a favourite subject with us; in fact, peace was our war-cry, which we used to raise on every occasion. But that topic, if not absolutely destroyed, is greatly narrowed. We have been fighting with everybody with whom it was possible to pick a quarrel; and have tried hard to commence a war with France, and America also. For the present, we have failed; but that was not our fault. On the Corn Laws, also, and sundry other matters, our sayings and doings have been, at the best, but equivocal; so that our ancient language respecting them can hardly be renewed. There are, however, some good subjects still left us. Ireland must be properly prepared. The Dissenters of England may still be made to hope something from us; and what with the Dissenters in England, and Catholics in Ireland, added to such Radicals as will still be our friends, much may yet be done.”

But, in spite of these expectations, the present is a trying moment for the Whig party. On their going out of power, a large section of them will at once, in obedience to the dictates of their condition as a portion of the aristocracy, go over to the Tories. Such of their friends as have held by them—honestly believing in their past professions and present promises—may still adhere to them; but that great section of the Liberals who have lost faith in them—whose political opinions have been changed by the experience of the Whig failure—will no longer look to the Whigs as leaders—will no longer believe their political creed the true one; but will seek a new faith, and look for other guides. However unpalatable may be the consequence, it comes of necessity; the Whigs must cease to exist as a party, or they must prepare to join the Radical body: honestly confessing that the reform which they effected was not sufficient to attain the end proposed; and that a still farther and far more searching change is required in the constitution of the House of Commons. Such a declaration will unite them to the great liberal party on whom will devolve the duty of fighting the good fight for the people. So that, in either case, the Whigs, on going out of office, will, in reality, cease to have any existence as a separate political party. A new division will take place; and to this new division, destined, we believe, to have a far more important influence upon the happiness of the people of this country than any which has been exercised by Whigs or Tories, we now turn, and proceed to inquire into the consequences that will probably result from the coming changes among political parties.

The situation of the Tory party, spite of their recent triumph, will be found by their leaders one of extraordinary difficulty. At the present moment, while we now are writing, the leaders of this great faction,—more sagacious and more responsible than the hungry herd who are clamouring for place as well as power,—are hanging back, afraid of achieving the victory within their very grasp. It is said that Sir Robert Peel has, for the purpose of checking the headlong course of his friends, endeavoured to stay their hands from giving the death-blow to their opponents, by declaring that every week, during which the Whigs now retain office, will retard their return to it by six months. “Let them remain in a little longer,” he is reported to have said, “let them damage themselves yet more, (as if that were possible!) and our hold of office will be permanent.” This language is but a pretext. The true reason for Sir Robert's shyness, is his fear of his own friends. He feels, and wishes to obey the reigning public opinion; he knows that the old Tory fashion of misrule is incompatible with that opinion; he will be responsible, while his followers, unscrupulous, because they are both ignorant and sheltered by his responsibility, are for returning to office with the old Tory banners flying, and carrying into full effect all the principles and practices of bygone times. The High Church party in England, the Orange party in Ireland, are for no surrender, no compromise: they are for the spirit and the very letter of the old Tory law. Already, by their furious bigotry, they have given their wary leader infinite vexation and trouble: and he fears, with such unruly forces, to face the spirit of the times. He, wise in his generation, wishes to compromise,—to shape his course to suit the prevailing opinion; but many of his followers, still remembering the Catholic Relief Bill, are jealous of his liberality,—are suspicious and anxious to be relieved from his guidance. In the present nearly balanced condition of parties in the House of Commons, they cannot yet do without him; though there are many who have already given unequivocal symptoms of impatience under his rule, showing that they would gladly hail the appearance of a more bold and reckless leader. This leader has not yet been found; neither will he, while the Duke of Wellington lives (though, indeed, Lord Stanley made a small attempt upon the leadership last year.) Still it remains to be determined, whether any one, who has the knowledge and capacity requisite for the leadership, will be found rash enough to brave public opinion, by carrying into full operation the old Tory doctrines, after the old Tory fashion. The practical sagacity of the Tory party will, we think, prevent so dangerous an experiment. The leaders of the party, and the great body of the party itself, have everything to lose, nothing to gain, by change. The present Ministry, in their present condition, can do them no harm, because they can do the public no good. Sir R. Peel is the real leader of the House of Commons, and actually governs the country without the responsibility of office. The Duke of Wellington, full of honours and of years, has no appetite for place. They who form the chief strength of the party, never hope for it. All this, we know, is exceedingly painful to that section who seek office not for party, but personal ends,—men who seek place, because place brings salary. It is these men who are so fond of asserting—"We don't want a leader who has five-and-twenty thousand a-year." They are tired of the oft-repeated exhortation of "Bide your time." Their answer is—"While the grass grows, the steed starves." But though they grumble, yet do they obey; and Sir R. Peel is allowed to play his game of delay. He evidently hopes to take office upon a species of compulsion. The public, he expects, weary of the present inaction, will turn their eyes to him as the sole means of obtaining an efficient, because strong Administration. Then, when the Whigs have dropped out of office, gone not because they have been turned out, but because they could not stay, he believes that he may have an obedient party, and a favourable House of Commons,—an obedient party, because of the favourable House. Then he hopes to be able to curb the now restless and obstreperous Orangemen of Ireland, and the fanatical High Churchmen on this side of the water. Keeping these in order, he will be able to appear before the world as an enlightened statesman—one who, though not a wild and reckless innovator, desirous of change for the sake of change, is yet willing to amend what has been proved to be faulty; taking advantage of all real experience; cautiously adopting such specific improvements as the changing times require, yet carefully preserving the principles and the very framework of the Constitution. He will, indeed, touch no real abuse, effect no substantial reform; but he will remove unsightly deformities, will be what is called a practical statesman; that is, a man who seeks little ends by little means; making indeed a vast parade of his improvements; pretending always to advance, yet, spite of all his vain-glorious show, remaining ever in the same place: much after the fashion of those horses which the jockies describe as cantering for an hour on a sixpence. Nevertheless, by this pretence of what he will call rational improvement, he hopes to satisfy the nation and his party: the one by nominal change; the latter by retaining in substance every lucrative abuse. He will, however, in spite of all his caution, find among his followers—that class of persons, so well known to all party men, who are called impracticables—persons who, holding opinions, openly avow and honestly act up to them. These will scout his pretended liberality, will look upon him as an enemy in disguise, and be constantly putting his power into jeopardy, by endeavouring to force him into the path of the old Tory politics. The last few days have given us a specimen of what he will have as a minister to encounter. Some time since, as all the world knows, Sir Robert delivered a discourse at Tamworth, upon the opening of a reading-room in that town. The doctrines he put forth were such as every liberal man of the present day adopts and advances. He doubtless hoped to gain, and has gained, a world of credit with the public at large for his rational and tolerant opinions; but, with his own party, the effect has been very different. The Times, which, for some time past, has been putting out feelers to learn how far the Tory public will go against their cautious leader, has, with great dexterity, pounced upon these liberal declarations of the Conservative statesman. Tolerance is, with The Times, the offspring of unbelief. Tolerance and indifference are two words for the same thing. They, therefore, argue that the tolerant spirit evinced by Sir Robert Peel bodes no good to the church and true religion; thus endeavouring to excite suspicion among the church party, and creating a set off to the gain with the public generally: Upon this rock he (Sir Robert) is destined some day to be wrecked. The time for this middle-man is fast disappearing. Both the aristocratic and democratic party are beginning to feel and to say, "He who is not for us is against us." The aristocratic party, however, will be the losers by adopting this open straightforward policy. He who properly understands their present position and interests will do his utmost to keep off the day on which the two principles of government come fairly and palpably into direct opposition. In that contest, whenever it may happen, the aristocracy will be worsted. Their proper business is to put off the evil hour. No one has shown more clearly than the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel have done, that he clearly perceives and thoroughly appreciates this danger. The conviction of this truth has made the Duke of Wellington more than once declare, that he was well pleased to keep the present ministry in office. For the interests of the aristocracy considered as an aristocracy, the Whig ministry is the true Conservative ministry. It is the safest modification of aristocratic rule; because it has the show and semblance of liberality. The Whigs stand between two hostile principles; let them be out of the way, and these two principles will come into collision. The mere party man, the politician seeking place because of the profits, is careless of the larger interest of the class under whose banner he fights. He is a Tory because he believes

Toryism is the most profitable opinion for himself ; and not because he belongs to the aristocracy, and has a share in their interests as an aristocracy. He, therefore, wants the Whigs excluded, because he wants the places which they fill. He is careless of the good they do to the aristocratic class and dominion, but sees only the mischief they create to himself, by keeping him from place. Thus, while the Duke of Wellington is well pleased with Lord Melbourne, and declares that he is quite Conservative, (for that's the phrase,) quite Conservative enough for him ; every hungry whipster who calls himself a Tory, and hopes to obtain a place, is almost insane with rage at his own exclusion, and gives vent to his passion in the most unmeasured abuse of the Whigs and their leaders.

In the great Tory party then, as it now exists, we can distinguish three distinct classes of politicians : First, there are the worldly wise and sagacious members of the aristocracy, who call themselves Tories ; secondly, there are the trading politicians, who bear the same name ; and, thirdly, there are the honest, zealous, but bigoted, church party in England, and the furious orange party in Ireland. At present, all these are held together, nominally, by their opposition to the Whigs ; but the first class are checking and keeping back the other two—these two being furious in their desire to exclude the Whigs ; the second, viz., the trading politicians, from sheer vulgar money interests ; the third, viz., the church party in England, chiefly from principle—in Ireland, from both combined, though there the money interest is uppermost, even with the church party. Such is the game played now while the Tory party are in opposition. So soon as they come into power, the first and second classes will act together ; and for the purpose, the one of maintaining their exclusive privileges, the other of maintaining their places—they will both profess a show of bastard liberality ; while the third class, shocked at this departure from principle, and, as far as the orangemen of Ireland are concerned, from profit also, will raise an outcry, and be as angry with Sir Robert Peel, as premier, as they are now with Lord Melbourne. This last fierce set of partisans have long kept, and do still keep, Sir Robert Peel out of office. He will find, notwithstanding all his care and prudent forethought, that they are destined a second time to exclude him from it.

Before we leave the consideration of the heterogeneous elements, which compose the Tory party, it is necessary to direct attention more particularly towards the present position, and future prospects, of the orange party of Ireland. If the English aristocracy had to maintain their exclusive dominion, such as it now exists in England, alone, their task would be a far easier one, and their rule would be for a much longer term, than now, when they have not merely to fight their own battle, but to sustain that great offshoot of their dominion which occupies and oppresses Ireland. The aristocracy are sensible of this danger—so are the orangemen themselves ; and these latter feel, that all Sir Robert Peel's delays have for their object, the getting rid of their assistance, in order that he may really, in cant phrase, throw them overboard. The Church of Ireland cannot remain long in its present condition. In England, we bear with the Established Church, because it is, in fact, the church of the great majority of the people : in Ireland it is not so. The practical oppression shocks and angers the people as much as the theoretic principle revolts their reason. Sir Robert Peel feels this : he knows, that he will, of necessity, be compelled to consent to some modification of that great ecclesiastical enormity. And the orange party may depend upon it, that the sagacious, wary, prudent Sir Robert is preparing to get rid of, and sacrifice, these his now too energetic and thick-and-thin supporters.

We have but a small space to devote to the consideration of the next portion—the other half of the new division of future politicians, viz., the new LIBERAL PARTY.* Their hopes, views, principles, require a careful, and would well repay, an elaborate exposition. This, at the present moment, we cannot attempt, but must reserve it for a future occasion. A few words may yet serve to express what hereafter may be more fully explained. The contest of the future will not be between sections of the aristocracy—Whigs and Tories ; but between those who support, no matter whether from interest or conscientious principle, an aristocratic dominion, and those who seek to create a government which shall be really responsible to the whole community—a democratic government, one which, actually representing, is, in fact, and not merely in name, responsible to the whole nation. This contest of principles will, in our present state of cultivation, be decided by reasoning, and not by force—by argument and discussion, not by fighting—in peace, not in war. Though the nation be convinced of the evils of aristocratic rule, the thinkers, they who, in the long run, govern the whole people, have not yet agreed upon the best means of bringing into action the great democratic principle of government. Various schemes—various means—to this end, are proposed, and are now being discussed. As the public mind becomes enlightened and settled, the question will approach its settlement also. When the nation is ripe for change, and demands the specific reform which it desires, it cannot be refused ; and our next great reform will be as quietly effected as our last. One word more, and, for the present, we have done. We entreat all those, who are agreed upon the mischiefs of our present system, but who are not agreed as to the remedy, to bear with and be tolerant of the opinions and feelings of one another—to remember, that heat and ill-will cannot forward the purpose they have in view—that abuse never made converts—and that truth is best served by candid and calm inquiry and exposition. We must agree to differ ; in the full persuasion, that at length the great truth we seek will be discovered, and all our differences so adjusted, that we shall agree to demand the one and the same means of redress.

* Of the once useful Radical party in the House of Commons, not a trace now remains ; so that, in any consideration of the existing state of parties, it is no longer necessary to speak of them.

VIOLET HAMILTON; OR, THE TALENTED FAMILY.

CHAPTER XVII.

To this day, and probably for as long as the affair shall be discussed—whether in the reading-room, when the gas-lights “o’ long October nights look rousingly,” or on “the pavement” on sunny summer noons—the appearance, and still more the abrupt disappearance, of that wandering star, who, under the appellation of Frederick Adolphus Fitzwagram, had, like some brilliant, fitful meteor, irradiated the dramatic heaven of the ancient northern town which formed the scene of our last chapter—will remain a mystery and a puzzle.

His especial patrons persisted in affirming, that the variously and richly-gifted Fitzwagram, whose private sources of court, fashionable, and political intelligence, were so extraordinary, must have been an errant nobleman of no ordinary consideration; while, on the other hand, Jem Winkin, the head waiter of the Crown and Mitre, had his own reasons for suspecting that the “play-actor gentleman, with the cast of the eye, and wry nose, as bolted by the Liverpool heavy coach,” had carried off, without leave asked or obtained, Mr. Herbert’s cloak and travelling-cap; as well as forgotten to pay his landlady 9s. 4d., being three weeks’ rent, coal, and candle; besides 1s. 10d. for pork-chops, two pots of beer, and the washing of a pink striped fancy shirt: though the lodger had left goods to the estimated value of 3s. 6d.; being the shirt aforesaid, an embroidered pale-blue faded satin waistcoat—which, however, the manager afterwards claimed as one of the properties of Don Felix—a dagger without the hilt, a foil ditto, half a pair of gauntlets, and a well-worn hair-brush. Mr. Fitzwagram’s personal friend, the draper, probably for his own sake, hushed up the landlady’s clamours, by paying her off at the rate of 10s. in the pound; and as Mr. Herbert said nothing about the cloak and cap—a circumstance which confirmed the popular belief of Fitzwagram’s being some very great personage, however disguised—and had peremptorily stopped the inquiries of his servant, Jem Winkin, for the credit of the house, was also dumb.

Mr. Herbert might be supposed otherwise occupied; for, before that gentleman left his room next morning, a messenger, by express, brought him a letter, upon the receipt of which he instantly ordered his carriage, and a pair of additional horses.

In carrying up the tray of coffee, which Mr. Herbert ordered for his lady, to the bed-chamber, Hannah White had been intercepted by that gentleman; who, as Amy Dobson, a younger maid, five minutes afterwards, whispered Jem Winkin in the bar, “gave her a piece of money,” and whispered in her ear, “better say no more about it, my dear; the past cannot be recalled: here you are in a reputable station; why risk your own good name, or provoke inquiries into your past life, for the poor pleasure of exposing another?”

To all this Amy could solemnly depose. She had been standing, with her slop-pail, snugly en-snounced behind the open door of No. 59, in which the gentleman had slept whom Boots had neglected to call for the Newcastle coach, and who had made such a row. And, indeed, save the “my dear,” a pleonasm into which Amy very naturally fell, the report was substantially correct; and fully accounted to Jem for the young bride drawing her white veil closely over her face, when, some minutes afterwards, he, as representative, or viceroy of the absent landlord, attended the travellers to their carriage, to express the thanks of the house for their patronage, and see that all was right; and also confirmed his previous suspicions of the domineering London head-chambermaid, to whose inauspicious appearance he mentally attributed the sudden retreat of the Herberts, and the loss of a “genteel party” to the establishment, together with servants’ and horses’ keep.

Jem’s future prognostics of Mrs. Hannah were all, and only evil to the hitherto unspotted fame of the Crown and Mitre;—till now, a famous House; for all the civil waiters had been honest and active; all the pretty chambermaids tidy and modest.

The emotion which the sagacious Jem—arguing most logically, though from wholly false premises—had imputed to jealousy, or to the young wife discovering the early gallantries of her lord, certainly did, like much more earthly evil, originate with a woman; though the sinner was not Hannah White, but Jane Jenkins, the waiting-maid of Mrs. Herbert.

The carriage was no sooner fairly out of the town than Violet laid her pale face upon the shoulder of her husband, and gave way to that passionate grief with which the sympathetic Jem Winkin had seen her struggling, while hurriedly preparing for the sudden journey.

“I entreat, nay, Violet, I could almost command you, not to distress yourself so much. At first I was myself alarmed; but I know Jenkins too well. Depend on it, she has used the privilege of a true lady’s maid, to exaggerate her mistress’s little attack of nerves, or vapours, into this deadly illness.”

“Fainting fits; long, deadly faints: and the cause, dear Charles? Let me read that letter once again. It is too dreadful! If Mrs. Herbert should be dead!—and—how slowly they drive.”

For the fourth time, Violet perused the hyperbolic epistle of Mrs. Jenkins; in which, after many vague expressions of intense alarm, and prophecies of a fatal catastrophe, that circumlocutory person, in substance, informed Mr. Herbert that, immediately after the receipt of letters from London, Mrs. Herbert had been seized with spasms and fainting fits; and, at once changing her plan of proceeding northward, had expressed the utmost anxiety to reach London, and to be joined there, as soon as possible, by Mr. and Mrs. Charles; and, farther, that she had afterwards become so much worse, that Jenkins had taken the liberty to write by express; and so forth.

The cause of this sudden attack was no longer a mystery to Charles, to whom his agitated wife had just revealed every secret of her heart, and, in the interchange of confidence, first found consolation and returning fortitude; nor for that matter to Jenkins, who was naturally a little anxious to know something of her lady's affairs, both from motives of curiosity, and, perhaps, also to learn how they might affect the personal interests of her lady's lady's-maid; who, with a very handsome salary, and many small emoluments of office, would ill have liked to resign without good cause. Bramah locks to writing-cases are useful impediments in ordinary circumstances; but if "Love laughs at locksmiths," chambermaids may surely outwit Chubb. Mrs. Jenkins was fully aware that the affairs of the Calcutta House were in a very bad way; and, consequently, her place in her "present family" in imminent jeopardy. Her affairs, as well as those of her mistress, therefore, demanded an instant appearance in London; and Jenkins, considerably proposed going forward by the mail "unprotected," to have everything in order for her lady in Regent's Park. Her lady was, if not in a condition to be left without a friend, at least most happy to dispense with a waiting-maid, whose suddenly changed conduct gave her a mortifying foretaste of reduced fortune.

Mrs. Herbert was therefore left alone, at an inn on the road, to commune with her own heart, and wait the arrival of her children: not dying—not indeed in any serious danger—but far from being so well as Charles argued, while soothing his wife's impatience, and quieting her apprehensions.

"At worst, it is but the loss to my mother of the greater part of her fortune," said he; "nor can I believe that she, who never was worldly in the mammonish sense of worldliness, can now have permitted herself to be overcome by mere pecuniary adversity."

"'Tis for your sake, dear Charles, for us, she suffers—and that deepens my concern, is indeed its spring. But now that the worst is known, the worst is past. Were we but once again together, Mrs. Herbert will soon surmount this misfortune, and we shall yet be so happy."

"In any event, my mother will have her widow's pension—that poor three hundred a-year, which, in the pride of riches, my poor father considered so paltry for his beautiful and high-bred young wife, that he advised she should, after his death, make it over to certain venerable spinsters of her early acquaintance, at whose school she had been educated. This she has avoided, lest the formal gift might have appeared ostentatious; though I believe she has never yet applied any part, of what may now be her sole provision, to other than benevolent purposes."

"How good and amiable she is! We shall still be rich enough, then," said Violet, trying to smile, and making no more distinction in her words than in her thoughts between the property of her husband and her mother-in-law than if it had all been her own. And Herbert also smiled, kindly but gravely, at her simple manner of thinking on subjects where clearness of ideas generally comes only too soon to the simplest.

"Thank Heaven!" he said at last, "my mother, if no longer wealthy, will not be utterly destitute: though the difference between three hundred and nearly three thousand a-year!—alas! . . . And, for ourselves, dearest:—It is a man's duty to provide for his wife, ay, and a man's pride and happiness, too: and who ever had motives so tender, so strong as are mine;" and he drew her to his heart, whispering, "you know our plans?"

"You make me too proud—too happy, dear Charles—and a wife's duty? But my own heart shall teach me that. Oh, that we were but all three together again!—settled, employed, very very busy, and so happy! Mrs. Herbert must feel privation the most, but she shall not, more than enough. I am sure I can supply Jenkin's place to her: she is always best pleased with how I do her hair. And if we could only live in the country: I can be so useful in the country—you smile, but it is true: you have no notion how much 'useful knowledge,' how many independent and useful habits my father's condition, and my happy education, forced upon me, both in my convent and in our dear little Jersey farm."

"And how many charming ones, I am sure; and both to bless and gladden our home wherever it may be, humble or great.—My poor mother!—she must, no doubt, as well as we, change her residence, and greatly reduce her establishment; yet we must, I fear, my own notable housewife, however well you may understand baking loaves, and the management of the dairy, remain in or near London:—where else am I to look for useful friends, or for professional employment, were I even fit for it?"

"Then so will Mrs. Herbert. I am not angry, though you are saucy, Charles, and laugh at me. I know—I can answer for her affectionate heart:—what could make up to her for the loss of you and me?"

"Thank you for your good opinion of her and of us," replied Herbert, affectionately; and he continued, more earnestly and gravely, "We must not, dearest, encroach on my poor mother. With all your useful and all your charming knowledge, you have, I fear, no idea of the many requirements of a fine lady. Even with Mrs. Herbert's restricted means, ladies of good fashion, in such places as Bath—nay, in Paris or London—contrive, in pensions, to enjoy many of the comforts and luxuries which habit has made necessary to them. My mother is the richest of our party; we must not be selfish."

"Selfish, Charles!" returned Violet. "In wishing Mrs. Herbert to share our happy, if humble home—to have a common home, a common fate—to be her loving children, her zealous servants, her cheering companions;—to lavish all our tenderness, all our cares upon her—go, sir," and she playfully, though in earnest, pushed him away, "you may know Greek and mathematics very well, but you have yet to learn a true woman's heart. To compare 'a genteel boarding-house,' 'a comfortable dowager pension,' with its old footman; and jobbed "roomy carriage," and whist-table every evening, with our bright and genial home!"

Would you place, in any comparison, a loveless, joyless existence, embellished by a few of the faded trappings of vanity and the indulgences of sense, with a life like what ours will be? O, Charles!"

"You may be right; I am certain you ought to be so."

"Nay, am; as the heart of woman answereth to that of woman, can I truly answer for her. 'A genteel boarding-house!' I could scold you for so meanly appreciating Mrs. Herbert."

Violet could not help thinking that the world had already tainted the mind of her husband with distrust, if not with cold pride, else what should he think it could signify which of the three was the richest, save to render the fortunate individual the most zealous to minister to the other two.

In the meanwhile, at a considerable town, where they halted next morning to obtain refreshments and change horses, Herbert, with Violet on his arm, repaired to a banking establishment opposite the inn, where he thought it probable he might obtain information, interesting to all commercial men, of the great failures in Calcutta; and of the particular FIRM, the HOUSE, in which his stepmother was interested; for by these stanch appellations erections of pasteboard and rags are as freely denominated as the most solid and enduring structures of Lombard Street.

Severely tried as the House, according to the first accounts, had been, its clients were not prepared for the worst; for the new intelligence represented it as bankrupt, past retrieval. The handsome balances, originally announced, had now dwindled into almost nothing. The richest imagined proprietor of the banking-house had, it was found, for several years, ceased to be a partner; and, while it continued to flourish upon faith in his credit, he no longer incurred liabilities. The credit and assets of the House were gone off in company, but its honour remained untouched;—so Mr. Herbert was assured by the spruce and very civil little gentleman, whom he saw at the banking-office. It had been unfortunate in large indigo speculations; more unfortunate in silk speculations; and its good luck in a magnificent opium venture to China,—a half desperate throw, a touch-and-go business,—had not, by nine days, been in time to avert the crash, and save the credit of the establishment.

"Yes, sir, if the House had been able to keep afloat for but another week, the trade-wind would have borne it triumphantly off the breakers," said the metaphorical banker, "and it would have netted £30,000 by the spec., at the lowest figure. . . . I am afraid you are touched, sir?"

"My personal share of the common calamity is trifling," replied Herbert. "My present anxiety is caused by the distress of a very near relative, and of many estimable friends, either ruined or irreparably injured by this unprincipled gambling with their money."

"Fair speculation, sir, pardon me. If the Firm had not long speculated boldly and fortunately too, it never could have stood that high rate of interest, which obtained the confidence of so many ladies and gentlemen. Think, sir, what it paid—higher, sir, than American securities!"

Herbert shrugged his shoulders. In his conscience he allowed that high interest must be accompanied by corresponding risks, and that the outwitted parties might sometimes have been the dupes of their own blind avarice.

"It is an unsound and bad system, I fear," said he; "covetousness, deception, and fallacy on all sides; nor is it always easy to say which party is the more culpable."

"My dear sir, your ideas are quite of the old school;—would cripple the very wings of commerce;—pinion down the buoyant energies of credit."

"Had the gentlemen in Calcutta made a great deal of money by the indigo and silk they bought with other people's money, would they have divided their profits among those whose cash they risked?" inquired Violet, with simplicity; which made Herbert smile on her, though very kindly, and the man of commerce laugh outright.

"Oh Lord, ma'am!—But very few ladies—no offence to the charming sex—can be made to understand the principles of business."

The abashed Mrs. Charles blushed as if she had said something as silly as the remark of the polite Mr. Bigsby seemed to intimate, though perhaps no idea could be more natural than her's.

"It is a pity that the fundamental principles of trade should ever be incomprehensible to plain-minded honest men—or even to ladies!" said Herbert.

"This house, ma'am," said the banker, in civil explanation, "gave the Nabobs six and hef;—a monstrous rate of interest—worthy of some risk that—wa'n't it, sir? We—Stocks' House, of which I am a branch—I am leaving, however—are at present doing loans at four;—on first land securities, so low as three and hef."

Charles Herbert thought of the mortgages, and other expenses, of his small, heavily-encumbered, and now but nominal estate. The reflection suggested prudence; and he had besides already consulted with Violet on the propriety of getting rid of the showy equipage and horses which Mrs. Herbert had presented to him on his marriage; which, he reflected, might perhaps be done to as much advantage in this town as at Tattersall's. He made the necessary inquiries of the banker; mentioning that they meant to travel by the mail the rest of the way; and to his surprise found his polite friend, after a survey of the goods, disposed to become the purchaser himself of "the stylish London turn-out—quite as good as new." The bargain, where both parties were frank and liberal, was easily concluded. The banker promptly gave a check upon the "New Surrey and Middlesex Joint-Stock Bank."

"A banking establishment new to me," said Herbert—"but indeed I do not know the half of them in London."

"Capital, well-known house, sir—does the business of nearly all the eastern counties, particularly in the grazing line—premises, West Smithfield. But you ought to know the house—they are our bankers, Mr. Herbert; you must have been consulted in their appointment."

"Our bankers?" inquired the amazed Herbert.

"Bankers to our Company, I mean, sir."

Herbert was more and more perplexed. He laughed, saying, "I don't think I have ever yet had the honour of being consulted by any one in the choice of a banker."

"Your name, sir, is in the list of Ordinary Directors," replied the banker, taking up a newspaper from his desk. "Oh, sir, I have found you out. You have been touring, I understand, with your charming lady, and a truant from the shop. Our Ad. may be seen every week in every newspaper north of the Trent. The thing, though I say it, has been pushed handsomely in this county and the two next, as the head-office will admit. Expect soon to extinguish the Sun, reduce the Phoenix to ashes, and overturn the Globe, from York to Grantham—ha! ha! ha! Self-praise, to be sure, Mr. Herbert, is no honour; yet I flatter myself that you, and the whole Direction, sir, may yet find that you might have made a worse choice than your humble servant. Old Stocks would have found me worth an additional £500, I suspect."

Herbert, fearing that the speaker was touched in the brain, became somewhat selfishly apprehensive about the check upon the Joint-Stock Surrey and Middlesex Bank—which he would have much preferred on Coutts, Herries, Hankey, or twenty others of very inferior note on 'Change, to these magnates.

"I do not exactly comprehend," said he doubtfully.

"Ha! ha! Not how your humble servant sees through a millstone? . . . My dear sir, I see your card. I have a hint from headquarters, or have found out, that a member of our provisional committee was lately married; I see your handsome lady; I put this and that together. Ha! ha! Let me alone. Two and two make four; don't it? I am an old hand at figures."

"Very figurative indeed, sir."

"Ay, ay, and at action, as well as figures. The Direction, sir, never made a finer stroke than in my appointment; and you will yet say so. Why, this very day I have had half-a-dozen applications, both from respectable parties wishing to transfer from established offices to ours, and from new insurers. Dr. Jeessop, Vicar of Whomleford, £5000 endowment for a niece: suspected to be a daughter—But no matter. The Doctor is a Churchman, and never was married; so the young lady must be a niece. He looks to the bonus: does not clutch at our lowest rate—which, by the way, the Company doing things in so handsome and liberal a manner, as to salaries, advertisements, &c., must cut sadly on our profits. But, as the secretary remarks, if we should divide but 3 per cent. what signifies that, if we do three times the business of the high offices of the old school? We shall cut 'em all out beyond a doubt. There is old Mrs. Higginbotham, long the housekeeper, and scandal says, the chère amie, of Squire Simpson—the most prudent and cautious of old ladies; she last week bought an annuity from us. I believe she has lied about her age; I don't think her above sixty-eight, and she claims as seventy-three. Well, that I am instructed from the head-office don't signify; we do her as seventy-three for the sake of example. She has lately taken a turn to Methodism, and goes about everywhere among the evangelical ladies trumpeting up the Old Established Church of England Philanthropic Office for insurance against Fire, assurance on Lives and Survivorships, Family Endowments, and Deferred Annuities: all done on terms forty per cent. more favourable to the insurer than in any other office in her majesty's dominions. Archbishop of Canterbury, patron; Bishop of London, ditto, sub. . . . So useful an old lady deserves her policy free of expense, as I have hinted to our counsel, Mr. Barker, to hint to Mr. Twigg."

"Mr. Barker, did you say, sir? Mr. Burke Barker?"

"Ah! have I blabbed? But we are all friends. The truth is, sir, that though only our revising barrister, as I call him in a joke, and not an ostensible partner or functionary, Mr. Barker, is the soul of the concern. Ay, there is a man! Mr. Twigg, I understand, though he signs the policies, is a mere capitalist—a man of columns of figures; but for nice calculation, for finance, sir, Barker! Though holding aloof himself, he was the soul of the Provisional Committee; and, as I suspect, still is, though he does not appear:—and will continue to be—no reflections—present company always excepted, you know—the main-spring, the right-hand of the Philanthropic."

Herbert was stunned. "I shall be obliged to you," he said, "for a sight of one of the Company's advertisements or schemes. I have been rambling and rustivating for some months, and am quite a stranger to London affairs."

The truth was, that Herbert, like most persons uninterested, rarely looked at such advertisements as those with which the banker readily supplied him from a heap of newspapers lying beside him, and also with copies of the Scheme and Tables of the "Old Established Church of England Philanthropic Office," neatly printed in black, blue, red, green, and golden characters. Something like compunction visited Herbert for not warning this credulous and conceited person of his danger.

"Do you seriously intend to give up your agency for the respectable House of Stocks, and turn your premises—you say they are your own property—into an office for this new company?" he gravely inquired.

"A question not to be asked, Mr. Herbert. Why, I have already been for some months doing a little, on the sly, for the concern. I am a considerable shareholder myself; but, first term, as soon as our new front is finished—beautiful elevation!—I wish you would do me the favour to step into the bank parlour and look at it. I have carte blanche for the expenses of alteration;—so down I go with "Branch of Stocks & Co.," and hoist the colours of the Philanthropic. Hurrah!"

Herbert knew not what to say—what to think.

"All the other offices in town are as jealous as the devil of our concern, and no wonder. Malicious whispers at first went about—commercial jealousy; but I at once threatened prosecution, and had even commenced an action. Mr. Barker, counsel, advised dropping the affair. He is a prime fellow—a real trump.”

“He was wise,” said Herbert, coldly. “Meanwhile, if you could make it convenient to give me gold for at least a hundred pounds of the check on London, it would oblige me, as I shall require a good deal of ready money on the road.”

Herbert, the married man, was becoming wonderfully prudent.

“Most assuredly,” cried the manager of the “Philanthropic for the Northern Provinces.” “Anything to accommodate you, sir. Perhaps the whole price of the carriage and horses might be convenient?”

“As you please,” said Herbert; and the sum was promptly counted out in sovereigns and Bank of England notes. “Odd gold this is, which farmer Curtis paid in with bills and notes, in transferring from the three per cents. to the Philanthropic:—endowment for grandchildren—children of his deceased son. . . . I regret beyond expression that your short stay must prevent Mrs. B. and self enjoying the honour and pleasure of entertaining your charming lady and you beneath our humble roof. No getting up a dinner one could ask a gentleman to in this antediluvian beef-and-mutton concern of a town, as Mrs. B. calls it, without several days notice; nothing to be had for love or money presentable. Next year, if I have the honour to entertain you, or any of the gentlemen in the Direction, I hope to have both a little more elbow-room and better appointments. Along with the new front for the office, we contemplate a new dining-room, a saloon, and drawing-room. . . . I do wish that you could have leisure to look at the elevations. The mail won’t be up for a full half-hour yet, and I should be so proud to submit the plans to any gentleman who could report on them. Some of the best ideas the architect, by the way, stole from Mrs. B. The present dining-room is only fifteen by nineteen—a cage, sir—we condemn it for a nursery.”

“I am extremely sorry,” said Herbert, again moving to go, his money safe in his pocket. “But I beg seriously to assure you, sir, that I am no Director of this or any other Company upon the face of the earth; and, though a stranger, I must take the liberty of warning you to be very wary how you engage with any new, flash London Company, and break off a safe, profitable, and reputable connexion with so respectable an establishment as that of Stocks.”

“New Flash Company, sir!” cried the northern manager, greatly excited, retiring a step and rising on tiptoe. “You are not then the Charles Courtney Herbert, Esquire, in the list of Directors? This company was first established and chartered, sir, in the reign of Queen Anne, sir—Anno Domini, 1706—capital, One Million. . . . It was intended to revive it by the name of the Victoria Clerical Family Endowment Friendly Association; but Mr. Barker approved the old name, recognised in 3 Geo. II., chapter 99th; 15 Geo. III., chapter 45th; and many subsequent acts of parliament; and 500,000 prospectuses were consequently cancelled. Surely you are the Mr. Herbert in the Direction?”

“If I be, I shall not be so much longer. Good morning, sir.”

Herbert had no leisure to read the advertisement, or study the flattering scheme of the Clerical and Philanthropic until seated in the mail-coach, to which his new acquaintance attended him. He had not left the town a half hour when the loungers in the windows of the reading-room, which was conveniently opposite the inn, (a great desideratum in country towns,) by some means or other, learned that the gentleman who had set off was a principal shareholder and Director of the office lately opened in the town, and had brought down a handsome new carriage and horses, as a present from the head office, to their zealous, able, and active agent Mr. Bisby. Several new applications were made at the office next day, both for annuities and assurances.

Herbert and Violet had the good fortune to be the only persons in the inside of the mail-coach; and when, in compliance with his entreaty, and wrapped in his arm, she tried to compose herself to sleep, after two nearly sleepless nights, he laid the prospectus quietly on his knee and began to study it with some curiosity and interest. Though the Archbishop of Canterbury flourished as patron, and a noble lord, then Governor-general of India, and therefore not likely to disturb the Company’s appointments for some time as to its governor, Herbert could nowhere see the name of Barker, nor of any one Crippes, save, “Consulting Physicians, Sir Henry Halford and Dr. Edmund Crips Quintin.” His own name, or, at least, that of some Charles Herbert, Esquire, was blazoned at full length along with that of Sir George Lees, Baronet, M.P., and a long list of names dear and familiar to the ears of commercial England; arranged in such wise that not one bearing the name could question of the right of the company to make use of such well-sounding, though equivocal, appellations as Cosmo Labouchere, Esquire; Peregrine Bosanquet, Esquire; John Jonathan Hope, of Amsterdam, Esquire; Humphrey Ramsden, Esquire; Donald Trotter Coutts, Esquire; Colonel Charles Fox Windham; Alfred John Whitbread, Esquire; John Pitt Smith, Esquire; Theophilus Bouverie, Esquire; Payne Smith Spooner, Esquire; &c., &c., on to a whole host of monied Esquires, with a very attractive sprinkling of true knights, baronets, barons, and earls. There was but one marquis, but he was worth twenty;—the Marquis of Westminster had the honour. Among these names there were a good many familiar to Herbert; and the affair seemed so utterly inconceivable as a fraud that he began to imagine that it might possibly be a serious project, and probably a hopeful one. Barker was a very acute man. Herbert knew little of business himself, save through those surprising turns of fortune familiar to every one conversant with English manufacturing and commercial society, which, by the turn of the dice, exhibits a man one day in all the pride of wealth and luxury, and, in the next, rotting in a jail. No Crippes was to be seen in any department of the concern, save that little bit of patronage bestowed on Dr. Edmund, as Herbert supposed, in an office nearly honorary; which favour might be expected from a brother-in-law. This looked well; but Michael Twigg, Esquire, the capitalist—yet there might be many Twigg.

At every stage in which Mrs. Herbert had preceded the travellers, they found little pencil notes left for them, which relieved Violet's immediate anxiety. Save that the money and the credit with Herries, which Herbert had brought from London some months before, were sensibly diminishing; that incipient symptoms of what he laughingly termed the "good old gentlemanly vice," were manifested in lessened largesses to post-boys and waiters; and that thoughts of the future, not dark, yet tinged with gloom, would occasionally intrude, he was wonderfully restored in spirits, while bowling along in what the English sage, who had tried different modes of enjoyment, has pronounced the most exhilarating human condition; and with an element of happiness which Johnson did not take into account—the lovely and beloved partner of his life and heart by his side, silent, or smiling, with feelings, in all moods, sympathetically attuned to his.

When at Grantham, the travellers overtook Mrs. Herbert, looking paler and thinner, indeed, than when they had parted, yet so much better than the hyperbolic waiting-woman had given them reason to expect; and when Charles saw the younger lady spring into the arms of the elder, and clasped his wife and mother in the same embrace, a happier press could not perhaps have been found in England. Next day, when Charles, seated between the ladies, heard them exchanging those points in the history of their several adventures since separation, which letters, even ladies' letters, could but imperfectly record, he began to understand how much of their domestic comfort might depend on their living together, and on this lively interchange of grave or mirthful important nothings. How they did laugh and chatter; and how much even Violet found to say which she had never thought of saying to him. And during the three days they were on the road, the same perennial flow of talk continued, though it became more varied and serious in character; for now Violet, by her picturesque narratives, contrived to interest his mother in details about the cottages and cottage gardens, maidens, children, and matrons, which they had seen, and to which he feared Mrs. Herbert might have been very indifferent from other lips. He, therefore, began to believe that Violet had, while judging only by her own feelings, reasoned more correctly than himself; and that Mrs. Herbert might not only contrive to do without Jenkins, and the many pretty new caps, and scarfs, in which she had formerly indulged, but, without, the society of those semi-fashionable spinsters and dowagers, who found her home pleasant at lunch-time, and her carriage always convenient; or those who had exchanged formal dinners, and dull evening parties with her. On the last day, and almost the last stage, Herbert, who had delayed the explanation which he considered necessary, affectionately requested to know his mother's future plans.

"My plans, Charles!" returned the lady, in some surprise; "like your wife's, my plans must depend on yours. You do not surely mean to discard me, now that I am poor as well as lonely."

"My own dearest mother," cried Charles, snatching her hand, fondly, "then we understand each other."

"Did I not know it, Charles?" cried Violet, with bright looks.

"Ultimately my plans must depend on yours, my son: for the present exigency, I mean to put myself entirely into the hands of Mrs. Charles and old Marion, who have so much more knowledge of what is proper for us. I make no condition, save that we remain one family. In heart and interest, we never can be disunited; but I will not have even a garden wall divide us."

"Nor shall it," said Herbert.

"A threefold cord is not easily broken," said Violet, pressing to her side the fair and delicate hand which she had clasped.

"Are we not, Charles, quite as we used to be?" asked Mrs. Herbert, in a quivering voice.

"A great many thousand pounds poorer—the House is," replied Herbert, laughing, "than it used to be. I, however, congratulate you upon your philosophy, mother, by which I reckon to benefit."

He did not now say that he feared the philosophy had not yet been fairly tested.

"When I reflect upon the misery which this affair has brought upon so many of my Indian friends and acquaintances, some of them ladies in old age, whose incomes were before too narrow for their comfortable maintenance in that style of life which habit has made necessary; and on those with young families, where delay of education is next to ruin, I am ashamed of my selfish regrets; and now that I have got you both back, not, as I foolishly feared, overwhelmed and in despair, but with smiling faces, as well as warm hearts, to soothe or gladden me, what is there that a rational being dare murmur about? I should despise myself as poor in spirit, as well as most thankless to the Almighty for numberless mercies and blessings, if I durst repine."

Herbert was delighted with this firm and cheerful spirit. He no longer hesitated to leave every necessary domestic change and arrangement to the judgment of his female allies, and to turn his thoughts wholly and steadily to his own department.

CHAPTER XVIII.

HERBERT had resolved to begin to study law, as a profession. This demanded a long consultation with Mr. Gryphon, his solicitor, whom he rightly regarded not only as an able lawyer, but also as a clear-headed, sound-hearted friend,—as the term is understood in the best merely worldly sense,—that is, a man capable of giving excellent counsel, and even of performing useful services, which involved no pecuniary risk nor responsibility. Herbert would not willingly have accepted of more than this from his friendly solicitor, who, from very natural prejudices, perhaps fortified by shrewd observation, entertained serious doubts of any young man of fashion, after the age of twenty-three, being capable of the persevering drudgery—as such a man must consider it—and long course of steady application necessary to make a thorough-bred lawyer. H-did not conceal his opinion when Herbert anxiously asked his advice. Indeed, many months elapsed before Gryphon reluctantly confessed that he might for once have been deceived, and that Herbert might prove an exception to the rule. In the meanwhile, he gave an account of the double lawsuits in which Herbert was engaged. That with the Earl of Tarbert, for the recovery of Mrs. Charles Herbert's fortune, was represented as in a fair train; but Gryphon did not conceal that, although gained, of which there was every prospect, the fortunate winners might be little the richer. The earl, like many noblemen whose estates are too large for management, was in very embarrassed circumstances; and his death—at his age not improbable, though not at present likely—might renew the suit, if his heirs were troublesome. It was understood that, after the first intelligence from India, which made the earl feel some alarm for the impoverished condition in which his daughter Lady Laura might be left, if her expectations through Mrs. Herbert failed, he had insured his life for a very considerable amount.

"When the earl gives up the ghost, we may attach that," said Gryphon.

"The provision made for Lady Laura Temple seized for my wife! O, no; that may never be."

"Will, though," thought Gryphon, who fancied he knew how a very high strain of generosity in pecuniary matters usually ended.

"Of the other provoking case I have better news. Old Cripps is quite willing to compromise it, if you will engage to use your influence with Mr. Stocks, to check the rigorous pursuit of his son Jack. Stocks begins to be sensible that he will do his daughter no good, by blazoning the absurd affair farther; and his passion has considerably cooled down. Besides, the most guilty party, in the opinion of every man of common sense conversant with the case, namely the dashing Mrs. Burke Barker, has got off with flying colours—complimented by the judge! She carries her head higher than ever. Mrs. Barker and her husband are of the mysteries of iniquity of this good town."

"Though I am quite of your opinion as to Jack Crippes' comparative guiltlessness, scamp as he is, I shall never consent to any such compromise, though a word to Stocks should insure me from further molestation. Let them and their pettifogging agents drop the shameless suit they never should have raised, and then speak to me about interceding for Jack."

"I think it very likely that it will be dropt. Barker sets his face against it; he does not relish any farther éclat connected with his wife's relations; and I believe his voice is potential in that quarter."

"What is Barker about?" inquired Herbert with some curiosity, remembering his provincial friend, the banker.

"Heaven knows; for a time he was overcast; but he has lately flared up more dazzlingly than ever. He has dropt the newspaper concern, I believe, save as an amateur to serve his purposes; but is still a mighty politician; meddling, directly or indirectly, in almost every contested election."

"For the Radicals? He was a Liberal."

"Pooh! Radicals!—where could they, poor devils, enable a man to keep a carriage, and a good house for his wife on Cornwall Terrace, chambers for himself, and all sorts of equipage befitting? Barker chooses again to be known as a barrister—at least nominally—and wishes, as I understand from the old fellow, to devolve his editorships upon his raffish brother-in-law: yet he has got no appointment, no visible means of life, . . . An adventurer like Barker must be fully the master of his masters before he can compel them to do anything permanent for him."

Without at this time mentioning what he had learned or suspected of some of the present pursuits of Mr. Barker, Herbert told of his encounter with Jack, who, he imagined, might now be on the high seas on his way to America. But he reckoned without his host. The desire of returning to London, always strong, had seized Jack, as soon as he had a few sovereigns in his pocket, like the maladie du pays, or home-sickness of the mountaineer of Switzerland; and as the money he had gotten from Herbert, together with the sale of Herbert's valuable cloak, were sufficient to bring Mr. Quintin Crippes on the top of the coach round by Liverpool to the metropolis, he pushed forward; in spite of the terrors of the police and its argus-eyed myrmidons, and of his deep distrust of the Barkers, which was almost as great as of the law.

It was a desperate venture; but Jack had, in fact, safely reached London two days before Herbert, though lurking, half afraid to make his arrival known even to his father and mother. He had not been twenty-four hours in London, and fairly seen the end of his last sovereign melted in a jolly supper, than the folly of the step he had taken stared him in the face. In the ups and downs of the family fortunes, he did not even know in what part of the town his parents lodged; and his last resource was, either boldly to face the Barkers, and by threats of exposure, at all hazards, to wring from them what might carry him out of the country; or to throw himself once more upon the mercy of old Marion. Stimulated partly by the love of adventure, and somewhat by a double dose of brandy and water, Jack finally resolved upon the latter measure; and as, at dusk, Herbert was hastening along Fleet Street, after his long consultation with his friendly solicitor, there came shooting past him from a lane, a few yards from Mrs. Marion's door, the very man whom he concluded to be ten hundred miles off by land or water. He at once remembered what Gryphon had said; and, from this and other impulses, clutched at the elbow of the figure, who for once gave a start that would have done honour to any stage.

"Good Lord! Mr. Herbert! speak of the devil—you know the proverb. I was just thinking to myself if I could fall in with that generous fellow Herbert, he would give me a lift in my need."

"Can it be you Crippes?—are you perfectly mad?—What has brought you to London?"

"Mad I would soon have been if I had remained out of town much longer; but not, even in madness, ungrateful to you, Mr. Herbert. By Jupiter

Ammon! you are a noble fellow! I shall never forget your kindness to me in that damned place.—What was the name of it? You make me say in the teeth of Brutus, ‘Virtue, thou art not an empty name.’”

While Cryppes was thus speaking, he was keeping, at the same time, a sharp look-out up and down the street; and had an alley or two under his lee-bow.

“But, in short,” he continued, “I abhor the provinces; that confounded noise of nothing always humming in one’s ears, as somebody says:—I was a desperate man! Like the great Montrose, I resolved ‘to put my fortune to the touch, to gain, or lose it all!’ If, like so many thoughtless, innocent young men, I am to be the victim of vindictive law for a frolic, I shall, at least, have the satisfaction of having those blasted Barkers share along with me. Nor to me, can any part of her majesty’s Australian colonies prove more inhospitable than the northern portion of her majesty’s patrimonial dominions.—I am a desperate man, Mr. Herbert. Besides,” he continued, in a confidential tone, “there is a delicious little devil of a tailor’s wife, right under the old Scotch lady, up there. O hem! Don’t, however, look ‘so severe in youthful virtue.’ I quite forgot you were married!—but never, upon my soul, my obligations to you.”

“Cryppes, if you have any remaining sense left, try to make your way to your family, and lie by, or depend on it, you will fall in with those who do not understand jokes. That tailor’s wife would as readily make forty sovereigns by your arrest as would Hannah White.”

“Pardon me,” replied Jack, in a tone of pique, —“can’t understand that. Just before leaving London, I had made an impression in that quarter.”

“Cryppes, you have been drinking deep. If you have any regard to your own safety——”

“Drinking deep!” interrupted Jack, “I should have been devilish glad to drink a little deeper, had that been convenient, in order to expel the blue devils by a much more agreeable description of spirits—the ambers,—brandy and water. . . . Ha! a beak!—I must bolt. I smell ‘em out a street’s length off.” Jack now looked extremely flurried and uneasy. His lately vaunted courage or desperation had oozed out.

“Call at Mr. Gryphon’s. You know his chambers. To-morrow, by twelve, you shall hear of me there.”

“A thousand thanks!—I shall never forget your kindness.—But for to-night——?”

Herbert took the hint, and slipped a couple of half-crowns into the hand neatly but modestly extended; and Jack shuffled off at an alert pace.

When the family of Mrs. Herbert had that evening, over their coffee, resolved itself into a committee of ways and means, that lady hinted one point, in which lingering and not unamiable vanity prevailed over her better judgment. She could not willingly change her present residence, for the modest retirement which loss of fortune dictated, until the young couple had received and returned those congratulatory marriage-visits, so long delayed by their tour. She wished that her friends should see how entirely the extreme loveliness and sweetness of manners of the Earl of Tarbert’s niece, besides her famed musical accomplishments, justified her partiality, and the choice of her son; and she secretly shrunk from the humiliation of the name of Mrs. Charles Herbert first appearing in connexion with some one of those snug, brick and plaster, small houses, with a green door, and a staring brass name-plate, in one of the many Paragon Places or Paradise Rows, of which the West-end ladies, when they know them at all, entertain either aversion and horror, or profound contempt; identifying them with everything pitiful, vulgar, and “out of society”—beyond the pale. Herbert was disappointed by this betrayal of latent weakness, which, amiable as the motive might be deemed by those who look only to the surface, was in his eyes, at this time, both paltry and silly. Was his mother still unprepared for that change, which was already welcome to him, since in it lay all his present comfort, and with it was interwoven every rational and every ambitious hope for the future.

Had there been no Violet at this crisis, to stand, like a mediating angel, between the son’s haughty pride and the mother’s milder vanity, and by innocent wiles and gentle persuasion, to have drawn and held them together; coldness, estrangement, and want of courageous frankness—the bane of domestic happiness—might have followed misunderstanding, to the lasting injury and discomfort of both. It was, at the same time, somewhat surprising to Violet, young and inexperienced as she was, how little either the mother or son seemed to know about those constant petty annoyances and vulgar realities of the work-day world, which daily tax the patience and forbearance of ordinary mortals, but from which the wealthy of England are shielded with a sevenfold golden panoply; by a cordon of porters, valets, and accomplished upper servants, whose business it is to divine the wishes of their masters, and suffer no one to prey upon or torment them, save confidential domestics. Mrs. Herbert, for example, had been exempted from all the petty plagues of life, save those which came to her through the medium of that too clever Jenkins, without whom she had, until lately, fancied it impossible to exist.

The pride of Herbert, at this time, took a direction exactly opposite to that of his mother, and was carried as far to the extreme. It revolted at remaining in holiday costume, and in the holiday house, only until he and his wife had received the unmeaning congratulations and ceremonious visits of a set of impertinent, indifferent, or prying persons; and had accepted and given a round of parties, for which he could neither afford patience nor money.

“You cannot, Charles, mean to break off all intercourse with society, at the very moment that you have the power of contributing so much to what gives society its highest charm?—now when your marriage marks an era in life; when to form agreeable acquaintances and solid friendships becomes so desirable,”

"Far from it—But there can be no lasting friendships, save among equals—at least in London. Most of my former friends, as it is customary to call our acquaintances, were, even before this, my superiors in fortune—many of them my inferiors in ———But no matter; I shall not care much for the loss of those friends." Herbert was beginning to employ bitter tones. The cold or changed manner of one or two of his Club acquaintances had that same day taught him that he was now a poor man—or no longer one of them. "Those sunshine friends, who cannot find us out in the brick-house with the two or three small sashes, muslin curtains, and mignonette boxes, ay, though set down from the 'Bus at our green door, I shall not care for."

Mrs. Herbert reddened, and looked vexed at his manner.

"Oh, Charles!" said Violet, reproachfully, secretly fearing that his pride laid his serenity of mind but too much at the mercy of such friends. "Don't believe him, ma'am. He is much prouder than we poor women are, that saucy gentleman—and much more jealous of disrespect—Disrespect!—as if any one save ourselves had the power of making us experience that humbling feeling!—Do tell him what we have seen this morning, ma'am—good Marion's discovery, Charles.—Our Scotch Brownie has been so actively on the out-look for us, since Mrs. Herbert wrote her from Grantham. . . . I am sure Charles will be as much charmed with our good fortune as we were ourselves."

"It is a house and quarter any one might be pleased with," said Mrs. Herbert; still unwilling to renounce the hope that their fashionable acquaintance should receive their first impressions of Charles in his married character, and of his beautiful wife, in as brilliant external circumstances as possible—"but for those absurd, conventional notions of localities and neighbourhood which influence people in all great towns, but especially in London."

Violet's furtive pleading glance checked farther sallies of temper; and Herbert listened with interest until his mother, in expatiating upon the beauties and advantages of the residence which she and Violet had been inspecting, forgot her secret wishes respecting the bridal visits. It combined every quality on which Violet had the most strongly set her heart, and had no drawback save the great distance from the spot where Herbert must pursue his legal studies.

"And we will have no carriage," sighed Mrs. Herbert, when this was adverted to. "If Charles drove to the Inns of Court in the morning, he might easily, in fine days at least, walk home for exercise."

"There are the convenient, cheap omnibuses," replied Violet.

Mrs. Herbert said nothing, but sighed more deeply. The elegant Charles Herbert, one of the handsomest and most gentlemanlike young men in London, going and returning from Chambers to a box at Chelsea by the 'Bus!

"And the river," said Violet.

That was a shade less dismal to Mrs. Herbert. She strove to exert the philosophy on which Charles had complimented her. Her mind had been so imbued with apprehensions of something squalid and cheerless in a low-rented house, that the one discovered by Marion had proved an agreeable surprise. There was a small garden behind it; a smaller lawn or grass-plot, with flower-borders, in front; verdure and shady trees; and from the little drawing-room an airy view of the river, and an infinity of gay, pretty, and lively objects.

"So nice and sweet a little drawing-room, dressing-room, and bedchamber all together for Mrs. Herbert!" cried Violet.

"A much nicer house than my last dear lodgings at Brighton, Charles," said Mrs. Herbert.

"A study for you below," continued Violet, looking into the sweet little garden,—“a very pretty dining parlour, and a set of three airy chambers and closets on the second floor, and a housemaid's attic.”

"But what, then, for yourself?" asked Herbert fondly. "You talk like a Robins' advertisement."

"O, I shall niche myself everywhere; but there is a little store-room next door to the study—I may have that for my study, I dare say. It is rather dingy just now; but with a little paint and paper, which I can put up myself, it will be so snug."

Mrs. Herbert, like any other far-seeing middle-aged matron, concluded that a nursery must be meant by this odd name or delicate periphrasis.

"Give your sanctus a fitter name, my dear," said she, "than one which is a libel on your orderly tastes and neat habits."

"Ah!" replied Violet, smiling and sighing, "that was the name my poor father wont to give to the little niche, with its four little embowered panes, in the roof of our Jersey cottage, which I called my boudoir; and where I kept all my treasures alive and dead, and conned those tasks which were play. You recollect, Charles, it was the name which Swift—there must have been some strange attaching quality about that odious man—gave to poor Miss Vanhomrigh's drawing-room: there were no boudoirs in those days I fancy; and they are, I believe, out of fashion, at least in name, in ours. Swift was a great favourite with my father. I myself delighted in his Journal to Stella, and the 'little language.' Ah, yes! he must have had a heart once!—though pride and ambition cankered and killed it, and by a lingering cruel death. . . . In solitude one gets so intimate, so personally intimate, with one's favourite authors, that their peculiar phrases become household words."

"You have shown cause why we should leave you your study," said Herbert; "though the name sounds rudely enough to an English lady's nice ears."

"How I wish we were fairly inducted!" rejoined Violet: "you in your study—I in my study. Mrs. Herbert's apartments have quite a grand aspect;—a balcony for plants over the portico, but above all, a conservatory!"

"A conservatory!—We shall be too grand," said Herbert.

"But so ingeniously and cheaply formed! The scullery and some of the offices are, you must know, in one wing. But so clothed, so draped, so richly embroidered, with a perfect entanglement of luxuriant and beautiful creepers, that not an inch of dead wall is visible. It is a perfect piece of living mosaic! Well, upon the roof of the said humble scullery, is raised a small green-house, conservatory, or what you will, with a glass door opening from the drawing-room; and with merely the cost of a little glass, and a little trouble,—there you have it!”

“Most tasteful and ingenious gentleman, or haply, lady of Chelsea!” exclaimed Charles, “who has created an Eve’s paradise above a scullery! Were not this house a discovery of Marion’s, who knows so well about houses, and many other things, I should fear that the delicious campagne, with a view of the Thames, was too expensive for us.”

Violet looked at Mrs. Herbert, unable to utter all at once what remained to be told. She had somehow come to understand, that to speak frankly of such a calamity as a lady laying down her carriage, was as shocking as of the impending death of her first-born, or the amputation of her limbs. It was Mrs. Herbert herself who said, “We can let the coach-house and the three-stall stable to advantage—they have a separate entrance from a lane; and so have our house for nett fifty guineas.”

“Bravo!” cried Charles, “less than Jenkins’ salary and perquisites,—we shall make rich at Chelsea. When do we get possession?”

“Since you seriously wish to remove before receiving your marriage visits”—sighed Mrs. Herbert—

“Yes, yes, I do,” interrupted Charles; “and to receive the congratulations of our future good neighbours of Chelsea, rather.”

“Then, as soon as I return from Windsor, I must, in common decency and humanity, visit and console my poor old friend Mrs. Briscoe, who quite relies on me in this distressing affair of the bankruptcy. You will, in the meantime, make Mr. Gryphon settle about the house and fixtures, and to-morrow very early, Mrs. Marion comes to us, to direct Violet and myself, what to select from the furniture here for our new abode, that it may be at once removed before—before—the sale. . . . Good night, my children.”

“Ah, Charles, is she not the sweetest, most amiable of women,” said Violet, as the door closed.

“Of all women, save her who, with much higher intelligence, much purer taste, can still bear with those pribble-prabbles which make me, naughty as I am, sometimes rather impatient—nay, perhaps, love her the better for them. You are one of those happy and only female creatures, Violet, created but to taste the sweets, the honey, of whatever you touch; while I, like so many of my brethren, as if by instinct, suck all or a good share of the gall.”

Next morning, long before Herbert, to his shame be it told, was out of bed, the ladies and their valuable auxiliary were at hard work from garret to cellar. It was Violet’s duty to make out the inventories of the goods to be left for sale; and anxiously did she study the looks and wishes of the owner, as, one by one, Marion summarily condemned to auction her endless elegancies and luxuries in cabinet-work, silk-hangings, pier-glasses, Indian china, and generally what dealers class as articles of virtu.

“Virtue, indeed!” exclaimed Marion. “I see little virtue in them, save in sinking and running away with good siller; but whatever virtue they may have in this grand mansion, I am sure they will be only plagues and incumbrances in the bit villakin at Chelsea.”

Still Violet often pleaded for a reversal of the sentence, when she perceived how fondly memory, association, or mere habit, had endeared some piece of convenient or beautiful dead matter, to its gentle owner; or openly rebelled against Marion’s stern fiat, and begged off the article as if for herself. Mrs. Herbert had herself pointed out—along with her finely-wrought toilet-plate, and many useless and costly toys, in ivory and filagree—toys, as Marion regarded them—for she had great respect for plate—a particular article which Violet knew the owner prized highly, and which had been one of her indulgent, elderly husband’s many gifts to his spoiled wife. It was a delicately-formed watering engine of silver; so small, as to seem the mere model of a garden engine, with which Mrs. Herbert had been in the daily habit of watering the plants which ornamented her balcony and rooms.

“Oh, not this, not this,” pleaded Violet, who had so often seen the pretty machine gracefully used by its fair mistress, in what was one of the most important daily occupations of her luxurious life. “Do you think that, at Chelsea, Mrs. Herbert is not still to have flowers, and plants, and daily use for her pretty watering-pot?”

“Ye’ll better just flit bag and baggage, hinny, if yon bonny bird-cage will hold all your trinkum-trankums,” said Marion humorously. “Ye beg for this easy-cheyre, and that ottoman; and this dwarf book-case, and that wark-table: never a muckle wark, I’m jalousing, was e’er done at the side o’ ane o’ the frail concerns yet. Wark-tables! Idling-tables rather! If ye want to see a wark-table, gang away amang the puir, wan-faced, shilpit, bits o’ millender and mantua-maker lassies: dizzens o’ them gathered round a real wark-table, and getting their dead frae its lang, weary hours, and thin fare, puir things!”

“Mistress Linton is right, my love,” said Mrs. Herbert, who had just entered. “I guess the motive of your reservations. How self-indulgent, nay, how utterly selfish, you must fancy me, if my personal accommodation is to be the sole study in what we reserve.”

“Take not blame to yourself, madam,” replied Marion boldly. “Ye may observe that Mrs. Charles is just as careful and tender of some other useless or cumbersome gear, as of your delicate up-fittings. There’s Mr. Herbert’s leebrary-cheyre. Poor studying was ever studied in one of them, I trow. They are greater deceptions still than the leddies’ daidlin’ wark-tables. Awa wi’ the lary lounge! I do not believe ever Mr. Charles crooked his hough in it yet. It’s splendor new, and will bring a good price; and let the young gentleman wark and win his easy-cheyre ere he loll in it. They are just fit for pursy deans and gouty prelates, thae feather-bed seats, and no for men, to call men, who have their way to make in the world by unravelling, or, it's as like, warping and ravelling the toils and meshes o' the law."

"Here, then, goes 'a Spanish reclining library chair,'" cried Violet, gaily.

"That's right! When the gentleman has once wrought for and won the privilege of rest, he will find his cheyre the safer. But let the ledgy keep her settee; sorry woman should I be to see the day she wanted it, or anything else that sae weel befits her station. And now, I am thinking, mem.," said Marion, her face mantling with sly humour, "since Mrs. Charles has been so considerate and mindfu' of everybody's wants but her ain, we must indulge her. I saw she cast a longing eye on that auld hobby-horse of Maister Charles's, up in the garret."

"O, you wicked Marion," said Violet, laughing and blushing.

"We will e'en let her get that keepsake—it would not bring 5s. at a roup the morn:—But there is another piece of gear," continued she, seriously, "and this Lon'on has a market for a' wares. Mrs. Barker Barker, or whatever that bouncer's proper appellation may be,—I mean the Professor's high-flying dochter,—is setting up in a grand way, however lang it may last, and come the siller frae where it likes; and it can come from no good gait. Weel, having got free o' the law, she maun hae, among her many gettings, a ledgy's maid no less; and Jenkins is the very cut for her, and will, I guess, keep her at the staff's end."

"That person want my maid!" replied Mrs. Herbert in a voice of surprise, in which Violet might have discerned a slight shade of haughty pique; but it passed off in a moment. Of the endless belongings to be disposed of, there was none half so troublesome as Jenkins, nor of which she was now so desirous to be handsomely rid; so that, after the momentary shock, she was really pleased with Marion's intelligence.

"Nay, I did not see Madam Barker myself: it was the mother o' her, the Professor's ledgy,—there is sorts o' Professors and sizes o' leddies,—did me honour to call on me last night about Jenkins, with her tale; but allenarly, as I suspect, as much about her "buay," as she calls the hairy-faced ne'er-do-weel I was so simple as to let loose on the country, with my five pound in his pouch.

Weel, the woman may have a mother's heart for her blackguard, for aught I ken; and it does no become me to slight that sawcred thing. They could, it seems, get Jack pardoned "the frolic," or the thing winked at, now that it has blown by; and they have something grand in view for him. They are wonderfu' folk, even for Lon'on;—the auld ane, that was but the other day scrambling about in her rusty black sarsnet, with her bit basket below her shawl, trying where she could pick up a cheap morsel of dinner for her guidman in Whitecross jail, was dinked out yestreen as braw as Bink's wife, when she becked to the minister; and in comfortable lodgings in Bury Street, for I ken the house. But this is nothing to you, madam," said Marion, for Violet gave her apron a gentle twitch. "She wanted to know when you could conveniently receive Mrs. Barker Barker to inquire Jenkins' character. I said I would myself give her a' the character required, but that would not do; and so, as I guessed, ye would be well pleased to get quit of that piece of goods before going to Windsor or fitting to Chelsea, I made bold to say this day at one o'clock; but if it be not convenient—"

"Quite, quite convenient—the sooner the better," replied Mrs. Herbert. "And much obliged I am to you for this and many other kindnesses."

"Say nothing about that. . . I would have spared you this troublesome visit if I could; but there are a parcel of idle, impudent huzzies about this and a' toons, wha take pure delight in rambling from house to house every term, asking after maid's characters, just to stare about them, and spy ferlies in places where otherwise they could not get in their snouts;—though this is but the sma'er sort of leddies—"

"I believe Mr. Herbert could tell the poor mother something of her son," said Violet, deeply compassionating the maternal distress of her former harsh hostess. Mr. Herbert met this person in the north one evening."

"This person! Ye must not be sae mim wi' my proddy-jee, as Maister Charles calls him,—a very proddy jee he is, or else no. Have his moustaches sprouted again, I wonder, after the sharp singeing I gave the natural ornaments? He is a beauty without paint yon." And Marion laughed aloud at her own mirthful recollections. "I maun hae damages off him when he comes to the kingdom the dam o' them forebodes for her hopefu' cleekin, for scathe done my guid name by giving harbourage for two nights in my meat-safe to the cheat-the-widdie. I'm no thinkin', howsoever, my proddy-jee the weel warst o' the crew, though he has been made the scapegoat. . . . But where were we? French timepiece or-molu—of all ores commend me to the sterling ore, for that is aye easy carried about, and keeps its value in the market;—but go on, hinny. Naething but ups and downs in this weary schene o' our pilgrimage; though there is little need, madam, to envy Mrs. Barker Barker of her fine coach and grand dwelling. What says the Psalmist of the unstable condition of the wicked?

For over it the wind doth pass,

And it away is gone:

—Na, Jack is the best o' them."

"Mr. Herbert imagines that Cryppes has gone off to America," said Violet, to whom Herbert had not mentioned his encounter with Jack.

"To Ameriky? The hail filth and acum o' Europe is spewed out upon that wide land. Yet for a clever, fair-fashioned, aleeky-tongued, lang-headed rascal, or a downright cunning villain, commend me to this same big Babylon; though it's utter destruction to rogues in a sma' way."

The inventory, relieved by such disjointed chat as this, was happily accomplished, just as the new, flashy, bright yellow, carriage of Mrs. Barker drew up.

A VISIT TO THE MONASTERY OF LA TRAPPE, IN 1839.

WITH what pleasure did we not behold the last tip of the setting sun hide itself behind the looming clouds of the horizon, as we wound with lagging steps up the hill of the little village of Soligny. We had, during the day, "shaken from off our feet" the dust of many a tedious mile, in the hope of reaching, in the evening, the far-famed "Monastery of La Grande Trappe du Perche." Arrived at Soligny, we were within a league and a half of our destination—whither the road lay through thick woods, the leafy covert of which we had rapturously anticipated, and with the prospective enjoyment of which, we had at times tempered the sultriness of

The day now worn, and woo'd to curtain'd rest,
By evening's softly-murmur'd lullaby.

Opposite to the church, we descried, by the usual pictorial insignia of billiards gaily limned upon the white-wash, above the door, "Le Grand Café" of the village. Into this establishment we entered, to indulge the refreshment of a temporary unknapsacking; and, also, to taste once more the vulgar beverages, cypleped, beer and brandy, ere we disregarded, for a time, the carnal affections and good things of this world, and submitted to the frugality of monastic discipline.

"Are messieurs going to le monastère this evening?" inquired the proprietress of the Café, as she placed, pursuant to our request, upon the table, a bottle of la bière blanche.

"Oui, oui," was our response.

"Eh bien!" rejoined the buxom bourgeoisie—whose patois denoted but too plainly, she had, at no period of her life, rambled many leagues from the locality where she was then domiciled—"Eh bien! it is necessary to be careful; the way is difficult, and likely to-night, as the moon is down, to be very dark. But you've only to keep along the road running straight before you—not turning to the right nor left—and you cannot fail to arrive at the monastery."

Thanking the dame for her kind instructions, we proposed certain queries, respecting the danger to be apprehended from wolves or robbers during our evening's march through the woods: all which being satisfactorily answered, and our necessary refreshment ended, we once more buckled to; and, giving the farewell "Bon soir" to our kind matron, pursued our onward way; and, in a few minutes, entered the gloomy vistas of the forest of La Perche.

At our first setting out, we had arranged to seek the hospitality of the brotherhood of La Trappe as pilgrims; and arrive, if possible, before the gate of the monastery, according to the most approved precedents of pilgrimage—"wayworn and faint;" and, at the time set down by the most admired writers of adventure, "the grey hour of eve." Hitherto every circumstance had equalled our anticipation:

—— the twilight grey
Had in her sober liv'ry all things clad——— the stars that usher ev'ning rose;—

NO. LXXXVII.—VOL. VIII.

we were plodding on, beguiling the fatigue of our weary way with lusty carollings of the "Adeste fideles," or a snatch from some fondly-remembered ballad of "Old England."

We did not, however, long need a recourse to these artificial diversions of thought; for the intricacies of the road-way, scarcely discernible between the foliage, or distinguishable from the paths by which the forest is everywhere intersected, so engaged our attention, as to banish all feelings of fatigue.

Aptly, indeed, has this locality received the appellation "La Trappe;" for so intricate is the labyrinth of roads which, in every direction, threads the forest, that adventurous indeed must that stranger be who should endeavour to tread its mazy windings unattended by a native guide. But not to reach the monastic retreat uncircumvented would have divested our journey of half its romance, and have been, to our enthusiastic thinking, most unpilgrim-like. An hour's perplexity, however, in the uncertain recesses of the gloomy wood, was sufficient to dissipate the romance which might attach to our adventure; and the anticipation therefrom resulting—as to the probable reality of passing the night upon the gnarled bough of some ancient oak, or, more classically, reposing "sub tegmine fagi," brought with it a sincere repentance of our hardihood. Fears and troubles increased with the increasing darkness of the evening; yet we jogged on, until the sudden tolling of a bell, at no great distance in the direction we were proceeding, and the glimmering of lights between the interstices of the bosky maze wherein we were bewildered, betokened our approach to what was unhesitatingly pronounced to be—"The monastery."

A quarter of an hour's brisk march served to confirm our surmises, and bring us panting, "wayworn," and, in every respect, suitable to the most fastidious lover of adventure, as pilgrims before the gate of "the auncient house"

Renown'd, throughout the world, for sacred lore,
And pure unspotted life:
Where all the joy is to relieve the needs
Of wretched soules, and helpe the helpless poore:
Where night is spent in bidding of the bedes,
And all the day in doing good and godly deedes.

Seating ourselves upon the two stones which support the posts of the outer gate, we shortly deliberated upon the course to be pursued, in order to entitle us to the hospitality of the brotherhood. Two things were quickly determined: that the gate-bell should be rung; and admittance at once requested. The former of these was at once carried into effect. The first long jingling summons died upon the silence of the evening—unobeyed: again the dingle of "the creaking bell" awoke the slumbering stillness of the scene—vibrating to the echo of the surrounding woods—then sinking in gentle cadences, until its scarcely audible tinklings were lost in the reviving sound of approaching footsteps.

"Benedicite !—Que voulez vous ?" inquired a small voice beneath a huge hairy cap peering between the opening wicket of the gate, which slowly unfolding, discovered to us a figure, dressed, most unmonk-like, as a gardener.

"Charité, Charité," was our feeble response.

"Eh bien, eh bien," replied the stranger (in the patois of the country,) "it is too late for you to be admitted; but it is never too late to be charitable," was the welcome rejoinder, accompanied with an outstretched hand to lead us into the lodge, within the gateway. Here we were assiduously eased of our knapsacks, and requested by our attendant, in whom we soon discovered the porter of the establishment, to be seated. A short inquiry then ensued respecting the place whence—the manner how—and the wherefore—of our journeying;—which was as shortly and as satisfactorily answered. To corroborate the several statements made by us, we produced our passports, which, however, after a vain attempt at perusal, "with spectacle on nose," and "by the lanthorn dimly burning," our benevolent examiner returned to their respective owners, with an approving "C'est bien, c'est bien, messieurs," and the consoling interrogatory, "Avez vous faim ?" followed by a flippant, yet respectful, "Pardon, messieurs," and the prompt disappearance of our welcomer. By the time we had exchanged some short, mirthful, badinage, the old porter returned, accompanied by a little, bony, epicene-like individual—half monk and half secular—and an attendant lad of contrasted obesity, in whom, by their attire and deportment, we recognised no other functionaries than the cuisinier and his assistant. After many reciprocal politenesses, interspersed with a few regretful allusions to the advanced hour of the evening, it was intimated to us, in sorrowful accents, by the "professeur," that the only fare he could set before us, promised no greater luxury than a dish of "pommes de terre au lait," and, albeit against the rules, (yet as we had not been duly received into the hospitality of the mansion) a plate of "œufs pochés." To this communication we were hindered from replying, by the almost instantaneous exit of the little gastronome, and the con amore activity with which the porter and cook's lad began to arrange the inner room of the lodge for our repast.

Notwithstanding all these preparations, we were as yet uncertain as to the "where to lay our heads" for the night, and upon which we desired more satisfactory information than we had hitherto been enabled to obtain. Supper we needed less than rest, having duly satisfied the wants of the inward man, in the course of the day's peregrination, by a salade à la volaille, and a cold fricandeau de veau, with their usual accompaniments of wine and liqueur. But the exemplary alacrity with which the strangers, upon whose peaceful hour we had unwittingly intruded, sought to relieve our apparent distress, and to "give us friendly greet," precluded the possibility of declining their proffered hospitality.

The pommes de terre au lait, Anglicé "potatoes and milk," were pronounced altogether excellent—poached eggs delicious—and the cider to be of the most refreshing acidity. During our repast we were careful, by free and frequent "potations pottle deep," and repeated "heapings of the platter," to manifest a sense of the kindness received to the attendant porter, who bent pronely over the table, stimulating our appetites with an occasional "O! mon Dieu, vous êtes fatigué—vous avez soif—vous avez faim,"—slipped in between a continuous monotony of "Buvez, buvez—mangez, mangez, mes amis." In due time our duty towards the dishes, which furnished the entertainment, was performed—and their removal, followed by the appearance of a basket of luscious pears, to make up the never-to-be-found-wanting attendant of a French meal, "le desert." By this time the awful question "Where do messieurs intend to sleep?" had been proposed—and answered by us with assumed nonchalance, hiding the fond yet dubious thought of a comfortable housing, "In the woods—in the woods—we have no other resting-place—we are too late to be received here—and there is no other house within the distance of a league."

"Coucher dans la forêt—c'est impossible!" ejaculated the hospitable porter: "I will give you money for your lodging—eight sous will pay for a bed at the auberge opposite."

"Is there an auberge at hand?"—we exclaimed with feigned surprise.

"Out, oui," returned the good old man; "but soyez tranquille for a moment—you are tired—I will go thither, and see if the bed be unoccupied." Then taking our hands with a consoling shake, and gazing on us for a moment, with an eye suffused with tears, he sorrowfully articulated, "Pauvres jeunes gens—coucher dans la forêt—et ne Dieu que leur ami,"—and turning from us to conceal the pitying drops, which were resting on the bony protuberances of his cheeks, abruptly closed the door behind him, as he sped on his errand of disinterested charity.

The temporary absence of our Abraham-like host, afforded us an opportunity to remark upon the sincerity of the kindness shown towards us. We had sought charity as objects of charity, and, albeit, pretending somewhat to gentility of birth and station, our garb and appearance, in every respect, suited the poverty-stricken character we had assumed. Had we journeyed hither as "gentlemen travellers," we might, in common with many who have preceded us, have suspected the disinterestedness of our reception; but it was evident, from the treatment we had hitherto experienced, that the charity of the "holie brotherhood," amongst whom we had arrived, was not "puffed up." In this opinion we were not deceived, but in every way confirmed, by the frequent opportunities which, during our domiciliary visit, we had of observing cordiality and humility equally shown towards the trimly dressed, and the meanly clad.

We were interrupted in our panegyrics and speculations by the speedy return of the old man, who, with a lugubrious countenance, and in a faltering voice, informed us, "Il n'y a pas de chambre la!"

"Well then," we responded, "our course is clear,"—and, suiting the action to the word, we motioned our departure.

"Restez, restez," exclaimed our attendant, "I have it—follow me into this room—there—you see that bed?—last night it was my resting-place—to night it shall be yours;—it is not very soft—but it is softer than the bare ground,—and much warmer!" There was an earnestness in the offer which we felt it would give pain to refuse; nevertheless we unhesitatingly declined, and, returning to the little room wherein we had repasted, we thanked the old man for the kindness received, at the same time we were busied in preparing once more—

To take the burthens on our lusty backs.

We were, however, dissuaded from our determination by the warmth of feeling which our host now displayed, and the resolute air with which he disputed our departure. "Stay," said he, after a short pause, during which he had evidently been labouring under a most painful conflict of thought, "I have it. It is much better to break a regulation of our establishment, than allow two travellers to perish through the severity of that regulation. I will give you beds; but they will, I fear, be very humble. I cannot offer you better to-night: you shall be more properly accommodated to-morrow." Forbidding us to dissent from his proposal, he took up the lanthorn, and bade us at once to follow.

Passing a few paces along the court-yard, we were shown, by our benevolent guide, into a spacious apartment, partitioned on its three sides somewhat after the manner of a stable, and having, in each of the stall-like compartments, a small framework, supporting a sack of straw, covered with a coarse sheet. This, our old friend informed us, was our dormitory; and here we were at liberty to choose out the particular compartments wherein we intended to pass the night.

Without allowing reflection to censure the quality of our lodging, we quickly derobed our "dusty apparelling;" having received the hearty "Bon soir" and customary "Benedicite" from the old man, who, being assured that we considered ourselves comfortable, withdrew, with a hasty step, to leave us to repose. The door, however, had scarcely been closed behind him, when the chubby lad, whose acquaintance we had previously made in company with the cuisinier, entered, and, moving on tiptoe across the room, as if fearful to disturb our slumbers, knelt down beside one of the beds in an attitude of devotion. In about twenty minutes, he had managed to repeat the office set down for the evening; and, rising from his knees, began, with many grumbings, to examine the indurated superficies of his couch, ejaculating alternately—" C'est vilain,—Diable m'emporte,—c'est abominable."

Curious to divine the cause which thus perturbed his equanimity, we ventured to address the embryo cuisinier, and were responded to by a succession of questions Socratically propounded:—"Are not," said the tormented youth, in the purest dialect of the district, "are not the beds as hard as the d—l? don't they smell like the d—l? are they not enough to make any one as sick as the d—l?" So, having thus at once disposed of our inquiry by these satisfactory appeals, disclosing to us his familiarity with the domestic peculiarities of the gentleman to whom he appeared so anxious to give his due, and apparently eased his mind by this undisguised argumentum ad hominem, with one malicious puff he cut short the existence of the glimmering candle, and, muttering a thousand execrations, by way, we supposed, of desert after his devotions, crawled into his much abused place à coucher.

"Bon soir, mon ami," we called out from our stalls, after a momentary pause, in a tone somewhat of provoking pleasantry.

"Bon soir, messieurs," sulkily echoed the urchin. Then, sinking into a soliloquizing burst of sneering indignation, he continued—"To sleep—in an hospital!—Diable! an hospital!"

"How," we instinctively exclaimed, "an hospital?"

"Ay, an hospital," re-echoed the grumbler. "We are in the hospital of the monastery. Two monks died here, about three weeks since, of a putrid fever."

"Thank ye, thank ye, Bon soir, mon ami!" we gasped forth, in order to cut short any further gratuitous communication, which might possibly have informed us as to the identity of the beds whereon the holy brothers had breathed their last,—a point of history which, at that particular moment, and to persons in our circumstances, was by no means interesting, or worth while clearing up. So, rolling each his little piece of sackcloth round him for a sheet, and resigning ourselves calmly "to bear the ills we had," we indulged the short musing which precedes the oblivion of repose, until we were Kissed into slumber by care-charming sleep.

Not caring to "prevent the sun," as old Isaac Walton somewhere has it, we had indulged our somnolency through the broad day-light of the morning, until a gently whispered "Comment se portent ils messieurs les voyageurs?" broke like words of disenchantment on our slumbers. Involuntarily starting for a moment, through the strange unconsciousness of locality which, at all times, precedes the "wide awake" of a night's repose, we opened our eyes upon a tall gaunt figure at the bed-side, clad in a coarse brown dress, the cowl of which, being drawn over the head, half concealed the haggard unshaven visage of the inquirer, who, we needed no ghost to tell us, was a veritable Trappist. Perceiving us awakened, and about to raise our heads, in order to answer more respectfully the solicitous inquiry which had "broken up our sleep," the monk gently put forth his hand to restrain us, and requested that we would remain in a recumbent posture for another hour or two, so that our limbs might be perfectly rested after the fatiguing journey we had performed. A few interchanges of question and answer, however, were sufficient to satisfy the stranger that we had completely recruited our strength, and were anxious to be "up and doing." Whereupon the question being proposed, "If it were agreeable to breakfast?" and an answer returned by us in the affirmative, the brother shook us cordially by the hand, and slowly stalked away to give the necessary orders for our further entertainment, not "whistling as he went, for want of thought," but awaking the ringing echoes of our apartment with a huge bunch of keys, which dangled from a leathern thong at his girdle, and the clatter, upon the tile floor, of his enormous sabots or wooden shoes. By the time we had donned our nether garments, and were preparing, crines pectine deducere, a little sleek-faced monk made his entry, with a profound bow and a most fascinating simper, bearing, on one arm, a huge piece of brown bread, with a large dish; and, in the grasp of the other, a pitcher, with two drinking glasses. Having deposited his burthens upon a small oaken table, in the centre of the room, and arranged them with suitable propriety, he approached us with a lowly inclination of the body, and a somewhat knowing smile, not altogether unaccompanied by a wink at the table he had prepared, to inform us breakfast was served.

The material of our repast consisted of brown bread, cider, and four enormous radishes, each rivalling in size a moderately grown carrot of the English garden. The sight of so gigantic a specimen of vegetable, which in England derives repute from its diminutiveness, was sufficient to raise our speculative fears as to the fibre and pungency, which we deem inherent in that most disagreeable of all intruders into an English salad—a colossal radish. One nibble, however, of the roots before us, was sufficient to exemplify the horticultural proficiency of the Trappist gardeners, whose salads and vegetables, of all kinds, we were enabled, from subsequent experience, to pronounce to be, both in size, flavour, and every desirable quality, far beyond the like productions of any of Adam's profession, who till the ground at Fulham, Putney, or elsewhere. In a few minutes after we had finished what was, without hyperbole, a frugal repast, the little smiling monk, who had retired during our meal, reappeared, and perceiving, by sundry and divers fragments of radish heads and crumbs of bread-crust, that we had done justice to his hospitality, intimated his readiness to present us, in due form, to the brotherhood. In return, we informed him that his pleasure was our command; whereupon he reverentially bowed, and motioned his desire at once to attend our introduction.

As soon as we had gained the open air and were traversing the outer courtyard, our attendant became excessively inquisitive respecting the nation to which we belonged, our station in life, and the general topics of the day; so that, by the time we reached the large gates which separate the outer courtyard from the more secluded grounds of the monastery, our companion was in possession of the news, that, in England, there were railroads, steamboats, and also, that there was a queen reigning as sovereign. Suddenly, however, he became taciturn, and as we approached the building of the monastery, which, with its church adjoining, appeared at the end of a short path, like a comfort-rectory in "merry little England," abruptly halted at a small wicket, and eyeing us from top to toe, gravely inquired—"Have you any other clothes with you? Because," continued our little friend, pointing to the blouse which we had adopted as our costume, "this is not the kind of dress in which to appear before the abbot and the other great ones."

For a moment we were silent: surprise at the remark in such a place, and from such an one, stifling the just rebuke which we were conscious it deserved. Besides, we were unwilling to prejudge the brotherhood, of whose hospitality we were about to partake, from the specimen of an individual member. Yet this one little speech of our little friend was sufficient to disclose to us that even in this secluded spot, hallowed by the reputed sanctity of its inhabitants, and their famed disregard of all terrene honour and distinction, there was one amongst the holy brotherhood who, although he might have come out from among the sinful of the earth, had not altogether renounced the pomps and vanities of this wicked world. We contented ourselves, however, with meekly negating the question of the monk; leaving the corrective of his folly to the chidings of his own reflection.

The grounds through which we had passed since leaving the great gates of the outer court, presented the appearance of a well-stocked farm, with its usual characteristics—hay-stack, shed, stable, dung-heap, cows, sheep, and poultry. But from the little gate, where we had for a moment halted to receive our friend's censure respecting our apparel, we continued on through a neatly-arranged garden, here and there dotted with a gay pansy, or a solitary shrub, and skirted by a weed-grown path, encircling a small green sward, one corner of which offered a pleasant spot to recline beneath the gracefully depending branches of a wide spreading beech.

There was not anything in the exterior appearance of the monastery, properly so called, to denote the purposes to which it is appropriated, or the peculiar character of its inmates, save a huge representation of the crucifixion affixed to the wall on the north side, and a small figure of the Virgin and child in a little niche over the entrance, with an inscription, "Monstrat esse matrem Dei."

Arrived at the entrance-door of the mansion, our attendant stepped forward and rang the bell; then hastily receding, drew himself up on one side in an attitude of humility, with his arms folded across the breast, and his eyes bent abjectly on the ground to await the answer to his summons. Almost on the instant the door was gently opened by a spare monk rather advanced in years, who, perceiving strangers in the charge of a brother, instinctively, as it seemed, inclined his body to the most profound obeisance. A pantomimic correspondence now took place between the brothers, commencing with three reciprocated rotatory motions horizontally described by the right hand, followed by as many digital intimations of silence upon the lips, and concluding with an expressive extension of the palm over the region of the heart.

This inexplicable dumb show being completed, we were politely beckoned by the spare monk to enter, and motioned to take our seats in a small chamber set apart as the waiting-room for strangers. In a few moments, another brother, dressed in a garb of white, and apparently about twenty-eight years of age, appeared and, politely bowing, requested our respective passports; at the same time apologetically qualifying his request with the assurance, that it was not from any distrust that our passports were requested, but because it was necessary the abbot should always be acquainted with the nation and character of his visitors, in order that he might be enabled to answer satisfactorily any applications which might be made to him by the government. Acknowledging the propriety of this procedure we cheerfully delivered up our credentials, with which the young monk, after respectfully requesting us to be re-seated, withdrew. During his absence, which was of some continuance, we availed ourselves of the opportunity to peruse a small notice which was hung up in the room, and of which the translation runs thus:—

“The persons whom divine Providence may conduct hither are entreated to comply with the following requests:—

“To avoid meeting the religious as much as possible, and, above all, when they are occupied with work.

“If any person have need of anything, he is desired to address himself to the père hôtelier; because the other religious, enforced to a rigorous silence, are not permitted to answer those who may wish to converse.

“If any one should recognise amongst the religious a person whom he has known in the world, he must not manifest his recognition, not even if the religious be a son, a brother, or any other relative.

“The guests must not blame the religious who receive them for not indulging in long conversations; the part of a monk is to keep silence: and the Holy Spirit has said, ‘that the man who loves to speak much shall not prosper on the earth.’

“When a stranger wishes to pray, he must go to ‘The Tribune;’ but on no account, when there, must he join in chanting the service.

“It is not permitted to visit the several parts of the monastery unattended by the père hôtelier. There are places where silence is inviolable—these are, the church in every part, the refectory, the dormitory, the cloisters, the chapter, and the kitchen. In the places where it is permitted to speak, the words should be uttered in a low voice, and in such a manner that the speaker may not be heard by the religious who may be near. Messieurs, the guests are entreated to believe, that it is with pain so simple a diet is offered to them during their visit; but so it is determined by the rule of the order.”

When the door of the sitting-room was again opened, the religious who had received our passports reappeared, entering with his back towards us, and bowing obsequiously as he preceded an elderly monk, whom, by this marked deference, we recognised to be none other than the abbot of the monastery. This chief of the humble community was a man apparently about sixty-five years of age, with a harsh-featured visage, rendered somewhat forbidding by a slight obliquity of vision; nevertheless, the complacent smile of welcome was not absent, nor was there any lack of the usual facial expressions of good nature. His white frock and cowl in nowise differed from those of the brother who so respectfully preceded him; nor was there any external difference of dress or distinctive ornament to denote his dignity, save a massive gold ring with a large sparkling jewel, worn upon a finger of his left hand, and a small cross of box-wood depending from a black silken cord round his neck, and resting on his breast. The “holy father” approached us with a respectful bow, and, cordially shaking us by the hand, politely inquired the purport of our visit,—if it were simply to inspect the establishment, or to remain for a season amongst the brotherhood. Informing him of our intention to reside within the monastery for a short period; he appeared delighted, and expressing a hope that our stay would be of some duration,—assured us that whatever the rules of the order permitted, and the house could furnish, should be at our service. With this friendly welcome he withdrew, repeating the cordial grasp, and respectfully bowing as he retired.

We were then desired by the obsequious monk to follow him, and respectfully motioned to sit upon a small wooden form in the entrance-hall. Immediately we had complied with his instructions he disappeared; and a pair of folding doors upon our right hand being suddenly but gently thrown open, two grave old monks in white frocks, with their heads uncovered and eyes abased, slowly entered and prostrated themselves before us, with their heads resting upon our feet. In this posture they remained to our great uneasiness, not knowing if we were expected to return the compliment, for about two minutes, when they rose, and, after several profound inclinations, beckoned us mysteriously to follow them. We were then conducted along a short corridor to the door of the church, where we each received, at the finger tips of our reverend attendants, the proper quantity of holy water, from the benitier, necessary to perform the usual ceremony upon entering a Romish temple. After this, we ascended by a short flight of stairs to a small gallery, called the tribune, for the purpose of adoring the sacrament, which we perceived, by the suspended light in the body of the church, was deposited in the sanctuary on the altar. A few minutes having been passed by our attendants in prayer, we were reconducted to the entrance-hall, and re-seated on the oaken bench, with the two monks on either side of us; whilst one of them, having drawn from his pocket a small book, read various passages from the Scriptures, and some reflections from “The Imitation of Jesus Christ,” relating to charity and the entertainment of strangers. At the conclusion of the lecture, our reverend servitors once more placed themselves before us in an attitude of humility; and rising, gradually retired, with their faces towards us, profoundly inclining their bodies to the most abject obeisances.

Our friend, the guardian of our passports, now reappeared, and in due form, and with proper pantomimic action, consigned us to the charge of the little spare door-keeper, who had made his appearance from a small cupboard beneath the staircase; and whose gait, and every action, resembled more the fawning of a quadruped, than the portance of a human biped. The door, however, was no sooner closed behind us, and we were fairly in the ambient air of heaven, than the same garrulity which we had before witnessed in the monk who had guided us to the mansion, manifested itself in the creature who was conveying us thence.—“You are English?—You have a queen to govern you?—Is the great tunnel under the river at London finished?”—and many other like inquiries, occupied the time of our passing from the mansion of the monastery, to the quarter set apart for the accommodation of strangers. At the hôtellerie we were welcomed by the père hôtelier, a tall athletic man, apparently between sixty and seventy years of age, yet bearing upon his somewhat attenuated visage “the bloom of gaudy years.” The good nature developed in his every look, and the cordiality of his greeting, showed that we should find in him, not only a friend, but a companion, during our sojourn. Having partaken, at the recommendation of our host, of a slight refreshment, consisting of bread, pears, and a glass or two of cider, we were conducted up a spacious staircase, along a short corridor, lined on each side with the chambers set apart for the use of strangers, and which are severally distinguished by the name of a saint inscribed upon the lintels of their respective doors. “St. Onesimus” and “St. Cesaria” having been assigned to us by the père hôtelier, we entered and took possession; and, having but a short time before the dinner hour, proceeded quickly to avail ourselves of the convenience which our own rooms offered, of completing the long-deferred and much-needed operation of the toilet. The furniture of our little rooms consisted of a small trundle bed, a table, two chairs, washing equipage, a small black crucifix, and one or two religious books, besides many other little conveniences, even down to the minutiae of slippers and a night-cap.

At half eleven o'clock the bell sounded for dinner, and, descending to the refectory, we seated ourselves at a well-spread table, in company with fourteen or fifteen priests, who, like ourselves, were visitors to the brotherhood. The dinner, which is always leguminous, consisted of soup and potatoes, peas, parsnips, cabbage, &c., variously cooked, but devoid of all seasoning, save oil and salt.

To our taste, no dish appeared so piquant as the soup, the ingredients of which were cabbage, cabbage-stumps, and pea-shells. The bare mention of such a compound may perhaps disturb the gourmand's vitiated ideas of propriety; yet it serves to show how much that is oftentimes rejected in culinary preparations as useless garbage, is capable of furnishing, especially to the poorer class, not only a nutritious but a savoury meal.

During the dinner, a religious essay was read aloud by the père hôtelier, stationed at the head of the table to keep a surveillance over the service of the guests, who are not permitted to converse, except in whispers.

The meal having been completed, and the usual thanksgivings returned, our party separated to pursue their respective studies; whilst we set forth to gather, from personal observation, whatever of interesting detail might be obtained relative to the Monks and the Monastery of La Trappe.

Such, then, was “the process of our admission” into the monastery of La Trappe, where we continued for some time to reside, passing our days in studying, attending the devotions of the religious, or roaming about the woods which encircle this seclusion. Like many of our compatriots, who gather their information of this fraternity from the huge tomes which are extant upon cœnobitic establishments, or the crude, and not always locally-derived remarks of the continental tourist, we had expected to take up our abode with a set of emaciated starvelings, moving hither and thither, scared by despair or affrighted by the self-accusing taunts of conscious guilt, whose days drag through in one continuous prayer and penance,—whose only colloquy is the sigh-whispered ejaculation, “Remember, brother, you must die!” and whose only recreation is to muse over a half-dug pit, in the fond anticipatory thought, “This grave may be for me.”* But personal observation convinced us how erroneous was the opinion we had formed, and how grossly La Trappe, and the behaviour of its members, have been misrepresented. It would be difficult, perhaps, to find more perfect content, or general cheerfulness of deportment, than that which is visible amongst the Trappist fraternity.

Upon our first application at the monastery gate we were answered with smiles; we were introduced and welcomed with smiles; and, at all times during our sojourn, saluted at meeting with smiles. There is, it is true, a sombreness often to be observed upon the visages of the professed; but this is not the scowl of discontent or the lour of despair—it is the placidity of resignation never lit up by the fitful flashings of evil thought, or the serenity of hope never beamed on by a ray of terrestrial happiness.

No joy of heart the vernal breeze awakes
Nor gladness of the soul, when summer has
The landscape all enamelled with fair blossom.
No jocund song at autumn-tide is heard,
When Nature holds her annual revelry: the thought
Of God is summer, autumn, all to them
Who only death desire, and heaven beyond.

With respect to the monotonous repetition of

* The admired French writer Chateaubriand, who is too apt, when discoursing of matters which in any degree relate to his darling tenets of religion, to describe the incidents of his own ferrid imagination, rather than the realities of fact, has fallen into the common error respecting the Trappists. The following is a passage from his “Génie du Christianisme,” chap. vi.—“Voulez vous maintenant transporter à La Trappe, et contempler ces moines vêtus d'un sac, qui béchent leurs tombes! Voulez vous les voir errer comme des ombres dans cette grande forêt de Mortagne, et au bord de cet étang solitaire! Le silence marche à leurs côtés; ou s'ils se parlent quand ils se rencontrent, c'est pour se dire seulement, Frères, il faut mourir.”

"memento mori," or any other similar ejaculation which, it has been asserted, are the only colloquies permitted amongst the Trappists, the truth is that such are never uttered. The vow of silence which is imposed upon the professed, prohibiting them to interchange any kind of conversation, instructive, consolatory, or otherwise. Nor is oral correspondence alone forbidden, but even the use of an unnecessary gesticulation, which is considered as criminal as the utterance of a syllable. However, the communication of ideas, when it is indispensable, is effected by signs, which have been in use from the first establishment of the order, and are described in a dictionary, of great antiquity, kept here for the education of neophytes or the convenience of reference. But this rigorous taciturnity, being for the edification only of the community, it is necessary it should, in some instances, and upon certain occasions, be relaxed. Accordingly, there are three members of the fraternity who are excepted from its operation. These are, the abbot, who is permitted to speak both to the religious and strangers, but not in any of the sacred places, such as the chapter, refectory, chapel, cloisters, &c.; the Abbé-Mère, who may speak to the visitors under his care, when it is necessary, but never to any of the brotherhood; and the cellerier, or steward, who is allowed at all times, in the discharge of his functions, to converse with visitors, workmen, or the religious.

But why, it may be asked, this eternal silence? What reason can be given by the observers of so peculiar a regulation? They answer, To every necessary word is joined two useless words, and that it is more easy to keep perfect silence than to preserve a moderation in the length of discourse: conversation, when necessary, by signs presents more difficulties than oral discourse, and is less liable to be abused. The philosophy of the Trappist, in this, as in all the regulations of his condition, seems to be the desire, not to speak well, but live well; not to charm men by a brilliancy of wit, but edify them by the practice of solid virtues; not to awe others by the flash of eloquence, but to triumph over himself, and to conquer the desires of a corrupt nature.

It must not, however, for one moment be supposed, that the life of a Trappist passes in a continuous round of complacency, and that the isolated seclusion in which the members of this community dwell together excepts them from the common lot, which, sooner or later, awaits every condition of human existence. The annals of La Trappe record its eras of anarchy; there are dark passages in the biography of its members, and deep scenes of suffering and persecution interspersed with the placid detail of its chronicles: as will appear from the following concise sketch of its history.

The order of La Trappe is based upon the general principles of those institutions which claim St. Benedict for their author, and St. Bernard for their founder. But when the institutions originally founded by these fathers of monachism gradually yielded to the allurements of increasing civilisation, and their several members by degrees relaxed the austerity of their discipline, the order of La Trappe is supposed (by the Romanists) to have preserved the original purity of its establishment, and to have withstood the temptations, which destroyed the discipline of their less scrupulous brothers.*

The generic name of Trappist owes its original to the monastery, which is the subject of this memoir, and which is situated in an extensive valley at the western extremity of the forest of Perche, in the department of L'Orme in Normandy, between the towns of L'Aigle and Mortagne, from which it is equidistant about three leagues. The great forest of La Perche, in which it is embosomed, is one of the most extensive in Normandy; and from the numerous intricate paths which everywhere traverse its recesses, it has received from the natives of the district the sobriquet of "The Trap." The monastery was founded in the year 1140 in the pontificate of Innocent II., and in the reign of Louis VII., by Rotrou II. count of Perche, an intrepid warrior, who distinguished himself in the wars of the first crusade in Spain and Palestine. Having been deputed by his sovereign on a mission to England, he embarked in company with his spouse and many English gentlemen. During the voyage the count and his companions were overtaken by a terrific storm; and being apparently on the point of shipwreck, he made a vow, that if heaven saved him from the threatening danger, he would build a church in honour of the Virgin. In pursuance of his vow, he subsequently erected the promised building, and also founded a monastery in the secluded valley of "The Trap;" and to commemorate the cause of its erection, the roof of the church was constructed in the form of a ship's hull reversed. The newly founded monastery received the appellation of Le Maison Dieu Notre Dame de La Trappe; and the church was in 1214 dedicated by the Archbishop of Rouen to La Mère de Dieu. About eighteen years subsequently to its establishment, Rotrou III., son of the founder, made considerable donations to the memorial of his ancestor, previously to setting out for the crusade in Palestine; and at his return thence deposited here the precious relics which he had collected during his expedition. Several of the pontiffs, especially Eugene III. and Alexander III., subsequently took La Trappe under the protection of the Romish See, and, amongst other immunities, exempted its members from the payment of tithes. There is a tradition that St. Bernard visited this spot; and, to corroborate the account, a grotto is still to be seen in the forest, constructed of flint and calcined glass, and to which, it is reported, the saint was wont to retire and practise the austerities that have rendered his name so famous. This, however, in common with many other similar traditions, appears to be only a monkish tale, narrated by those who believe a locality to receive somewhat of sanctity from the visit of so great a personage, and who are, therefore, interested in its preservation.

Fallen, like many other establishments of the like nature, into the hands of commendatory abbots, this institution remained as an abbey of commendation from the Romish pontif, from the end of the fifteenth century until the era of its reformation and resuscitation, towards the latter end of the seventeenth century; and during the struggles which preceded the entire disseverance of the north of France as an appanage to the crown of England, it became a prey to all the fluctuating incidents of the warfare which then ravaged the country.

In 1660, the number of the community was reduced to seven, who preserved the austerities and peculiarities of their order in garb and name only. Their days passed in idleness, or the pleasures of the chase; and their nights in festivity, or the grosser revellings of debauchery. Their proceedings formed the topics of mirthful conversation amongst the surrounding peasantry; and deterred any one who desired to enter their order, from approaching this scene of iniquity. The consequences of these irregularities were soon manifested in the ruinous disorder everywhere visible. The gardens, formerly renowned for the beauty of their arrangement, and the choiceness of their culture, now appeared as one great wilderness of thorn and weed; the apartments heretofore used as places of retirement for reflection, were converted into stables; and in all the buildings the vice which had infatuated these hypocritical brothers of the cowl, showed marks of its dominion, where formerly the "sanctity of holiness" had hallowed the seclusion. In the midst of this hideous profanity, Armand de Rancé appeared as "Le Grand Reformateur de La Trappe." He was at this time the abbot who held the monastery in commendation, together with many other benefices, and was not, therefore, required to reside at La Trappe; but hearing of the conduct of his community, he hastened thither, determined to remain until the gross immorality, which prevailed, was effectually suppressed.

Desiring rather to win his deluded brothers by persuasive counsel, than to force them to obedience by an exposure to the world, he sought, by every means which reason or religion furnishes, to reclaim them from the iniquity with which their daily life was sullied. But a long familiarity with crime had hardened the heart against persuasion, and closed the deaf ear to conviction. The entreaties which Rancé proposed, instead of mollifying the sinful brotherhood, served only to generate against their good counsellor a spirit of hatred and rancour. Not only was his advice rejected with indifference, but his life, in many instances, placed in jeopardy; and so far did the rebels pursue their disobedience, that upon one occasion, they threatened, if he did not tacitly permit their proceedings, to drown him in an adjoining pond. At length, their fury became so ungovernable, that Louis de Loureux, a colonel in the French army, then in the environs of Mortagne, was induced to offer his services to the Abbé de Rancé, to protect him against the menaces of the monks, whom he had vainly endeavoured to conciliate. Seeing eventually he could not reclaim these backsliding professors, the reformer changed his plan, and after combating with the severest difficulties, succeeded, by the grant of a retiring pension to each member of 400 francs, in effecting their removal, and replacing them with a colony from the abbey of Cîteaux.*

At the epoch of the French Revolution in 1790, the Trappists indulged, for a time, the hope of being excepted from the general decree which had gone forth to interdict monastic vows, and suppress religious houses throughout France. They addressed, to the National Assembly, a memorial for their conservation, and were supported by the suffrages of all the neighbouring municipalities of Mortagne, L'Aigle, Verneuil, Soligny, &c. But all entreaty was useless: an express decree, in which La Trappe was assimilated to other religious orders, at once dissipated the fond hopes which had induced an application to the Assembly.

At this period, there was amongst the religious

* Few lives have been more prosperous, or in their conclusion more exemplary, than that of the Abbé Rancé. At one period of his career, he was no less noted in the world for his rare talents and acquirements, than for the luxury of his living, and the illustrious character of his friends. The bosom companion of Bossuet, he was at the same time the favoured suitor of the Duchesse de Montbaron, who was subsequently, it is reported, the innocent cause of his seeking the retirement of a monastery. To this lady he was passionately attached; and by her, the ardour of his passion, was as fervently reciprocated. The interference, however, of friends, prevented the completion of the lovers' happiness. When at length the lady resolved to elope and to be married privately to her lover. Accordingly, she wrote the particulars of her determination to Rancé, who immediately set out to possess himself of his treasure; but, during his journey, the lady was seized by a malignant fever, which ended in her death. Ignorant of the calamity, Rancé approached the house, under cover of the night, and entered the apartment of his "lady love" by the window, expecting to receive, once more, the fond embrace of welcome. The first object he beheld was a leaden coffin. Removing gently its lid, to satisfy the fearful surmises, which at so mournful a sight were rushing on his mind—behold! the lifeless body of his loved one, with the head severed from the trunk, and placed between the feet. The coffin had been made too short; but to obviate this mistake, the persons, employed to arrange the funeral, had thus mutilated the corpse. This shocking spectacle, and the painful associations which it brought back to his remembrance, determined Rancé never again to mingle with the world, but to pass the remainder of his days under monastic discipline. Such is the romantic account of Rancé's conversion, and respecting which, it should, in justice to his memory, be stated, that the authenticity of his liaison with the lady, who is the subject of the tale, is to be suspected. One of the writers, from whom the account is compiled, states—that the head of the lady was subsequently preserved by Rancé at the monastery of La Trappe, and that it is still religiously conserved there, as a monument of this great benefactor's conversion: which is an assertion not more absurd than false. The more authentic account appears to be, that which assigns the sudden death of the Duke of Orleans, to whom he was almoner, as the incident which occasioned the religious change in the disposition of Rancé. The point, however, is immaterial; it is sufficient to know, that when converted, he surpassed all his contemporaries, in the ardour with which he prosecuted his undertakings; and by the strenuous and consistent employment of rare ability, gained for himself a name, to which even those, who disavow his religious acts, are willing to accord due homage, as to that of a great warrior against hypocrisy and abuse.

at La Trappe, a young enthusiast, known by the appellation of Dom Augustin, who, unwilling that the community, with which he had allied himself, should be dissolved without an exertion for its salvation, formed the design of emigrating to some foreign country, where its members might receive a friendly permission to continue their life of seclusion. Accordingly, having obtained the sanction of his superior, he framed an address to the Swiss government, begging to be received under its protection. The prayer of this petition was duly accorded; and the expatriated recluse revived his hope of enjoying a beloved solitude beneath the shadow of some Helvetican crag, or finding a home amongst the pine-clad hills of Switzerland.

On the day appointed (26th April, 1791) for the departure of the exiles, many of those who had signed the petition, and expressed their desire to seek retirement in a foreign land, rather than return to the society of the world, grew faint-hearted at the thoughts of leaving a spot, which was hallowed by their first tear of repentance, and where the first altar of their propitiation had been erected. But Dom Augustin appearing as their chosen leader, assembled his dejected companions upon a sloping glade of the forest, before the grotto of St. Bernard. Here he addressed them as fellow-sufferers:—He reproached them with indecision; and taunted them as unworthy to be numbered with their predecessors, whose bones were reposing in the valley beneath: he invoked the mighty shades of Bernard, of Benedict, of Rancé—and applying to his sorrowing auditors the language of Isaiah, “The Lord will comfort Zion, and will comfort all her waste places:” he showed to them, through the vistas of the forest where they were assembled, the road which led to their land of promise. This harangue produced the desired effect, and the departure was at once voted with acclamation. A small cart having been prepared to convey the relics and instruments of penitence, each one bearing a satchel at his back, placed himself in the order of march, and turning one lingering look towards the forsaken home, moved in silent procession up the hill, hitherto known only as the revered barrier which shut out all access to the world. Arrived, after many toils in the canton of Fribourg, at one league from Val Sainte, the exiles set up their cross in a secluded valley, skirted on every side by snow-capped mountains; and possessing themselves of an old mansion, which had been long vacated, they re-established the rites and discipline which they had formerly practised at La Trappe. In a short time, this newly-founded institution received the affluence of so many converts, that colonies were sent out hence into various parts of Europe and America. However, when the conquests of Napoleon had rendered Switzerland a tributary to France, the monks were enforced to break up their seclusion at Val Sainte; to which, however, after wandering into Germany, Russia, England, and many other parts of Europe, they were permitted to return in 1802. But the abdication of Napoleon in 1815, and the consequent restoration of affairs to their former condition, brought to the Trappists in Switzerland the joyful promise of return to the valley of La Trappe, and the desolate and desecrated halls of their fondly remembered dwelling. The enthusiastic Dom Augustin, who had led the departure, now headed the return of the exiles from Val Sainte. Their first care, on reaching the well known spot, was to purchase the monastery from the hands of the person who, in the general scramble of the Revolution, had become its possessor. But a heap of ruins only marked the site of their revered Bethel,—the ivy had festooned the portals of their temple—the briar arose upon the basements of the revered statues—and the howl of the fox, or moaning of the owl, supplied the canticle of adoration. Even the graves of their ancestors had not escaped the general desolation. The tomb of their beloved Rancé was levelled with the dust; and the little cross, which here and there had marked the lowly resting-place of a brother was carried hence to feed the blaze of some peasant's hearth. An old granary, that had escaped the almost universal ravage, served as a temporary chapel during the period which elapsed between the return of the fraternity in 1815, until the completion of the new church in 1833; and notwithstanding the unsettled condition of France at the epoch of the revolution in 1830, the Trappists continued to work at the re-erection of their buildings; and on the 30th of August, 1833, the new church, which had been raised upon the ashes of the ancient one, was consecrated with great splendour by the Bishop of Seer, in the presence of a vast assemblage from all parts of France.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN TORIES AND WHIGS, ILLUSTRATED BY THE LAW OF LIBEL.

THE Whigs have been in the habit of denouncing the Tories for retaining and making laws unfavourable to the liberty of the press. What have the Whigs done, during the years they have been in office, to amend Tory legislation regarding the press? The Whigs remind us, often enough, that the Tories passed the six gagging acts of 1819 (they say nothing of the Whig collusion which facilitated the passing of these acts;) how comes it that the Whigs, during their ten years reign, have never found time or inclination to repeal the four of these acts which have not expired? The truth is, that Whigs are willing that Tories should have the discredit of passing bad laws, and that Whigs should have the use of them; just as Tories are willing that Whigs should have the odium of plunging this country into war, in order that Tories may have the emolument of carrying it on.

We will take the law of libel as what lawyers call a "case in point."

What is a libel? A Whig authority, the Edinburgh Review, says:—"The definition given of the offence by Mr. Bentham is scarcely an exaggeration. 'Any thing which any body at any time may be pleased to dislike for any reason.' The late Lord Ellenborough defined it thus:—"Any thing which hurts the feelings of any body." The definition of a libel according to the common law is:—"Any thing which may tend to induce the person or thing libelled to commit a breach of the peace." There is no law declaring a libel to be criminal, or defining what a libel is. The crime of publishing a libel is what is called a crime at common law: the first libeller punished was condemned, the judge said, because he had broken the common law—a law which does not exist in the form of any statute—a law which the culprit did not know was in existence—a law which did not exist until the judge made it by his decision. Every subsequent libeller has been punished because the first judge's fictio (or lie) of "common law" was a precedent.

We have not yet stated half the atrocity of this libel law, as it is called. A libel is not a crime, until a jury, by its verdict, makes it one. Any man can tell whether a certain act is a theft; any man can tell whether a certain act is a homicide; but no man can say of a book, paragraph, or pamphlet, that it is a libel, until a jury has declared it to be one. And upon what evidence does a jury come to the conclusion that any publication is a libel? A witness is produced, who swears he purchased the obnoxious publication; the counsel for the prosecution states that, in his opinion, the publication is a libel; the counsel for the defendant, that, in his opinion, it is not a libel; the judge then recapitulates what the counsel on both sides have said, and adds that, in his opinion, the publication is a libel; and the jury return a verdict in conformity with the opinion of the judge.

The libel law is bad, but that is not all—it is enforced by an unnecessarily oppressive and vexatious procedure. "We will now," says the author of an excellent tract on the law of libel, published in 1823, "proceed to describe the mode pursued in a libel prosecution:—1. The attorney-general files an ex-officio information; or any body selects a passage or two from a book, puts them in the form of a bill, and goes before a grand jury. Here he swears to the purchasing of the book which contains the alleged libel; and if the grand jury think the book contains a libel, although not a man among them can tell what a libel is, they find the bill. In either case the first thing a man knows of having sold a libel is generally from a sheriff's officer, who seizes and locks him up in a prison. And now commences a series of most vexatious and expensive circumstances; bail must be given; no matter who may be offered as bail, the prosecuted person will not be released from prison till after twenty-four hours' notice from the time he is able to give notice of bail, in the prescribed form; and then the bail must attend the judge and be questioned; an attorney must be employed, and various expenses incurred."

We may remark parenthetically, that the holding to bail in cases of alleged libel is a comparatively recent innovation, and that the history of its introduction is instructive. On the 25th of March 1808, a motion was made in the House of Commons, that certain revenue laws be read; and, "the same having been read," it was "ordered that leave be given to bring in a bill for amending the law with regard to the course of proceeding on indictments and informations in the Court of King's Bench, in certain cases; for authorizing the execution, in Scotland, of certain warrants issued for offences committed in England; and for requiring officers taking bail in the king's suit, to assign the bail-bonds to the king; and that Mr. Attorney-general (Sir Vicary Gibbs,) Mr. Solicitor-general (Sir Thomas Plomer,) and the Master of the Rolls (Sir William Grant,) do prepare and bring it in." Who would have expected that any thing likely to affect the liberty of persons accused of libel would be found in this Revenue Regulation Bill? The preamble declares, that "the law with regard to the course of proceeding in indictments and informations in the Court of King's Bench, in certain cases relating to the public revenue having been found beneficial (i. e. by holding persons to bail for their appearance, who had committed a breach of the statute,) it is expedient to extend the same to other cases." And the statute then enacts, that "whenever any person shall be charged with any offence for which he or she may be prosecuted by indictment or information in his majesty's Court of King's Bench, not being treason or felony, and the same shall be made to appear to any judge of the same court by affidavit, or by certificate of an indictment or information being filed against such person in the said court for such offence," the judge may cause the party to be apprehended, and held to bail; and, "in case any such person shall neglect or refuse (it might have been added—'or be unable') to become bound," it shall be lawful for the judge "to commit such person to the common jail of the county, city, or place where the offence shall have been committed." The statute thus sneakily introduced into the House of Commons is the only authority for holding a person to bail for an alleged seditious libel. "Ah, but," says one of our Whig friends, "that was a Tory trick." Wait a little; although the bill does not occupy four pages of the usual parliamentary printing, not a single member of the Opposition took the trouble to read it. The bill was introduced, and read a first time, on the above mentioned Friday, the 25th of March, 1808,—read a second time at the next sitting of the house, on the Monday following, committed on the Tuesday, reported on the Wednesday, passed on the Thursday, and sent to the Lords on the Friday, and their concurrence requested. One of the most atrocious encroachments upon the liberties of the subject this century has witnessed, was allowed by the Whig guardians of the people's rights, to pass through the House of Commons unchallenged, and with railroad speed. We give their partisans their choice between neglect of duty and treachery. In the House of Peers, the progress of the bill, owing to the acumen of the late Earl Stanhope, was a little retarded; but, after a desultory half-hearted attack by the Whig lords, passed, by a majority of thirteen to six!

After this brief sketch of the character and history of the law of libel, and the means of carrying it into execution, our readers will be in a condition to appreciate the grace with which the Whigs have made use of it since they came into power.

The first case that attracts our notice is that of Lovett and Collins, tried at Warwick for a seditious libel in August, 1839. Before proceeding to look into the specialties of this case, we may remark, that the mode of proceeding against these men, by trying them for a libel, was a gross desertion of principle on the part of a government calling itself liberal. What the government wished to prove them guilty of, was sedition. By accusing them of publishing a seditious libel, the Attorney-general enabled himself to dispense with proving anything but the publication of the document called a seditious libel. Had Lovett and Collins been arraigned for sedition, acts must have been proved, and the circumstances under which these acts had been committed; and out of the body of evidence would have arisen the questions of intention and tendency; and, upon the discussion of these matters, the jury would have been enabled to form a judgment whether Lovett and Collins had or had not done anything seditious. But, by accusing them of a seditious libel, the Attorney-general was only called upon to prove that the prisoners had published a certain document. He called that document a libel in his indictment; the judge said he was of opinion that it was a libel; and, in deference to the dicta of the judge, and the first law-officer of the crown, the jury found that Lovett and Collins had published a seditious libel; when, in truth, it was only proved before them (and even that imperfectly,) that Lovett and Collins had published three resolutions, agreed to at a meeting of certain persons. There was no proof of the intention of the prisoners, no proof of the tendency of the publication—the two things which constitute a libel. The Attorney-general, and the government which employs him, knew that this would be the result; and it was on this account that they prosecuted Lovett and Collins for a seditious libel. The Tories, when they were turned out of power, left in existence this iniquitous practice of the courts, (law we cannot call it,) which enables a government to procure the punishment of obnoxious individuals without producing evidence of their guilt; the Whigs, during their reign of ten years, have not taken one step to get the practice reformed; and the first opportunity they have had, the Whigs have availed themselves of this engine of oppression—this anomaly in a free constitution of government—to crush their adversaries.

This is bad enough (although Whig partisans now-a-days seem to think, that they have said enough in vindication of their masters, when they have told us, that what they do the Tories did before them;) but worse remains behind. Having procured the condemnation of their adversaries by Tory means, the Whigs have prosecuted their advantage with a mean and callous vindictiveness, of which even the Tories were never guilty.

We have already adverted to the oppressive character of the enactment by which bail is exacted from persons accused of libel, and who, under that pretext, may be subjected to imprisonment before they are found guilty. We do not at present remember any instance of a party, imprisoned upon an accusation of libel, being treated as a felon under the Tory régime: that improvement upon the libel law, was reserved for a Whig dynasty. From the petition of Lovett and Collins, presented to the House of Commons, on the 18th of July, 1839, it appears, that when arrested upon the charge of a seditious libel, bail was demanded, in the sum of £1000,—that is £500 from each of the petitioners, and two securities in £250 each. Until this bail should be forthcoming, they (two poor operatives) were committed to the county jail of Warwick; and during the time of their detention there, they were treated as felons. The fact of their having been so treated, is proved by the report of the visiting-magistrates of Warwick jail, laid upon the table of the House of Commons, on the 25th of July. The magistrates do not contradict a single statement in the petition of Lovett and Collins; they only attempt to palliate the circumstances, by alleging reasons in extenuation, and obtaining affidavits from a couple of turnkeys and a couple of felons, to prove that Lovett and Collins did not at the time appear annoyed by their treatment. The prisoners were too stout-hearted to gratify their tormentors by weak complaints; and, therefore, the visiting-magistrates infer that they suffered nothing! It will probably be said by Whig apologists, that Lovett and Collins experienced this treatment at the hands of the local authorities, who are Tories. We will allow this statement to pass at its full worth, at this stage of our tale; suggesting merely, that these local authorities, appointed by the crown, holding office during its pleasure, are still kept in office by the Whigs.

After being found guilty of a "seditious libel," Lovett and Collins were sentenced to be imprisoned for twelve months in Warwick jail. Government and the Attorney-general knew by this time how they had been treated in Warwick jail previous to trial. Government and the Attorney-general knew that the local authorities pretended not to have it in their power to treat prisoners in any other manner. Government and the Attorney-general knew that the treatment of the prisoners, after sentence, could not be less rigorous than before trial. Yet, government and the Attorney-general allowed Lovett and Collins to be sent back to Warwick jail. During the worst times of Tory persecution, prisoners, under sentence for seditious libel, or for blasphemous libel, were never classed with felons, nor subjected to the same discipline. In 1792, Mr Ridgway, bookseller, was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for seditious libel. Mr Ridgway saw his friends in Newgate, and was at liberty in every respect, except that he could not get out of doors. In 1793, the Rev. Mr. Winterbottom was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for sedition libel. He married while in Newgate, and published a history of America, in four octavo volumes, with an Atlas of plates. In 1799, the Rev. Gilbert Wakefield, sentenced to two years' imprisonment for seditious libel, was confined in Dorchester jail, but subjected to no particular restraint. In 1801, Thomas Spence, father of the Spenceans, was imprisoned for one year in Salisbury jail, where he was well treated. In 1810, William Cobbett was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for a seditious libel. While in Newgate, he had apartments in the keeper's house; was subjected to no restraint, beyond what was necessary for his safe custody; and carried on his Weekly Register. In 1811, Leigh Hunt was imprisoned in Horsemonger-lane jail for a seditious libel. He had apartments, not in the prison, which he fitted up with great taste, and in which he received daily visits from his friends at all hours. In 1820, Sir Francis Burdett, sentenced to the Marshalsea, for seditious libel, lived in the Marshal's house—gave his word of honour not to go away—and saw what company he pleased. Such was the punishment of seditious libelists in the alarmist periods of the French Revolution and the Manchester massacre—under Pitt and Castlereagh. The Tories feared and hated "seditious libels;" but they did not venture so far to outrage public morals, as to represent the seditious libelist as necessarily an infamous character. They did not venture upon inflicting punishments altogether disproportionate. They made some distinction between the felon and the angry controversialist.

Let us now see how the Whigs treat "seditious libellers," in the persons of Lovett and Collins. They were placed on the felon's side in Warwick jail, and subjected to the same discipline as the rest of the prisoners in that department. They were confined in a cell. Their allowance of food was insufficient for the preservation of their health. They were only allowed to see their friends once in three months. They were not allowed to correspond even with their wives, unless their letters were examined previously to their being sent off. A letter from Lovett to his mother was not allowed to pass out, because it contained the following sentences—"expressive of feelings which the magistrates did not approve of":—

"I regret to hear that you are making yourself uneasy on my account; and, therefore write to assure you, that I am in tolerably good health, and that the cause for which I am here will never, I trust, cause my spirits to fail me. You naturally feel pained to hear of your son being the inmate of a prison; but, at the same time, I know your sound discrimination will lead you to perceive that imprisonment is not alone confined to the guilty. Some of the best and most exalted of men have met with imprisonment, and oftentimes death, in the prosecution of truth, humanity, and justice; and, with no ambition for political martyrdom, I hope to see the cause triumphant for which I am now suffering; and if I do not, I shall feel satisfied that the object was worthy of my humble sacrifice in its support. An unworthy cause and a bad conscience render the best home intolerable, while the consciousness of a righteous pursuit casts a ray of cheerfulness and hope around the cell of a prison. I pray you, therefore, do not be disheartened on my account; rather rejoice that your industry and good example planted the seeds of investigation and inquiry in the mind of your son, which led him onward in the pursuit of truth, regardless of consequences, and established in him a zealous determination to make mankind the better for his existence. Had you been neglectful of my youth, had you been an example of indolence or profligacy, I might have been in this, or even a worse situation, criminated in mind, and with far different feelings of heart towards you, than those I now entertain."

This attempt of a son in prison, to alleviate the anxiety of his mother, the Warwickshire magistrates (genuine representatives of those of Shakespeare's day) "did not approve of." There is nothing stilted in the style that rings hollow; and, having the honour to know William Lovett, we can bear witness, that these are the unaffected sentiments of his heart, and that his conduct, through life shows that they exercise a regulating influence over his actions. But language like this the Warwickshire magistrates were incapable of comprehending; and, consequently, they "did not approve" of it. We return to the privations of the prisoners. Applications, by themselves and friends, to be allowed to purchase a little extra food, were rejected. A letter sent from Birmingham to Collins, on the 14th of October, giving him an account of a petition in his favour, by several non-political gentlemen of that town, was kept back from him till the 22d. Great care seems to have been taken that they should read nothing "improper." The following passage, in a letter from Lovett to his wife, we quote, as an illustration of the paltry peddling of "these authorities."

"I have received the books you sent me, excepting the numbers of Chambers's Journal, the Westminster Review, and Tait's Magazine, which, I understand, are to be more scrupulously examined than the other works, to see if they are fit books for us to have."

Let it not be said that these restrictions, unwarranted by a simple sentence of imprisonment, occasioned merely imaginary inconvenience to the prisoners. Their health gave way under it. Even the robust frame of John Collins was affected; and the more delicate constitution of Lovett has been shattered to an extent that forced him to seek the reinvigoration of his frame in an excursion to his native county of Cornwall—to an extent that affords slender hope of entire convalescence.

And now we come to a question which we in part waved before. How far were the visiting-magistrates of Warwick jail alone to blame for the illegal increase of the punishment of Lovett and Collins? or how far are ministers to be blamed? A word from the Attorney-general, when the sentence was pronounced, would have altered the destination of the prisoners; and from the way in which they had been treated in Warwick jail before trial, the Attorney-general and his masters knew well what kind of treatment awaited them there after sentence. During the whole of the controversy which has been waged in and out of parliament relative to the treatment of Lovett and Collins, ministers have not attempted to defend their treatment, and by attempting to shift the responsibility, they have tacitly admitted that it was indefensible. But ministers knew beforehand to what treatment they were sending these men; they could have had them sent elsewhere; they have allowed others to perpetrate for them illegal cruelties which they, in their vindictiveness, wished to see inflicted, but, in their cowardice, durst not inflict. When the humane gentlemen who took an interest in the case of Lovett and Collins, applied to ministers, they were told, "the visiting-magistrates are the only parties who have the power to set matters to rights." When they applied to the magistrates, they were told, "The Secretary of State alone has the power." Without pretending to say that the prisoners were not harshly treated, these two sets of worthies kept bandying from one to the other the task of redressing the wrong. While we read their respective arguments to show that it was no duty of theirs to act in consistency with common humanity, we feel inclined to address them in the words of the Antiquary, when told by the chaise-driver that he was not bound to replace the shoe the horse had lost, that Jamie Somebody was bound to uphold the beast in shoes:—"And when you go,—to where you deserve, sir, who do you think is to uphold you for your inhumanity?"

Ministers knew beforehand, from the experience of the treatment Lovett and Collins had experienced in prison before trial, how the magistrates would act. Ministers knew beforehand that the visiting-magistrates, with one exception, were bigoted Tories, who made their dislike to Chartists a personal feeling. Ministers persisted in pretending to believe that the reports of the visiting magistrates, bearing that the health of Lovett and Collins was not injuriously affected by their treatment in jail, was true, although Lord John Russell was in possession of a letter, from the only liberal politician among them, containing these statements:—

"The whole of the visiting-magistrates, with the exception of myself, consider that this is no case for their interference; as they said, they thought the offence for which Lovett and Collins were convicted was one of the gravest kind. Again I beg to inform your lordship, that I was present when the certificate of —, the surgeon of the jail, was signed by all the other visiting-magistrates: I declined to sign the document, and stated my reasons, as I felt confident, from my own observations, that the contrary was the fact, and that William Lovett is not in good health. Before I left Warwick, yesterday morning, I saw both the prisoners, Lovett and Collins, in the jail, and they were both looking very ill. I am therefore anxious that your lordship should send your own medical attendant to see Lovett, and to report the state of his health. I will gladly pay the expenses of his visit."

This letter produced no effect upon the predetermination of ministers to leave the prisoners to the tender mercies of the visiting-magistrates; but it is worthy of remark, that in the Return, printed by order of the House of Commons, 14th February, 1840, purporting to be "Copies of any Memorials or Correspondence relating to the treatment of William Lovett and John Collins, now prisoners in Warwick gaol," this letter is suppressed, along with some others. The suppression of such a document is an awkward confession on the part of ministers; and not less awkward is the practical confession involved in the fact, that a short time before Lovett's liberation, he was fed upon beef-steaks and port wine to keep him from sinking entirely.

This, then, is what the Whigs have done with the law of libel. They inherited it, an instrument of oppression, from the Tories; they have carefully preserved it, and rendered it more stringent; they have increased the punishment of an anomalous offence, not indeed by smuggling an act of parliament through the House of Commons, as the Tories did in 1808, but by what is still worse, sanctioning the perversion of an act meant to regulate the treatment of felons alone, to a totally different class of offenders. When they are turned out of office, as they soon must be, they will restore to the Tories their original instrument of torture for political offenders, much improved for their purposes.

We have sought, in the case we have been reviewing, to apportion impartially to Whigs and Tories their respective shares of merit, in making the law of libel what it is. It would be unjust to pass over unnoticed the share which some "respectable" people seem determined to have in the perpetuation of this Whig-Tory gag upon the expression of opinion. An arrangement between the Chartists of Edinburgh and the middle-class liberals, who called a meeting to congratulate the Queen on her recent delivery, and to suggest a political amnesty, was broken off because the said middle-class liberals were not certain that the provost would allow such a motion to be put. Why did not the try? In Glasgow, the very name of an amnesty was hooted down by "the loyalists," met to pass a congratulatory address. In France, occasions of gladness in the royal family have more than once been made the pretexts for according pardon to political offenders. The Whig newspapers have repeatedly blamed Louis Philippe for allowing his amnesties to lose half their grace by his tardiness. What are these newspapers, and the gobe-mouches who allow them to dictate their opinions to them, saying, now that the birth of a princess has afforded the Queen a fair excuse for exercising the royal prerogative of mercy? An extension of pardon to all who are now suffering punishment for any political offences, short of actual violence, would, at this moment, be less an act of mercy than of strict justice. The case of Lovett and Collins shows how the law has been strained, in order to get them punished. The extending the punishment of felons to political offenders, is most dangerous to liberty. It is the Scotch cases of Muir and Gerald over again. It has a tendency to lower the self-respect of the individuals punished, and to impress the advocates of these opinions with a brand which injures their cause; and when the members of the unprivileged, the suffering classes alone, are visited by this excess of punishment, it necessarily renders them bitter and vindictive towards all who participate in inflicting the wrong. If the liberals of the middle classes sincerely wish to see a reunion between themselves and the working classes brought about, they have here a fair opportunity of hastening that desirable end. If they hang back, their conduct will only admit of one interpretation—that they are animated by a cowardly, vindictive feeling, towards those who have troubled their repose.

Mere selfishness might prompt them to do what is right in this matter. The precedent afforded, by the treatment of "libellers" among the working classes, by the present ministry, may, by the next, be extended to the middle classes. If any thing is to be done, it must be done quickly; and the public must take the management of the business into its own hands. From ministers there is nothing to hope, and without their advice the crown can originate nothing. It remains to be asked: Would a Whig Opposition have quietly submitted to what a Whig Government has done?

RECORDS OF REAL LIFE IN THE PALACE AND THE COTTAGE.*

WE are astonished that this work has not made more noise, first in the fashionable, and then in the lower spheres, if not for its merits, which are various and considerable, then for its anecdotes, gossip, and malice: the last word we beg our readers to understand in the French sense, and not in the bitter British signification of the term. Miss Pigott's work is not more remarkable for telling what few travelling ladies besides herself could have had opportunities to know, than for the insight it affords into the modes of life, habits of thought, and, indeed, the entire manner of being, of no inconsiderable portion of the English, German, and French aristocracy.

The authoress, belonging by birth to one of those proud families of ancient English gentry, who "came in with the Conqueror," and who look down with something bordering on contempt upon two-thirds of the peerage, must, we presume, have been "of a certain age" when the restoration of the Bourbons permitted her to visit the continent, where she has since spent many years. In several instances, she was among the first of the English ladies who repaired to those German watering-places, since grown into fame. Whether on account of novelty, her good introductions, or a talisman which she carried, and which we shall afterwards describe, or her birth and connexions, this lady was much more freely received than it is at all usual with ordinary English travellers not only at the petty German courts, and at Brussels and the Hague, but in the castles and country residences of the nobility. This, we apprehend, is not now at all usual even with the well-certificated English. There might have been pity for her as a "lone gentlewoman." She evidently was not troubled with mauvaise honte; she travelled in respectable if not lordly style, possessed many accomplishments, and the talisman to which we have alluded. This was a collection of the portraits of remarkable persons, taken by herself, which everybody was anxious to see, while many were desirous of having their own likenesses added to Miss Pigott's recherché collection of notabilities and beauties. Ennui is the disease of German, as of other petty courts; and inordinate curiosity about trifles is one of ennui's most harmless modes of seeking relief. Miss Pigott seems to have understood the case fully. It was made a favour to see her portfolios, and a greater favour still to be added to the select number of her chosen "beautiful and brave," celebrated, and high-born. The portfolio was in Germany her passé-partout; but, without the circumstances of her rank and connexion, even it might have failed. At all events, and whatever may have been the concurring causes, she saw, and that closely, a great deal of continental character and manners, from "the palace to the cottage;" and she is in certain respects a shrewd observer, and always a frank speaker; so that, after the endless volumes of continental travels with which the public have been favoured, no writer displays so much of the aristocratic domestic life of Germany as this lady, save Captain Basil Hall; and his experience is limited to one Schloss and its rural neighbourhood. On French society, and especially that of the Faubourg St. Germain, Miss Pigott is equally communicative. But either the field is less rich, or time has impaired the traveller's powers; for the latter half of her work, referring to a period many years subsequent to her visit to Germany, is in every respect inferior to her early letters. She seems even to have forgotten her own language, and the style is as faulty as the matter is often trivial. Our review is, therefore, nearly limited to the first half of the work. The whole purports to have been revised by Galt in the last days of his life. Lady Charlotte Bury, also, appears to have had some concern in the affair; and she has taken the opportunity of speaking handsomely and kindly of poor Galt; which, so far as we know, no other literary friend has yet done.

The form of the early part of the work is letters, which are addressed to the female friends of the writer in France and England, in the style of Lady Mary Wortley's epistles; to which Mr. Galt fancies Miss Pigott's quite equal. The travelling English, then first let loose on the continent, after a twenty years' embargo, with their senseless pride, their absurd caprices, and ridiculous humours, furnish some of the most piquant passages in these letters. Miss Pigott had been for some time in Paris; but we first hear of her at Brussels, then the pet sojourn of the English, to which the presence of the Duke of Kent and the Duke of Wellington gave attraction; and where intrigues amorous and political, private theatricals, and violent quarrels about rival preachers, were the leading amusements of the English society of the time. From thence, when the season was over, Miss Pigott repaired to Spa; before the taste, and endless wants, and gold, of the English had improved the accommodations of that celebrated spot. Une dame Anglaise was a prodigious curiosity at that period; and the bold pedestrian and solitary rambling habits which Miss Pigott had brought from her native country increased the curiosity about so independent a femme sole. Among the first acquaintances whom she made at Spa, was General Evers, and the Baroness his lady, to whom she was introduced by a worthy fat curate, the uncle of the general, who very naturally fancied his nephew the greatest man in the world, and well deserving a place in Miss Pigott's picture-gallery.

As we cannot help thinking that the men and women of real life, where they are at all worth knowing, are quite as attractive and amusing as those of fiction, and a good deal more instructive; and as, with Mrs. Jameson, Mrs. Trollope, and others in our mind, we can refer to no authority where those of Germany are so minutely described by an Englishwoman, we shall borrow this authentic couple from Miss Pigott's portfolio. The scene is Spa.

My levée at breakfast was augmented by the presence of General Evers; his reverend uncle could no longer curb his impatience and terrestrial vanity; therefore, arming himself with stout-heartedness, he came forward (his breviaire as usual in his hand,) to present his star of fame and prowess, the redoubtable commandant of the fortress and town of Namur—a colossal soldier-like figure, exceeding the ordinary stature of man; the very ground seemed to tremble under his firm martial step and fierce warrior bearing. He was, in fact, a man of warlike aspect; the lineaments of his face were prominent, the lower part concealed in ample mustachios. He advanced smoking a long and richly ornamented oriental pipe; the fumes ascending threw out clouds that partially enveloped his military cap, while his quick, keen, clear eyes, seemed to express fearful defiance to every warrior in Christendom.

But I could discern a radiant expression of softer feelings, something of amicable and benevolent thoughts, as he was receiving my cordial salutations of courtesy; for the general's having bravely fought in conjunction with the legions of my country under her illustrious chieftain, was a certain passport to a patriotic British female.

The man of prayer stood there aloof, like a symbol of peace about to extend olive branches o'er the laurels of his valiant nephew; he needed only the olive branch, for he had, as usual, his breviary, which he opened and shut at intervals, that gave him the air of intending to pronounce the benediction over the two beings before him, who were so singularly contrasted in figure, mien, principles, and nativity. Each seated himself at my table, when an animated conversation ensued, highly interesting on the part of the warrior, and that made the hours circulate in unobserved rapidity until noon-day; having smoothed the way to our mutual ease and good understanding, by entering immediately into a few details of his life.

General Evers is of Belgian origin; but soon after his first début in a military career, his country becoming the prey and acquisition of France, he had no other alternative than to enter the French service; and he made his first essay in arms in the school of Moreau; under the auspices of that celebrated man, he served in all the campaigns of the Consular and the Empire. He pretends to have saved the life of the Roman pontiff, the respectable Pius the seventh, from a plot to poison his Holiness; and he confessed that in the impetuosity and confiding candour of youth, he had been led astray to form one in a lawless combination* with twenty colonels who had determined to assassinate Napoleon on his accession to the consularship, from which the prudence of a zealous friend had timely withdrawn him, and prevailed on him to follow loyally whoever became the chieftain of his country; at this part of the nephew's relation, the reverend uncle and preceptor cast a furtive look of shame, as fearing to have excited my contempt of his zeal as a preceptor. On Belgium being ceded to Holland by the fiat of the famous Congress of Vienna, he gave his allegiance to the sovereign of his native land, and his military talents to the Battle of Waterloo; where he acquired an additional quota of fame, with so many glorious wounds, that his general health is irretrievably impaired, and he is come here to make trial of the efficacy of these salubrious warm baths; retiring for a time from the fatiguing government of Namur and the Luxembourg, which his grateful king has lately bestowed, with other honours and tributes to his brave ardour in his service.

Madame la Baronne joined us—a Saxon lady, possessing very striking remains of former personal beauty, that seem to have faded more by the wear and tear of an unquiet mind, than by the usual exhausting effects of time; for there rest on her brow lines of care, and slight furrows, indicative that the fiercer passions of her soul had done their heavier work; her form, which must have once been commanding and replete with dignity, now only exhibits a graceless fierté, and an unlovely vivacity of temperament; a decayed beauty, withered in heart, like a tree in its prime, shorn of its lovely foliage, and blasted by the sharp winds of cheerless November.

She addressed, in wrangling phrases, and unharmonious tones, the modest curate, who cast towards me a significant humorous glance, that expressed, "I know her humours well;" which decided me to keep on amicable terms with my new Saxon acquaintance, for I imagine her displeasure would be formidable to encounter. Even that mirror of hardihood, the general, his nerves ever invulnerable to the cannon's roar, seems to quail under the influence of a wayward female's eloquence.

I terminated the evening by a drive with General Evers and his lady, in their open carriage; but the roughness of the roads incommode the general, rendering his wounds more painful, and the nerves of Madame more irritable; which made me urge an earlier return to head-quarters—that irritable temperament so often perceptible in females, that mars conversation, interrupting the subject in discussion at every moment by wailing plaints, for which there is no additional cause, and which evinces a surmounting spirit of egotism; but there is a redeeming point in the character of Madame, in the excessive attachment she bears to her cara sposo, that gives her a keener foresight of the mutability of his existence under a ruined constitution; although she exemplifies it (unfortunately for both) in the fretful waywardness of a spoilt child, that lessens the interest her domestic position would otherwise excite.

As a picture of German domestic manners, as well as of Miss Pigott's lively style at this period of her life, we shall follow her Spa friends to their villa-residence, near Namur, at which she soon afterwards visited them.

I walked from the port to the excellent hôtel d'Har-champ. The next morning, immediately after breakfast, I was conducted to the humble small villa, bathed by the limpid waters of the Meuse, where retires occasionally my Chaudfontaine friend, General Evers, military governor of Luxembourg. Opening a little wicket I passed into an orchard, then into a garden, not in the best order, where a laquy and two soldiers were assisting some old women in collecting the harvest of autumnal fruits and vegetables. There were golden tinted apples in abundance, without the Hesperides, or their dragon; but there stood a Hercules form, the general, clothed in an old military jacket that rendered his stature still more remarkable; but his countenance was more wan, and an air of increased suffering was expressed in his once commanding figure. The man who had aided Napoleon in slaying thousands, and had since aided our allies in subjugating that military tyrant and his hosts, was now standing in the midst of a numerous feathered tribe, in the peaceful occupation of feeding a flight of thirty pigeons, of the rarest species, from distant climes.

The baron instantly advanced on seeing me, his dignity in nowise ruffled, but seeming rather to increase from the consciousness of the simple solitary style of life in which I discovered him, exclaiming, "Here you find the warrior Evers, sans façon, au sein de sa famille."

"Yes," I replied, "the great general, who has led legions to conquest, is now reposing in the blessings of peace, and its attractive analogous attendants, the prodigal Ceres and Pomona."

After a world of kind greetings, and hospitable courtesies, he returned with complacency to the occupation in which I found him; and while finishing to serve the repasts of his plumed favourites, he named their class in natural history, and their native countries. Till then I had no idea of the variety and beauty of this species of birds of the air;—the Muscovy and the Pologne appeared pre-eminent in brilliancy of feather toilet; with them were promiscuously mingled turkeys, fowls, and ducks. Towards these humbler victims for future culinary skill, and the honours of the banquets of modern days, the baron assumed more dignity, affecting to drive them away with expressions of contempt, turning at the same moment, to caress and receive the caresses of a beautiful fawn confined in a trellis prison. He then led me into the house, stopping to regard a numerous flight of feathered choristers, the canaries, blackbirds, and goldfinches, prisoners in their lattice-wire cages, suspended in the small hall of entrance, where sat the femme de chambre, mending the general's coat, and surrounded by decayed fruit, soiled linen, and other emblems of untidy household disorder; but the salon of reception was neatly arranged. From thence we passed again into disorder, on entering the adjoining bed-chamber, where we found Madame la Barrone just risen from her couch, and under the hands of a dirty-looking provincial hair-dresser,—her lovely chesnut-colour locks falling dishevelled over her shoulders, her fine features sharpened by age, and the havoc of an undisciplined mind; she sat there, a beauty in her decline, amidst remnants of fruit, linen, the dirty strewn pell-mell with the clean. On the walls were hung the handsome portraits of the hero and of Madame, serving as tell-tales of what the living models had been some few years gone by, and also trophies gained in the field and in the chase; tattered banners, sabres, and pistols, were mingled with the spoils of the forests and of the plains.

The general had ordered his caleche, in which we drove forthwith to his town residence, stopping en passant at his traiteur's, to order "bon diner pour huit personnes."

In the saloon hangs the general's portrait in the Belgian full-dress uniform, and under it stands his bust in marble, habited as a French general; in pointing it out to my observation, he said with vivacity:—

"Mademoiselle, I am not ashamed of what I have been, nor of what I now am."

As the general was busy, previous to an expected visit of the Duke of Wellington to inspect the fortifications, he consigned Miss Pigott to the care of an ugly, but very pleasant aide-de-camp, who undertook to show her the lions of Namur. On her return, she continues:—

I found Madame la Baronne, in her sunny bed-chamber, playing at cards. She politely threw them aside at my entrance, but not without uttering a peevish exclamation on the difficulty of "killing time." Almost immediately the general entered, and led me to the banquet, where we were joined by another of his aides-de-camp, Le Comte de Pestre, his cousin, simply clad in a suit of mourning, that contrasted singularly with the sportsman's dress, and the chase accoutrements of a dauntless martial-looking whisker-and officer, who had just entered from a shooting excursion, swinging his fowling-piece, and loaded with the morning spoils of sylvan warfare, which he dashed on the floor to the right and to the left without respect to persons, or to the furniture.

The general did the honours, as one long habituated to preside at military banquets; while Madame spoke little, and scarcely tasted of the festin, seeming to like nothing, to have no enjoyment in the passing scenes of life; her naturally dissatisfied temper having been increased since our separation at La Chaudfontaine by a fall from her carriage; her perturbed mind was expressed in her eyes, that wandering restless regard, fixed only at intervals on the general, announcing her well authorized anxieties for his health. The feast, however, went on actively, and certainly was worthy of the generous hospitality of the chivalrous entertainer, being composed of choice varieties of the season's products, and concluding with an immense cold boiled salmon, extended upon a long plank of wood, like a human corpse on a bier, handed round by a domestic, and so unexpectedly that it made me start from my chair, which excited a general smile; indeed I was not without alarm on catching a glimpse in the opposite large mirror, of my own insignificant figure reflected therein, seated amidst such a warlike group of convives, who had no softening shade, not even in the feminine lineaments of Madame, disfigured as they were by her mental anguish. Le Comte de Pestre was deputed to reconduct me to my hôtel. After having made my final adieux to my warrior host—for final I felt they must be, from the evident change in his appearance since we last met, and the perpetual, only half-concealed indications of severer bodily suffering, all visibly told that his terrestrial career was near closing.

We shall next take up Miss Pigott at the Hague, recapitulating the history of her happy autumn spent on the banks of the Meuse; and we must again remind the reader that her book, alas! is still as good as manuscript; as fresh and sparkling as "Bubbles from the Brunnens."

How happy was my life from sunrise until sunset! I sketched and conversed familiarly with the simple peasantry, and gained much local information from that intelligent class, while rambling in their scenery, and around their humble homes. I cultivated the good-will of the inhabitants of the valley, and was invited to partake the hospitalities of the Baronial chateau and the cottage. I encountered every body I most desired, and all were kind to me. What delightful feelings were mine! A gladsome traveller, my occasional musings over the past only heightening the bright colourings of present existence. Ah! when was I ever so happy! when shall I ever be equally so again! At Spa, I lived in intimacy with Lady Torrington, and the Admiral, with the intellectual Counsellor Wilson, his gentle dame, and her niece. Lord Beauchamp was the reigning beau at Spa, cherished by the lady matrons, who had daughters at the matrimonial mart; his lordship's mother was with him, preserving a strict incognito. At Aix la Chapelle, I hastened over its many historical memorials, in the anxiety to quit so melancholy a sejour, and also anxious not to be too late to assist at the harvest on the fruitful banks of the Meuse. Madame Fincke, the French hostess, at the public dinner table in her hôtel, was a fund of amusement in her display of Parisian fashion, and her maniere de marchande de modes. At Namur I was received with military hospitality, by General Evers, and his Saxon wife.

The above Madame Fincke, the hostess at Aixla-Chapelle, would still be a rarity in England. Miss Pigott, from choice, wherever she went, frequented the table d'hôte when this was practicable. She remarks—

As usual, I found no small amusement in the table d'hôte scene. The hostess, Mad. Fincke, was a superlative fine lady, doing the honours of her festin in a rich green velvet robe; and in the true manœuvring principle of an experienced coquette, she had selected for her two supporters, the most distinguished looking cavaliers amongst her hotel guests; on my requesting her to place me, she graciously indicated, with an air of self-satisfaction, a chair and plate that had previously been reversed to indicate my seat at the table, according to her usage, but in the centre of a group of English, unconscious that she could not have succeeded less effectually in pleasing me; but I became reconciled to her arbitrary arrangement, on discovering my neighbours to be a Captain Pearson, his invalid lady, and pretty daughter, the former a gentlemanly naval officer, whom I had heard Lord Torrington mention in flattering terms. Early after dinner our fantastic hostess perseveringly curtsied us from the table d'hôte, when I immediately engaged a cicerone to conduct me to the public walks.

In company with Baron Beckmann and his lady, Miss Pigott left Brussels for Holland. The baron was one of the king's chamberlains; his lady was a Catholic and a Belgian, who, until now, had never seen that country to which her own was forcibly united by the drum-head marriage, concerted by the Duke of Wellington, celebrated by the Holy Allies, and long since dissolved, as might have been foreseen even through the feelings and conduct of the Baroness Beckmann, which are thus described by her fellow-traveller:—

Our route to Rotterdam, was along the celebrated dykes, enlivened by a succession of neat villages, with gaily painted houses, and grotesque attempts at sculpture in the gardens. The bright brass dairy utensils, suspended to dry and sweeten in the air before the rural habitations, and on the margins of the canals; the varied brilliant coloured dress of the peasantry, their thick Dutch-built figures thus attired; the strange forms of the equipages for pleasure and for agriculture; wind-mills, painted in every hue of the rainbow; the parterres, yet brilliant with Flora's autumnal beauties; the trees still in full leaf; the rich pasture lands divided into portions by broad ditches of clear running waters, on which the proprietors of the lands were paddling in their tiny barks, to visit and count their herds of cattle—produced a novel and stirring life scene.

Mere you exclaim, not at the beauties of nature, but at the wonderful industry of man. Here nature has done little, man's industry everything; and the industry of the Dutch people forces you to respect them. La Barrone participated in my astonishment, and re-echoed my exclamations of pleasure. She had never been in Holland, therefore all was as new to her as to her English companion; but Madame, like a true-hearted Belgian, loves not her Protestant neighbours, now become her compatriots. She received, with cold indifference, my congratulations upon the acquisition to her native territories of such fine dairy land, extensive fisheries, and colonies; for in religion this amiable, and on other points, mild-tempered feminine character, is a rigid, fierce bigot. She became dreadfully irritated each time we encountered, and with some difficulty passed on the narrow dykes, sundry cabriolets of fantastic forms, some driven by a domine (as the clergy are named) of the Lutheran faith, with his wife, and six, ten, or more children, fair and ruddy boys and girls, seated on every side of their parents, in laughing mood. I believe she would gladly have turned them over the dyke, and passed on at her own ease, as she cried out with dismay, "Quelle horreur! quelle hôte! a priest marry!—a priest have children!" The baron was on the barouche seat. She had therefore more room in the carriage, as she involuntarily receded into her corner of it, from too close contact with her heretical friend. I coolly remarked that St. Peter, one of the disciples of our Redeemer, was a married man, assiduous in the education of his children, and comforted and exhorted his wife in her hour of martyrdom with the comfortable words, "Remember the Lord;" but the enraged little baroness affected not to hear me, and merely kicked out her pretty foot against the opposite pannel of the chaise. I did not attempt to dissipate further her religious prejudices; a combat on that theme, in a close vehicle, traversing contracted dykes, would have been imprudent. I believe, for the first time, the idea presented itself that she had incurred both sin and peril, by travelling on the highways with a Protestant. Fortunately for her we approached near to Rotterdam, where we were to separate. I communicated my supposition when we met again at the Hague; a faint blush tinged her cheeks, she attempted to smile, but it was a vain attempt, and she replied not a word. I see not how the two people, so different in their religious opinions and habits of life, are to mix together this winter in unity—nous verrons.

Philosophers would have extended the remark to the two countries, so different in their religious feelings and habits of thought.

The Dutch admiral the Comte May, then in command at Rotterdam, and his lady, an English woman, took the fair traveller under their care, who, in a sight-seeing walk, makes this observation—

We walked on the dykes to view the "cits' boxes," or villas; on some of them are mottos in golden letters, alluding to the situation in life of the owner—a contrast of national character to that of our English merchants, who in general, soon as their coffers fill, hasten to the herald's office, to search for and adopt the armorial bearings of some ancient dynasty, whose name in some degree resembles their own.

The Admiralty-house commands a view of the river, and the shipping. The dining-room is wainscotted with dark oak; the drawing-room is sixty-five feet long, has an elegant marble chimney-piece at each end; the paintings and decorations are in good taste. An excellent dinner, served in English style, the animated conversation of my brave host, and his gracious lady, enlivened the party, which consisted only of Mr. Hay, the English Episcopalian clergyman, who is appointed by the Bishop of London; his wife accompanied him, and Mr. Labouchere, the banker; the admiral's four lovely children appeared to grace the dessert.

The following morning I made another tour alone, and was infinitely amused by the many grotesque groups that completely realized those scenes in low life, so admirably represented by the inimitable talents of the old Dutch painters. I have not unfrequently heard animadversions cast on the old Flemish masters, for their frequent representation of low-life scenes; but how could they deviate or seek for other subjects, when their own country possessed such an endless variety of stirring, ludicrous, and grotesque life groups! which in fact, form a history of their nation, their habitudes, and minds.

We shall not follow Miss Pigott through all the Dutch docks and ships; but to the Hague and its court we must pursue her. To that place she went by water.

The only passengers were three inoffensive bourgeois, and a domine, who smoked his pipe in quiet ease and indifference in his chosen corner of the cabin. A continuance of neat cottages and busy housewifery before their doors, ornamented country houses of the more opulent classes, diminish the monotony of the flat scenery. Upon landing I found the chamberlain had been so gallant as to send a carriage and servants to await my arrival, and convey me to the square (Buitenzof) where in is the principal hotel, Hetgroot Keyzerhof.

I found a warm apartment, with the usual precaution against damp—two carpets—that had been commanded for me by my late travelling companions, who reside in the same square, and who presented themselves immediately. I had scarcely dismissed my dinner service, when the Admiral Von de Capellan (a friend of Lord Torrington's) was announced. This noble naval veteran approaches to his seventieth year—the Dutch hero of Algiers, whom Lord Exmouth found in the Straits of Gibraltar, and who boldly (not having time to wait orders from his government) accompanied the English fleet with his Dutch squadron to share in the dangers and the glories of that enterprise, for which he immediately received the thanks of the British senate, and the Order of the Bath from the Prince Regent. He drew my arm under his own, and insisted on my accompanying him to tea at his house. The baroness received me most graciously; a very handsome and fine woman, the happy mother of nine children, with infant twins in their nurses' arms; she is in the meridian of her life. The baron had designated her for his wife when yet an infant at her mother's breast. He saw her on landing at Rotterdam after a long cruise, caressed the smiling babe, and called her his little wife. The disparity of years is unremarked in the sincere affection which shows itself, pure and fresh in numerous little attentions, ere you have seen them one hour together. Her fair hair was arranged à la Ninon. Their eldest daughters are fine girls, and all the family appear to have amiable dispositions. They were sixteen years emigrants in England, to which they profess a strong attachment, and have adopted the domestic habits. Two Dutch families joined the party without enlivening it. They sat at the tea-table like automata, moved by wires. The taciturnity of these ladies, and their solemn formality when they were so obliging as to depart, each making three distinct courtesies, were unpromising prognostics of Dutch gaiety to a stranger.

This is so pleasant, that we make no doubt the reader would be glad to see a great deal more of it; but we can only take Scheveling, the Richmond or Greenwich of the Hague.

It is one of the favourite amusements of the inhabitants of the Hague to drive or walk hither to breakfast, or to dine and smoke in the neat little inns. There was something delightfully pleasant and refreshing in this scene in an autumn evening. The church stands in the centre of the neat little town, where is a manufactory of ingenious shell ornaments. The dress of the people is singular, and differs so entirely from that of their neighbours of the Hague, that they appear to be of a different nation. The wives and daughters of these rich fish-merchants load their persons with dazzling ornaments in gold, pearls, and diamonds, that set off to advantage the natural brilliancy of their complexions. I could not resist stopping a while, to gaze on a blooming Hebe, who was standing at the window of her little parlour, in a blaze of jewellery and fine lace; diamonds of the finest water decorated her head gear.

After enjoying the sea views, the exhilarating breezes, with the "vast o'erhanging firmament," we descended at the entrance to the Hague, to pass the evening with a Belgian family of Irish extraction. Mr. Sullivan de Grasse, homme d'esprit, with the fiery vivacity of his country.—Madame is portly and handsome; the daughter pretty and insipid; the son and heir, a dandy stupid and heavy, as dandies invariably are; but the flute and piano, accompanied by tolerable vocal music, made pleasantly pass the hours.

Miss Pigott saw the States-general opened by the king, attended by his two sons. Few cried, "God save him!" and when she wondered at the public indifference, a laughing Dutchman remarked, that "they were a phlegmatic nation." The different members of the royal family were often seen walking about in the lovely woods around the Hague without guards, exactly like private persons. A few incidental notices of Holland are curious:—

The Dutch matrons are stiff and ceremonious, and courts are equally so in general, where each personage has a card to play, with a gamester's skill, each regarding the other with suspicion, or with jealous eye. This court has an unregal appearance, being so lately commenced, that no one seems to recollect, or to have learnt the necessary rules of service and etiquettes. The royal suites are composed of a strange medley of different nations, Germans, Prussians, Belgians, Dutch, and a few English.

Here are four court establishments; that of the reigning monarch, the two dowager duchesses, and that of the Prince of Orange and his youthful consort.

The queen is of the most retired habits, and has frequently been heard to lament that she is a queen.

Many of the Dutch customs strike me to be as singular as the general features of the country. A child's birth is announced by a female domestic dressed in white, with an enormous nosegay of choice flowers in hand; a man in a black garb, a long black crape scarf flowing from his three-corner hat, and a gold-headed cane, knocks at every door throughout the town to communicate each death that has occurred, with the names and honours of the defunct. Sometimes are to be seen several of these Aanspreckers running with all speed on this sad embassy, as if they expected death to overtake themselves before they could finish their mission. When the defunct is of high station, these harbingers of mortality arrive in a coach, and from each window proclaim the event. With my sketches of these strange figures, I hope one day to amuse you.

The Dutch resemble the English in some of their domestic habits; the women are moral and well educated; but they are reserved, and jealous of foreigners, who certainly do not frequent their towns, excepting for commercial purposes. I am, with the exception of the British Ambassador's family, the only Englishwoman of the higher class here, which is a relief to the court, and to Lord Clancarty, after their last winter's residence at Brussels, where the English flock in such numbers, and are thought so obtrusive.

The Belgians express much discontent; the young men of the ministerial offices not knowing how to pass their evenings without a theatre, at a small expense, and complaining that the cafés are not a resource, as the Mynheer's tobacco pipes are disagreeable, and spoil their Sunday toilet. Every one should have their turn in this world. The Dutch are obliged to follow the court the alternate winters it resides at Brussels, and perchance find themselves more incommoded by the Sunday festivities, balls, and the spectacle, with other unpleasant incidents in Roman Catholic countries, repugnant to their national and presbyterian feelings.

The queen gave a ball and supper, at which Miss Pigott was present. Among other royal personages whom she presents to our notice, is the present queen, then the Princess of Orange, the sister of the Emperors Alexander and Nicolas of Russia, and then not long married.

The prince commenced the ball in a waltz with his fair consort, for fair she is, as alabaster; her features are irregular, her physiognomy mild,—no fiery high-spirited glance, such as her political intriguing sister of Wirtemberg's fair face expresses. Her royal highness' neck and throat are the most beautiful nature ever formed; her figure is graceful; moreover she finds something agreeable to address to those who are presented, without forgetting that she is sister to a great emperor; her robe and head-dress were decorated with precious stones, and deep fringes of enormous pearls, for her wedding trousseau was magnificent.

The supper rooms were opened at midnight for five hundred guests; the supper cold as the rooms, excepting a coffee cup of weak soup, that was presented to each person on sitting down to table. On returning to the ball-room, a circle was formed round the royal party, when each prince and princess, with the dowager duchesses, graciously wished us "bon soir," and retired. Thus ended this first court fête.

The young Princess Marianne was the representative of a lady of the olden times, in a white satin robe, and long full ruffles; but to that little princess's gouvernante neither pen nor pencil can adequately express the strange effect of her embonpoint figure, her highly rouged cheeks, and her English court plume and head-dress, contrasting ludicrously with the diminutive feathers worn by the Dutch ladies; this plume was of every hue, and each feather waved apart to the four points of the compass. Lady Christina, of equally ample proportions, with a lovely face and countenance; Lady Marie, of the Dowager-mother's household, completed the trio; as, linked arm-in-arm, they approached me.

This family have much intrinsic worth, and loyal attachment to the house of Orange, which they proved during their many years' emigration and residence with the late old Stadtholder in Hampton Court palace.

The Prince of Orange is economizing; I meet him frequently at the different private receptions, where he comes to amuse himself, and throw off state formalities, stimulating every body to give him entertainments. He proposed to have a public bal masqué. A bal masqué frightened the Dutch mammas for the morals and safety of their lily and rosy daughters. Congresses were held, the alarm was general, and ultimately it was decided, that a bal masqué was not suitable to Dutch taste, esprit, or habitudes. This was represented to the man of pleasure, the prince, who easily compromised for a bal costumé, which proved a magnificent fête.

The above antiques were sisters, and of the noble house of Athlone. The ball put Miss Pigott's portfolio into requisition, by Dutch ladies distressed to contrive dresses. Among others, an old and thrifty German lady of the bedchamber came to learn how she might transmute the old red velvet gown which she brought under her shawl, into a Spanish dress! Surely, even in the few years which have elapsed, the following thrifty custom of the court ladies—of which an English tradesman's wife would, we fear, be quite ashamed—must have become obsolete.

The saloon of the Minister of War, the Baron de Nagel, is pleasant. Madame de Nagel is an amiable old lady; during her long residence with the old Stadtholder, in Hampton Court palace, she was cherished and esteemed by all who had the advantage of approaching her. It is the custom with the Dutch dames to sit the first hours of the evening with the tea equipage before them, pouring out the tea to each successive visiter, in very diminutive cups of the finest foreign porcelain. Late in the evening the lady concludes this duty by washing the tea service, in the presence of her remaining guests, wiping them dry with a fine red napkin, resembling a pocket-kerchief, that is placed by her for the purpose. I left her late last night, thus occupied; her long residence on our shores had not obliterated her early household practices, and observing me to smile, "Ah, Miss! I never dared do this in England; but servants are careless creatures, and often break a cup." "You are right, madam," I replied, casting a look of admiration at the exquisite beauty of the old Dresden cup she was wiping with infinite caution.

I have had an amusing affair with the court, in which I came off victorious. The chamberlains and ladies in waiting, who frequent our world, are so many spies, and collectors of news to beguile the monotony of the tea-tables of their respective palaces. Baron de Heerd is the most successful collector, and the most witty retailer. I had recently sketched a little Jew mendicant, of a remarkable figure and character. A few days after, into my room bustled the Baroness de Stettin, "Miss, you have sketched our little Jew beggar. Il est toujours devant le Palais. La Duchesse de Brunswick l'appelle son amant. Her highness begs you to lend me your sketch to copy." "That is impossible," I replied; "but I will do another as soon as possible;" and the next day I sent one more highly finished, with a complimentary billet. Soon after returned in all haste the old baroness. "Vous êtes vraiment charmante, Miss; but the princesses have heard such encomiums of your drawings, they wish to see them." I bowed. "They desire you to confide them to me, Miss." There was a pause. "Where my drawings go, Madame, I go;—it is an old arrangement betwixt me and my portfolios, that we will never separate." Away toddled the baroness, and in an hour she entered again. "The queen desires to see your drawings; surely you will not hesitate to confide them for an hour at her majesty's tea-table—it is so dull." "I believe it," I replied. "Oh! I do not quiz us, Miss, for the queen is urgent;" but in a more decided tone, I urged the "impossibility to send my collection like an artist, and risk the criticisms of the chamberlains, my quizzing friend, De Heerd, à leur tête. It is not fitting for me thus to amuse the queen's circle."

The baroness looked aghast, and left me, threatening to complain to my friend the French ambassador's lady, and bring me to reason. That lady told her I was in the right. "Then I will speak to her own ambassadress." "I do not recommend you," replied Madame de la Tour du Pin; "for she will sanction her decision."

All this furnished gossip at court; and, at the next reception, the good-humoured Duchess of Brunswick remarked to one of my intimates, that I had shown proper national spirit, and maintained the dignity of my country; then, crossing the saloon, she graciously thanked me for the portrait of the little Jew, and I expressed my satisfaction in having been able to do anything to please her serene highness.

The news of the day is the projected alliance of Lord Athlone with the wealthy and handsome Miss Hope; Lady Christina de Reede, his sister, has been the successful negotiator; and we rejoice that this ancient family will be renovated by her opulence.

Blindman's-buff is the fashion in the Russian diplomatic mansion, in which the heir to the throne sometimes joins. The Dutch ladies affect to be shocked, and to think there is an impropriety in such pastimes. I intend to see the sport, probably join in it, with the same ardour you and I were wont to display in our early frolics.

Miss Pigott's spirit carried her point. She was treated, not like "an artist," but invited to accompany her portfolio to a private audience. Our next economical anecdote is of a higher character than the wife of the War Minister washing up her tea-cups. It relates to the occupations of the daughters of the Minister for the Colonies.

My acquaintance with the Golbergs is increased into something resembling friendship; having been bereaved of their mother, they are essential comforts to the worthy minister. The youngest sister is the housekeeper, and I believe an excellent superintendent of the minutest details of the large dinner parties her father, in his situation, is forced to give every week; but all the Dutch ladies, even of the highest grades, are bustling housewives. However, Mlle. Golberg assumes none of this mauvais ton importance; there appears, in her gentle deportment, no bustle or inquietude lest all should not be in prim order; she is only not so generally visible to morning visitors as her sister, who often excuses her not accompanying us in our walking excursions. "My father has a dinner to-morrow, which fully occupies my sister," is the candid excuse I receive. The young chevaliers of the diplomacy complain in high tone of the expense they incur by attending their ambassadors to the Mynheers' dinners, being obliged to give a florin each time to the domestic in waiting, which they say is a heavy charge on their slender revenues during the season. The Comte de Caux said plaintively to me, "We dine for nothing at home." I have dined several times at the Golbergs, and yesterday we had a small party there, with the French minister and Madame de Stettin.

I am amused that the plum-pudding is thought an essential, the omission of which would risk the supposition of a stirring affront to an English guest.

The vegetables are well served; but the Dutch will take of four or five different kinds and mix them altogether, most uncouthly, on their plates, with melted butter. The embarrassment is disagreeable, on leaving the house, to have a florin ready for the eager servant, especially as the seigneur generally hands you to your carriage; though I know not why one should feel a delicacy for his feelings, who has none for himself, and no individual is blameable for an old-established custom of his country. There is great comfort in Dutch houses, in the distribution and furniture of the apartments.

At the Hague, Miss Pigott became acquainted with the family of the Prince d'Hatzfeldt, the Prussian ambassador to Holland—a gay family; among whom the game of Blindman's-buff was sometimes carried on with more mirth and good-humour than diplomatic dignity. Of these merry and light-hearted Prussians, Miss Pigott relates—

I have frequented their soirées, each Tuesday and Friday; hours of innocent follies in every guise, produced by nursery games, including Blindman's-buff in the German and English style, and magic music. A kind of regulation is adopted perfectly ludicrous, for we elect a master of the ceremonies each night; the majority of votes is generally in favour of Mr. Kiel, the Russian Chargé d'Affaires, who pretends to assume all the important airs of his new situation. I have made a drawing of him as he paces with folded arms the saloon, arranging in his own mind which shall be the games that night, while the lively girls are awaiting in eager impatience his mandate to commence them. These pastimes continue till midnight; but the animated scene does not commence until the formal Dutch ladies have courtesied their way out of the reception room; and as they arrive at seven, they have generally finished their reverences before the hour of ten.

A few will sometimes linger from curiosity, not to mix in the sports, but to see their commencement. They gaze in wonder at every circumstance that they do not understand, have not seen before, or that is not in their daily practice. The Princesse d'Hatzfeldt, who is all esprit, though somewhat prejudiced and ennuyée at these formal receptions, will not admit that they are capable of so animated a feeling as wonder; but I think she wrongs them, and mistakes their old-maidish prim mannerism for apathy. However, she persists, with her sister's diplomatists, that they are all martyrs to this climate's foggy influence over their faculties; certainly this ambassador's mansion is an exception, for there gaiety sits enthroned. On entering, the other night, I found every door thrown open of the suite of rooms, and every person, old and young, messieurs and dames, running different ways, searching with intense vigilance, apparently for some great treasure, either purse or trinket, that was lost. At my entrance all exclaimed, "Mademoiselle, Mademoiselle!—look, look!—it is Shrove Tuesday!—find an egg, find an egg!—quick, quick, or you are lost!—you will have to pay a forfeit." A quantity of eggs had been purposely hidden in different places in the apartments; in my full-dress attire of gauzes and flounces, I commenced the search. No sooner had I found an egg, than it was snatched from me; that none were broken was the wonder, in an affray so rapid and scrambling. Ultimately, I succeeded, and arrived at a certain post of rendezvous, with an egg in my hand, when peace was restored, and charades, and waltzes, followed. The Lady Trenchs,* and the accomplished Mr. Chad, always join us; and thus this merry-making society is entirely composed of the juvenile part of the embassies, and a few Dutch noblemen.

We should have said less about the noble family of d'Hatzfeldt, were it not to prepare the English reader to follow them to their castle, and enable him to contrast the manner of life of the highest German nobility with that of our Devonshires and Westminsters, Buccleuchs and Sutherlands. Miss Pigott's accurate pictures led us to suspect that the accounts of such residences as have been obtained from other fair travellers are somewhat embellished. We can have faith only in her and in Captain Hall. They really lived for some time in the inside of German chateaux. But first, one more quiet day at the Hague.

The Countesses d'Hatzfeldt came early to engage me to a family dinner, where we sat at a very long table (for their suite is numerous,) and nothing on it but the salt-cellar, without their spoons (à la mode étrangère;) each dish was served from the side-board; the dessert only placed upon the table, chiefly consisting of dried fruits, and cakes from Berlin.

We adjourned for the evening to their private saloon, where we were joined by Mr. Kiel, who sketches likenesses, and has a fund of talent. The drawing-master came, and the hours fled fast away in domestic avocations, and pleasant converse. The young countesses love to excite disputation on the merits of our countries and governments, the grandeur and importance of our respective nations; and as I have the reputation in society of a very patriotic Englishwoman, my young friends delight to pique my national pride, and leading me on (as they call it) to battle field. The prince on these occasions sits silent, enjoying my defence of each national institution, and even the follies of my nation, while his daughters exercise, unlimited, their wit and repartee. Sometimes the ambassador flatters me with his applauses, when I have discomfited their light arguments; the aid of the pen is sometimes available, and I send you a little impromptu of the fair Helene's for your criticism.

They have persuaded me to remain until after their next soirée; it will therefore be the end of the week ere I sleep at Amsterdam. They would fain engage me to visit them at their chateau in Germany, where they are to pass the summer months; but this tempting invitation I fear will not be realized. I ascended this morning to Lady Jemima Bentinck's apartments in the higher regions of the palace; her amiable and gentle daughter was with her, with whom the climate disagrees, as with all strangers.

Of a very delightful history of the farther tour of Miss Pigott in Holland we can take no account—anxious to arrive at the chateau of her Prussian friends; though a few incidental occurrences on the road must be noticed. The reader is to remember that all this took place above twenty years ago. Miss Pigott, on her return from Holland, was again in Brussels.

The Duke of Kent was in low spirits, the few days he was here last week; this separation from Madame St. Laurent is a great chagrin, and sacrifice to state policy; they lived together twenty-six years; she is an accomplished woman, and was not publicly obtrusive. She has engaged a mansion in Paris, and it is said that Louis XVIII. will have the complaisance to create her a baroness. The duke's motive for his retirement to this city was to pay off his debts; he has left it with the good opinion of all classes. I fear the amiable widow, the German Princess, will find him a melancholy royal suitor for her fair hand. Not so the Duke of Cambridge—I met his Royal Highness during his short visit en passant to England; he seems the happiest of happy bridegrooms, displaying it undisguisedly to a pleasing-looking amiable bride, a Princess of Hesse. Her figure is elegant; the upper part of her face is quite handsome; her complexion has a tint of sallowness, inherent to the German women. The duke called upon our little friend Mrs. Byam, and told her he was the happiest of men; passed her children in review, and renewed his promises of protection to her fine-spirited fatherless boys; and it is proverbial that the Duke of Cambridge never forgets to fulfil his promises.

Do tell me something of those unhappy looking travellers, the L—s of R— castle; they seemed on the continent to carry their castle, as snails carry their shells on their backs.

Madame, in all semblance, dreaded to disparage her castle, (which in my great aunt's time, bore the more modest appellation of "Manor house,") by appearing "ungenteel;" or, as she one day said, when I urged her to see something of the environs, ere she left the Netherlands, "I will not lose my rank, by appearing in a flacc." The flaccs here are upon so excellent a system, that they are as clean and commodious as private equipages. The inferior classes are not in the habit of using them; therefore many fine English prefer their use, and put aside their own travelling carriages. This was carrying provincial pride to its verge of ridicule.

Another characteristic anecdote of our dear country people occurs, which deserves to be quoted. The scene is Aix-la-Chapelle.

The table d'hôte, to which I always eagerly resort, as well for convenience, as because it is the fashion of the country, and also that I there obtain a tolerably accurate idea of the manners and dispositions of the natives, I found thinly attended. Mme. Dubick, a great ally of the Athlone family, a fine, handsome, well-dressed woman, did the honours, quietly and politely. I soon discerned my neighbours to be English; the name of K—y—n gave me a thrill of pleasure—(alas! not of the noble family, either by birth or manners, I so love!) The wife young, in blonde cap and pink roses; all the pretension and reserve the English think it edifying to display on their travels; the curled lip, and low whisper to her spouse, proclaimed her disgust at every dish offered to her acceptance, she thought it so comme il faut to display. Certainly, at one moment, her disgust was excited with reason—a young German officer was using his knife as a toothpick, a habit too prevalent in Belgium and Germany; the knives are made pointed, as if for this purpose, and so I told a Belgian beau one day, when he mentioned an old English habitude of putting the knife into the mouth, a habit now confined to the vulgar, which, however ungraceful, is not so displeasing.

Having always my own dinner equipage, enables me to endure with sang froid the disgusting national habits of my table d'hôte neighbours.

A walk in the cool of the evening recovered me from the superciliousness of the K—y—n family. The hill is crowned by a handsome pillar, erected by Buonaparte.

This hill is well laid out in gardens, shrubs, and walks; a broad carriage-road winds round it; a coffee house, music, and cultivated fields surround its base.

The following day I was promoted to the seat of honour at the top of the table, too conspicuous, and which I resolved to remove from on the first occasion. Mr. K—y—n was on my right hand; he unbent a little, but only to prove his democratic principles. A footman appeared behind his lady's chair; she had unpacked his new livery suit—the colours were intended to dazzle and overawe; they were sky blue, decorated with broad gold lace; a crest was emblazoned on the buttons, which were of unusual size, with scarlet cuffs and collar, that were not more brilliant than the red locks of the wearer. Mr. K—y—n and his nameless companion du voyage, have travelled much, appear to be of the law profession, and are clever. Ere the dinner was over, they became loquacious to each other, argumentative and decisive in sustaining their opinions. Not so Mr. Johnston, a comely gentlemanly personage, with a determined squint; but apparently, whichever way he turned his right eye, he was a keen observer with it, and capable of making shrewd and diverting remarks on the different characters of the convives; but they were confined to his own bosom, for he persevered during four days in his pertinacious silence,

My evening rambles were always delicious, in the corn fields and woods.

These English travellers might have taken a lesson from their respectable hostess, Madame Dubick. While Miss Pigott remained here, the Prince d'Hatzfeldt arrived unexpectedly, accompanied by his boys and some other young gentlemen; and, next day, the princess and her daughters arrived.

Great was their delight to find me; the hotel echoed their hilarity, and we passed that and the following day together; the girls did not seem to like the idea of a summer retirement at their remote chateau; their education and early habits, I fear, have not formed them for domestic life, though they have many accomplishments to contribute to render retirement agreeable. "Spa! oh, if papa would have taken us to Spa, how good it would have been of him," exclaimed the Comtesse Fanny.

That day the K—y—ns were more amusing. Madame in another finer cap was more condescending; there was the democratic independence evinced by her male companions, which almost amounted to rudeness. The rank of the family they had observed arrive irritated them. "I was at Anvers five months," said the elder, "without speaking to one individual of the place." The other drily remarked that German princesses would receive any cobler into their society.

The last day Mme. Dubick placed me by her side at dinner; I found myself vis-à-vis to the son of the celebrated minister Hogendorp, whom I had known at the Hague—a pleasant relief from the affected contempt of the English party.

The Hatzfeldts departed in their heavy German coach, and six post horses, and their attendants in a caleche, with a promise exacted from me to join them.

We forgot to mention that Miss Pigott glories in violent Toryism, and, in particular, entertained very awful ideas of Lord Kinnaird's revolutionary principles and practices.

Germany was worth visiting twenty years since. Now the spell is broken—an English lady, with her airs, her fastidious wants, and comforts, is still, perhaps, a plague, but she is no longer a wonder; nor should we be surprised to hear, that the nobility now use tooth-picks instead of the horrible substitutes of which Miss Pigott tells; just as Mrs. Trollope might describe some hideous Yankee custom. At Bonn, she remarks,

Were the hotels well-conducted, how pleasantly strangers might pass a month at Bonn, in making excursions on both sides the river, enjoying its interesting walks, historic palaces, the chalybeate waters, and baths at Godesburg.

So little do the lower orders see of strangers, that the fille de chambre gazed with astonishment at all my little comforts; even my silver tea-pot, and smelling bottle, drew from her the repeated exclamation of "propre," by which she meant to express pretty.

We had one day at the table d'hôte, M. de Hagen, President de la Régence de Cologne, and a Baron Falberg du royaume de Bavière; the latter was decorated with numerous crosses and orders; in person and manners, more resembling a savage, or buffoon; his extreme ugliness rendered him scarcely human; his appearance was rendered more frightful by enormous moustaches, which were really a rich dépôt for dirt; his manner of eating with his fingers, reserving his knife as a tooth-pick, did not augment my appetite for the bad cooking. What a contrast to the young and gentlemanly Bavarian minister de Guise at La Haye!—but as the baron sat opposite me at the narrow dinner-table, his enlightened esprit soon dissipated the désagréments of my meagre dinner, with his uncouth manner of enjoying it, and made me regret the moment of rising from table.

and consequent separation ; he addressed me the instant I was seated at table, and in good English, continuing to converse fluently in that language on various subjects. He had travelled over England, Scotland, and Ireland, and complimented me on my country.

It is here that I am to cross the Rhine into the Duché de Berg, to search for the chateau of the Prince d'Hatzfeldt. To obtain information upon any subject is almost impossible, either of the roads or chateaux on the other side the river ; they are, or profess to be, perfectly ignorant, even of the name and distance of the Chateau du Prince. My host could not inform me ; although an ancestor of this Prince, le Baron d'Asfeldt, is so signalized in the pages of history, for his defence of Bonn in 1689, during three months and a half that it was besieged by Charles V. Duke of Lorraine, and the Electeur of Brandenburg, and finally lost his life in the general assault.

At the post-office my embarrassments were partly relieved, respecting the calculation of the distance from this grand Seigneur's residence ; therefore, in better hopes, I engaged a good coach, horses, and cocher, and to-morrow we are to make our way together ; but when the "flying bridge" has transported us across the Rhine, we shall be in a dilemma whether to turn to the right, or to the left ; but as Coblenz lies decidedly to the left, I hope to induce him to adopt the contrary direction, and make the small town of Sieburg our land-mark, presuming it to be the post-town to the chateau.

The Chateau d'Allner—so much for German roads—was as difficult to find as the Castle of Udolpho, yet it was not much out of the world, and at last it was descried.

On the declivity of a wooded hill, overhanging the rapid current of the little Sieg, I espied, to the joy of my coachman no less than to my own feelings, the ancient chateau of the very ancient race d'Hatzfeldt, built of rough stone from the mountain quarries, in irregular architecture, deriving its date anterior to the Crusades. The arrival of a carriage in the retired village, where its seigneur had not appeared during the last six years, occasioned a general sensation and movement in its small population ; my figure proclaimed me to be "une étrangère ;" not one of them had ever seen an Englishwoman—for such I heard my "cocher" proclaim me to be, in the same tone that the conductor of a caravan announces his lions and elephants ; therefore the simple inhabitants followed me to the entrance of the court of the chateau, in the hope of being treated to a full view at the expense of mon Siegneur, without paying a kreutz.

The prince was seated on the steps of his chateau, disencumbered of decorations and court dress ; his two sweet intelligent boys, Herman and Max, were hanging over him in fond attention ; they instantly ran off to proclaim the glad tidings of my arrival throughout the apartments, while the prince assisted me to descend from my carriage, repeating the ancient greetings of "Welcome." Son Altesse received me with such an appearance of cordiality, that assured me of the sincerity of the sentiments he expressed ; his countenance eloquently proclaiming his satisfaction on returning to his ancient feudal demesnes, his paternal tenderness, and the innate pride with which he regarded his four blooming offspring, who now came forward in merry mood, followed by the princess his consort, with the Counts Hugo and Maximilian, brothers to the prince.

At the same moment there appeared at the different doors and windows, le maître d'hotel, a train of laquais, and femmes de chambres. At the stables, the coachman and groom turned out ; on the opposite side the court, appeared the Rent-master with his wife and children. Of the family group, the only absentee was the young Comtesse Fanny ; but her absence was ultimately to be accounted for, as we found her at her piano ; and hanging over the back of her chair was her handsome cousin, the irresistible Comte Fritz Nesselrode, aide-de-camp au Grand Duc Constantin, and nephew to the Prince d'Hatzfeldt. The reception from my graceful hostess was not less kind, each seeming to regard me as a member of the family dynasty, as though I had been, during long years, one of their home social circle. "Where shall we place her ?" was the succeeding general exclamation. "Here," said the princess ; as she opened the door of a spacious airy bed-chamber, the large windows commanding a view of the fertilized valley, where I could listen to the gentle current of the river Sieg, that laves the base of the castle-walls. "Here, next to my daughters ; and they will pursue together each morning their favourite studies."

The prince in person inspected the arrangements of my trunks ; and after looking around, to assure himself that everything might conduce to my comfort, his Excellency left me to arrange my dress for their early dinner. Thus, in the space of a few minutes, I was established, without any of those factitious ceremonies and parade that estrange frank intercourse.

The interior of this chateau does not assimilate with the ancient dignity of its architecture, for all is modern in the arrangements within. It was pillaged and almost entirely gutted during the last thirty years' troubles and warfares ; and this noble seigneur, in rendering it habitable, has prudently only consulted simplicity and comfort ; a few stray old blue damaak silk fauteuils are the only vestiges of former sumptuousness. The apartments are commodious, having free egress into each other, that the prince and the ladies of his family occupy ; the hangings of the apartments are white cotton, everything being designed for utility and immediate convenience. I was hurried by the sweet girls from one end of the park and the woods, to the other ; for each would entice me onward to her favourite spot. On the morrow I must go to the vineyard, and on the following day to climb one of the Seven mountains ; in short, each day and hour were to have its separate amusement. I inhaled the fragrance of each herb and floweret with delicious transport ; yet were they very children in their frolicsomeness ; for these young countesses, divested of court and diplomatic etiquettes, appear in this their paternal domain in nature's self, free to roam in their natal verdant fields and slopes, under the azure firmament. In mirthful simplicity they skipped before me, or Fanny would turn round in a waltz with cousin Fritz on the grassy plain. Charlotte enchanted me by her graver naïveté ; but, to the guileless purity of Helen's eye you involuntarily tender affectionate homage ; for her sprightly sallies are accompanied by more feminine elegance ; in her "laissez aller" of gaiety, she never swerves from that scrupulous delicacy which is ever the greatest charm of womankind.

The domain is in correspondent taste. The kitchen garden is a picture of neat cultivation ; and with the orchard, was shown to me with as much satisfaction as an English squire exhibits his range of expensive hot-houses, his park of deer, his stud of blood-horses, or his pack of well-trained fox-hounds. Here, nature has done everything ; the Prince has aided her only by cutting rude walks through the woods, and over the mountains, with rustic benches appropriately stationed, to repose, and catch the most interesting points of view at every step; son Altesse turns to ask me, with a look of proud content, "Is not this better than your English lawns, and formal cut gravel walks!—leave formalities for great cities." Indeed this high-born prince seems to retire to the country to disembarass himself of state, and state affairs. Here he appears like a good patriarch in the midst of his family; the hours and manner of living are almost pastoral.

We rise at seven o'clock, being obliged to appear at the breakfast table, not in negligé toilet like the French, but in a neat morning costume, soon after eight o'clock. The breakfast is served without table-cloth or plates, consisting of bread, butter, fruits, and confectionary, with coffee; as they had seen me breakfast at Aix-la-Chapelle, they have added, on my account, tea and eggs; and, as there were no egg-cups, I was necessitated to hint, that a napkin and plate could alone relieve my embarrassment.

After the breakfast repast, we separate instantly to our apartments and our different occupations; mine assimilating with those of my young friends, and my rooms opening into theirs, we pursue them together; they delight in cultivating the English language, and reading some English literary work, whilst I paint or sketch their portraits; at intervals the lively capricious Fanny will seize her guitar, and throw aside her books; sometimes we are joined by their uncle, the Comte Hugo, who pays his court to me assiduously, taking a malicious pleasure in irritating my patriotism, by disputing with me the glory and power of my nation, and also in committing (what he calls) the terrible sin of entering an English lady's bed-chamber,—generally bringing his guitar to amuse, and charm us for an hour with pretty Spanish and Sicilian airs; it is true his voice is somewhat cracked by age and use; and when I venture to look at him, the affectation of youth, and the gestes of the old beau, are somewhat ludicrous and diverting.

If the weather is not too sultry, the prince summons us for a walk previous to arranging our toilet for dinner, which is served at half past two o'clock. A simple repast, of very plain cookery, is served with neatness upon a round table; no massive silver services decorate the side-board or table, war and revolutions having long since melted them down for public use; but genuine hospitality and mutual confidence, have superseded these luxuries and pageantry, diffusing gaiety over the social meal. It is long since the brothers, Hugo and Max, and their nephews, have thus met together. I have named it the family congress. The prince presides at the banquets, having me on his right hand; unlike his dinners at the Hague, the viands are placed on the table, and he serves each dish himself. "This soup is excellent," he said to me to-day: "I superintended the mixing of the ingredients, and there is some macaroni coming, dressed in a new way; I think you will like it." Great apparent cleanliness pervades everything; it is only in certain personal tricks, habitual to the Germans, that they are unpleasant. That terrible habitude I have before remarked to you, of spitting on the floor, or between their knees under the table, and that of raising the pointed knife as a tooth-pick, is to me a continued annoyance, being, during the dinner, obliged to resort to the most artful stratagems to prevent the prince taking the same knife to cut the roti. Each lady and gentleman will, perhaps, bring to table, or draw from their pockets, a vast and richly ornamented tooth-pick case, placing it by his knife; but it is rarely that the knife is not preferred, for in the middle of an interesting conversation with her fascinating cousin, the aide-de-camp Fritz de Nesselrode, I see the fair and delicate hand, the well-turned arm of the young and blooming Comtesse Fanny, grasp and elevate this instrument of carving, extend her pretty mouth, and stick it between her small ivory teeth. Conversing this morning on the customs of different nations, with all the freedom and frankness that intimacy authorizes, arguing upon their utility or inutility, I ventured to make an observation upon the impropriety of thus injuring her pretty teeth, and, perhaps, risking to enlarge the dimensions of her pretty small mouth, by an unfortunate jerk of her hand, or gentle touch of her favourite cousin, Fritz; "besides, the princess, your mother, never does it." "True," she replied; "vous avez raison; I will endeavour never to do it more, for it is certainly very ungraceful." To take our dessert and coffee, we always immediately adjourn to a flower-garden, surrounded by a trellis-fence of roses; beneath the shade of two large spreading cherry-trees, from which we cull the fruit as we sit under them; with the dessert, the domestics bring the pipes of old Comte Max, and the two aide-de-camps; on that of uncle Max is engraved the ten commandments. The princess only permits them to smoke in the open air, and there, I do not think it disagreeable. My devoted le Comte Hugo is too much the polished refined gentleman, to condescend to smoke; he is quite a man of the world, and has visited other courts; an old beau, coquetting, plein d'esprit—a humorist, searching for and enjoying the different characters he encounters in life, as much as the scenery and the arts. Although sixty years' sojourn on earth have silvered his locks, and nature has not been bountiful to his person, he still retains so favourable an opinion of his personal agréments, that, at the dessert to-day, he rose in a rage, because I would not correct the traits of his portrait I had sketched, more to his satisfaction. "Ma bouche, Mademoiselle; j'ai eu toujours une bouche intéressante." The vulture then comes to the garden gate; with four horses, high-fed, high-spirited, seldom worked, harnessed in the Prussian fashion, and appearing to scamper at will, we dash through the rivers, fords, the most beautiful landscapes, so beautiful, so varied, that no pen, no pencil can do them adequate justice; but more of this hereafter—let me finish the journal of the day, which is in fact that of every succeeding one, with little variation. Could one wish them varied! Methinks, were I to remain the summer months, I would pass them thus, for do they not comprise much that is rational in a country life!

A long walk succeeds these excursions, which we generally prolong till ten o'clock, when we assemble to tea, fruit, and confectionary. At eleven, the scene is closed; the prince conducts us to the doors of our apartments, embraces his princess and his daughters, and then retires to his own chamber, accompanied by his two boys. They have no neighbours to break in on their domestic circle, for there is only one chateau within visiting distance.

Order and regularity reign, with early hours; nor is this noble and accomplished dame ashamed to rise from the breakfast table, taking up her bunch of keys, and, followed by the groom of the chambers, to give out from her store-closet the grocery. One evening I missed her from the family congress a long time; she had also been invisible the preceding morning. As I was making the observation to my young companions, the door of the saloon opened; the princess appeared, followed by the prince, the maître d'hôtel, and three lacqueys, each laden with jars of sweetmeats, that they had been inspecting the preparation of. I inquired into their motives, and expressed my opinion that where the retinue was so numerous there could be no occasion for the assistance of an ambassador, and his prince; but I could only learn that to make sweetmeats had formerly been a part of the education of Prussian ladies—that every female, however opulent or high her rank, was taught all the details of housekeeping; and the prince wishes this old-fashioned system of his female ancestors to be continued. “And the young countesses!” I eagerly exclaimed, at the same time casting a side glance at my giddy young friend Fanny; “do they know how to make sweetmeats?” The ambassador shook his head in wrath, and his consort sighed—it was a sigh that expressed, “The times are strangely altered, not improved.” And the duration of rank and fortune being more precarious, the cultivation of useful knowledge relative to domestic offices becomes necessary.

These desmesnes are not extensive; the rents are gathered in kind, as we collect our tithes, the tenants bringing them in themselves to the rent-master. But Son Altesse possesses extensive estates in other parts of the Prussian kingdom, particularly in Silesia; and several châteaux—one that is superb, near Berlin, and another near to Breslau.

This princess was an opulent heiress, born Countess Caroline de Schulembourg Bennet, la fille du Comte de Schulembourg, Minister of War to Frederick Guillaume, Roi de Prusse. The deplorable, agitating scenes, in which this amiable woman was forced to play a part, during the troubles of her country, have mellowed down her noble spirit, her buoyant gaiety, and impaired her nervous system. It is only in her courtly situation, as an ambassador's consort, which obliges her to be animated, that she is so. I think her more interesting in her home intellectual life. Handsome she never was, but the gracefulness of her manners is highly attractive. This Prince d'Hatzfeldt became the subject of romance and engravings, and was alluded to in the drama. He will be more particularly recorded to posterity in the history of Napoleon's reign, as Governor of Berlin, and eventually the object of suspicion to that reckless chieftain, which put his life in peril during some hours. After Berlin had submitted to French authority, a correspondence with his legal sovereign was intercepted, and his loyalty was thought to merit condemnation to the scaffold, by the rigorous fiat of the conqueror. The fearful intelligence was quickly communicated to the hapless princess, his wife, who was at that moment severely indisposed on her couch; she rose precipitately, and rushed into the presence of the tyrant, in her robe-de-chambre, and bonnet de nuit. She threw herself at his feet. She was neither handsome nor young, but the tender mother of twelve children, whose cause she pleaded in that of their father, her affectionate consort; and with the graces of her mind, and the eloquence that the acute feelings of a mother and wife can inspire. The conqueror appeared to be moved by her despair; and with generous heroism, he threw the intercepted correspondence into the fire, exclaiming instantaneously, “Madame! I cannot refuse you—the prince is pardoned!” and an hour later the prince was restored to his home and weeping family.

This act was called by the subservient courtiers “the clemency of Trajan,” and it was made the subject of a drama, in which Talma played the principal character.

It may be suspected, and indeed the princess has insinuated to me, that this scene was concerted by the mighty chieftain, for the purpose of displaying the graces of mercy in a conquered metropolis, where the spirit of sound policy urged him to practise clemency, rather than to irritate the population.

The Dutch thought this noble family too lively; the Berlin noblesse are peculiarly so. Certainly they differ in this respect from the stately dames of Germany, who were of the court of Holland last winter. Their education and early initiation into life contribute much to this. Countess Fanny was launched into the fallacious excitement of it, all bathed in the blushes of fifteen. The Prince is a rigid catholic; therefore the children profess the same faith. The Princess is a Lutheran. Last Sunday, during breakfast, the curate of the parish was announced; the Prince rose; taking a hand of each of his boys, and bidding his daughters follow him, they ascended an old staircase, into an ancient chapel, leaving the princess with me. I believe the forlorn feeling was mutual, for at that moment each felt the want of our divine service; a shadow of acute regret seemed to pass athwart her countenance—a mother's regret that she could not kneel at the same altar with her husband and her children. I was the first to break silence, by inquiring what was the law of Prussia on this essential point; she replied, in a plaintive tone, “That the offspring be instructed in the religion of their father: I wish it were as it is in England.”

The young countesses are triste to-day; for the handsome aide-de-camp, their charming cousin, Fritz, has left us. He has gone to Aix, enamoured with cousin Fanny, and extorted a promise from me to send him her portrait. The German congé was diverting. We assembled at the portal; the embraces between the gentlemen were interminable, but I suspect they were prolonged to excite the surprise of their stranger guest.

This is a long extract, but it is the cream of the first part of a neglected book, which, we think, deserves to be known. If all the world were agog after the Bubbles from the Brunnens, this equally faithful and captivating picture of German manners, cannot surely fail to interest those who will wonder, and admire, and applaud, and do any thing but imitate the unostentatious simplicity of continental domestic manners.

Miss Pigott made several excursions in this district, which, at that period, still exhibited many of the ravages of war. The Cossacks had planted themselves in the noble church and convent of Sieberg, which they had wantonly dilapidated.

Numerous devastated convents and castles crown the summits of the range of the seven mountains, with lofty Drachenburg elevating its regal head high above its neighbours, and is the most conspicuous, claiming sovereignty over the landscape.

I remarked the convent de Blackenburg, the mountain called Raasberg. The culture and natural fertility of the low grounds cannot be exceeded. Here are no large farms; the land is therefore divided into small lots amongst the peasantry, who sow their corn and other grain in patches, that give the pretty parti-coloured appearance of numerous private gardens. The declivities are covered with vineyards, and the vintage is always anticipated by the rustic population, as a cheery protracted festival, beguiling their work with plaintive or with merry songs; where the lover comes softly to toil by the side of his favourite maiden—"for in a vineyard the kiss is free."

This valley is very populous; numerous cottages and hamlets are scattered over the mountains and plains, reposing in the sunny tranquillity of a summer day, with the modest church steeples glittering in their height above the earth, or partially hidden amongst clumps of trees, as if to shelter and render more private, the temples of prayer. There is no wish here to plant out the pleasant villages from the great squire's mansion, as obnoxious objects, betraying the extent of his park or lawn.

The soil is tilled with a rude sort of plough, drawn by small oxen; only light carts, on two wheels, are used in husbandry. The breed of cattle is very small. The dairy cows are the size of the Alderney, but poorly nourished, as the land is chiefly arable. The meat is indifferent, the butter very bad; no cheese is made; large orchards yield a good cider, which is the ordinary beverage of the inhabitants, and also an excellent syrup, made with pears, and which furnishes an excellent and cheap substitute for butter during the winter months. Great neatness is perceptible in the villages. We entered the house of the milk-maid who serves the chateau with milk; all was clean, and the little parlour prettily arranged. She is to come in her sabbath neat peasant garb to my chamber, to stand to-morrow for her portrait. I shall have a little volume of souvenirs to show you when we meet again; which will be a precious remembrance of pleasant hours on Prussian territory, of Prussian hospitality, and genuine kindness for years to come.

After leaving this genuine German castle, which carries English imagination back to the feudal age of England, or to the period of the Tudors at the latest, Miss Pigott visited Coblenz, Mannheim, Mayence, Frankfort, Heidelberg, and many places of less note. But we must, for the present, take leave of Miss Pigott's agreeable book; though it is our purpose to follow her into Switzerland, of which her neglected work contains the most vivacious and graphic account we have seen from any female pen. Indeed, of the higher orders of society in Switzerland, travellers, in general, know and tell almost nothing. The scenery, the inns, and the appearance and costumes of the peasantry, is the limit of their knowledge of the country.

MEMOIRS OF JEREMY BENTHAM.

BY JOHN BOWRING.

PART IX.

REMINISCENCES OF BOWOOD, ITS INMATES AND VISITERS.

THE attachment of Bentham to Lord Shelburne was very strong. "He raised me," I have heard him say, "from the bottomless pit of humiliation—he made me feel I was something." Of Lady Shelburne (the present Lord Lansdowne's mother,) Bentham said—"She had the best, highest aristocratical education possible. She was as gentle as a lamb; she talked French, and understood Latin extremely well. She was often with that lady who was a sort of queen among the aristocracy, Gertrude the duchess of Bedford. Lady S. was quite a personage in those days, a governing personage. So wide was their circle, that cards from no less than nine hundred visitors were left in a season."

Often did Bentham speak of the friends, the acquaintances, the guests of Bowood. I know not how I can better introduce them than in that sketchy and conversational way in which he was in the habit of conveying his recollections. When any name was mentioned, it served as a sort of text from which he preached; and it was my usage to record his talk, sometimes in shorthand in his presence,—at other times, immediately after I had left him.

"Lord Shelburne introduced Blackstone to the king,—it was the best thing he could do under the circumstances; his book was then 'The Truth.' When the Fragment appeared, Lord Shelburne patronized the Fragment, which seemed better Truth. He was a favourite of the king, who promised to make him a duke. I do not know how he was originally brought into contact with the king, but I think it was through Lord Chatham, and he considered himself as always having a hold on the king's affections.

"Now I'll tell you the persons by whose means he was informed of everything that passed. They were the two Lady Waldegraves, the daughters of the Duchess of Gloucester. You know Lord Waldegrave's Memoirs, how interesting they are. Well! these ladies lived at Court—ladies of honour, or some such thing. In the year 1789, I made a bit of a tour with Lord Lansdowne. We went to Warwick, where we stayed a week: these ladies were there also on a visit. The party were, Lord Lansdowne and myself (men,)—the ladies, Miss Vernon, and Miss Fox. There was another lady, living with the queen, a Lady Dartry, the wife of a banker at Dublin. When I knew her, it was at Bowood with her husband, whose name, I think, was Dawson; he was afterwards raised a peer on the peerage, called Viscount Cremorne; and as Lord Lansdowne was indebted no less than £300,000, a great deal of it came from this banking lord, and from Sir Francis Baring. Well! and you see these Ladies Waldegrave used to write to the Miss V—s, and report what passed at Court. Lord Lansdowne did not tell me on the occasion, but he told me on after occasions, that he knew all that passed through this channel.

"Blankett was a retainer of Lord Shelburne, one of the numerous hangers-on who were tale-bearers to my lord, and was familiar with the Whigs. He was an ignorant, confident, amusing fellow, an object of great aversion to the Bowood ladies from his coarse manners. But he was employed by Lord Shelburne to repeat to him what passed among the Whigs, and especially to report the conversations at the admiralty. I was once playing a duet with Lord Shelburne's upper servant, when this Captain Blankett pushed against me. I lounged at him with my bow, and broke my bow. He was always talking about a vast continent in the Pacific. We had a dispute about the relative size of Sicily and Ireland. He would have it that Sicily was the biggest. But though ill-read and assuming, and addicted to falsehood, rather from temerity than mendacity, he was a necessary instrument to Lord Shelburne; and Jekyll, whose wit obtained him a welcome everywhere, was another instrument.—They were to watch in the quarters of the enemy.

"Lord Shelburne used frequently to say, "Tell me what is right and proper—tell me what a man of virtue would do in this matter." I told him that Balak, the son of Zippor, wanted Balaam to prophesy, who answered, "that which the Lord puts into my mouth will I prophesy;" and that was the answer I made. He caught hold of the most imperfect scrap of an idea, and filled it up in his own mind—sometimes correctly—sometimes erroneously. His manner was very imposing, very dignified, and he talked his vague generalities in the House of Lords in a very emphatic way, as if something grand were at the bottom, when, in fact, there was nothing at all. He asked me what he could do for me—I told him, "nothing,"—and he found this so different to the universal spirit of those about him, as to endear me to him. He was afraid of me, so there was not much intimate communication. I was occupied in writing and reading between breakfast and dinner, while he took walks with the eldest Miss Vernon (now Mrs. Bauber Smith.) I seldom saw him except at dinner, when there was mostly company. Supper I never took, but betook myself to my room. I was of more importance, however, to him, than I could bring myself to believe. I was cowed by my past humiliation.—I felt like an outcast in the world.—I had known a few tolerable people, one at a time, but no extensive acquaintance. That a man should be born in the great place called "abroad," was a sufficient recommendation.

"Lord Shelburne had a wildness about him, and conceived groundless suspicions about nothing at all. I remember going to ride out with one of his servants, and being accosted by some man whom I spoke to out of pure civility; and, on mentioning it to Lord Shelburne, he seemed to think I was deserving of suspicion. About the last time I was at his house, I mentioned something about Count Woronzof, and he fancied I had been sent by Woronzof to communicate it. Yet there was about him a good deal of sympathy, of intelligent sympathy: a curious mixture too of what was natural and what was factitious. He had a sort of systematic plan for gaining people. I was quite surprised to find the interest he had shown towards me. The particulars did not immediately occur to my thoughts, nor did I immediately gather up the threads of them till long afterwards. He had many projects for marrying me to ladies of his acquaintance.

"It was a fine thing for my father when Lord Shelburne, being minister, sent for me. Nobody was there but Barré. Lady Shelburne talked in a strange way. When speaking of a palsy which had visited somebody on the continent, she said—"It had left nothing but an imperceptible haziness on the tongue." The green official boxes were brought in, and their contents were subjects of conversation that was delightful to me.

"Lady Shelburne's dressing-room was next door to her bedroom. To follow her thither was a prodigious privilege. She was extremely reserved; there was nothing in her of active insolence; she was mildness and ice; but of extraordinary altitude. Her sister was more icy even than she. Acquaintance, however, somewhat melted both, and we had our innocent gambols. In earlier life, Lord Shelburne had been rather promiscuous in his attentions to females; he had, to use his own expression, a place full of women: but he was now exclusive in his attention to his lady.

"The ladies at Bowood were all taciturn, reflective, and prudent. The youngest had somewhat more of frankness and less of beauty than the rest. Miss — resembled a statue of Minerva, somewhat larger than life—so we called her Minerva, and she took to the sobriquet very well.

"Among the ladies was the Lady Carr; who was the celebrated beauty of the day. She had been, I believe, a Miss Gunning, and her sister set her cap at the Marquis of Lorn, eldest son of the Duke of Argyle. A song circulated about her, of which the burthen was, "This is the Maiden all for-Lorn." She wrote novels; but did not get hold of the marquis.*

"There was a Lady Betty Clayton to whom Lord Lansdowne used to go for advice. She was his oracle—his familiar oracle. His oracle for law was Sir Eardly Wilmot, the Ex-Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. At Hastings' trial, Lord Lansdowne made me give my opinion on some of the evidence. It was unfavourable to his views. He did not much care about Hastings; but knowing the part the king took, and having all the king's conversations reported to him, he professed to take Hastings' part. The borough of Calne was held by a tottering hold, and the Treasury once or twice endeavoured to shake him in it.

"The Miss C—— were daughters of an Irish Baronet, and were at Bath lodging together. Lord Shelburne mentioned them to me as relatives of his. One of them was afterwards invited to Bowood, and came to Bowood. Lord Shelburne had been trumpeting me up, in order to make her think highly of me. I remember their singing a duet (Alley Croker) in a tragical sort of way. I like cheerful singing. Lord Shelburne asked me

* Bentham's recollections of the celebrated Irish beauties, the fortunate sister Gunnings, appears, as with him in other instances of merely fashionable characters, to have been imperfect. The lady to whom he refers was not the Miss Gunning who wrote novels, and was "all for-Lorn," but the sister of Lady Coventry, not Carr, and successively Duchess of Argyle and Duchess of Hamilton;—"a Duchess of two tails," as from her double titles she was termed by Dr. Johnson, when he saw her grace on his Scottish tour.—E. T. M.

my opinion of the singing; and when he saw I was no admirer of the style, he gave up the scheme he had contemplated."

There was a small menagerie at Bowood, to which Bentham added a white fox, which his brother had sent from Archangel. Lord Shelburne was fond of collecting anything that was rather out of the way. The white fox gave occasion to some pleasantries in those days—when we called some of the Bowood ladies "The White Foxes."

To the end of his days Bentham spoke of Bowood and its inhabitants with intense affection. I have often seen tears roll down his cheeks when reverting to some of the loved inhabitants of that mansion. The truth is, even his tenderest affections had been engaged by one of the fair ladies of Bowood. It was only a short time before his death that he sent a playful "love epistle" to that lady—speaking of the grey hairs of age, and the bliss of youth. I was with Bentham when the answer came to this letter—that answer was cold and distant—it contained no reference to the state of former affections; and he was indescribably hurt and disappointed by it. I talked to him, however, of "auld lang syne," and reminded him of Burns' song, and his beautiful reference to the times gone by. When I repeated "we twa ha'e pu'd the gowans fine," he was cheered a little—the past recollection was brighter than the present thought—but he was for a long time silent, and greatly moved;—at last he said, "Take me forward, I entreat you, to the future—do not let me go back to the past—talk of something—find out something to remove my thoughts from the time of my youth."

"One day, when calling on Miss —, at Little Holland House, on a Sunday, I found her and Miss — on their way to church. We were joined by S. S—, and, when near the church, I said to him, from Horace—and he answered, 'I go because it is my trade.'

'Parvus Deorum cultor et infrequens;'

"I went to Streatham at this time (1783.) Lord Shelburne was then minister. There was the house which belonged to Mr. Thrale, which was hired by the minister to retire to. I remember there were pictures of all the wits of the age. Lord Fitzmaurice had a little turn of malignity—a sort of child in intellect. He told me of the amours of the Duchess of —, who was a sort of Messalina. There was, in the Shelburne family, a kind of division into factions—that of the child by the first bed, and the child by the second. Lord Shelburne was a good-looking, on the whole, a handsome man, with a coarse skin. He had a little disposition to be rather knock-kneed.

"Lord Fitzmaurice once attempted to speak in the House of Commons: he was put down by Pitt. He married a widow who had a large family of children. He was a poor creature. He spent much money at Southampton on a castle without any ground to it. In 1783, though of man's stature, he did not dine with the family. He used to put me in a cart, a large child's cart, and drag me about."

Yet even Bowood could have its annoyances.

On one occasion, Lord Chatham, William Pitt, Lord Camden, and Banks, determined to make Bentham the subject of their joke. It was after dinner, and they were all taking coffee. He said something, upon which one burst into a loud laugh, and was followed by the three others. He asked what it meant; and, instead of answering, they all laughed again; and they repeated this every time he spoke. No doubt, some trick had been practised upon him of which he was not aware. The whole matter was then, and ever after, incomprehensible to him; for the laughing took place in the midst of serious conversation, in which nothing ridiculous was said by himself or others. But Bentham was sorely mortified, and probably exhibited his vexation; for, soon after, he overheard a conversation between Lord Landsdowne and Mr. Banks to this effect:—Mr. B. "Has he then taken offence?"—"No! he is too good-natured a man for that, and will think nothing of it." The parties had become conscious of their ill behaviour.

Bentham's susceptibilities were always most acute; and he was touched to the quick by what he considered a confederation of important personages to practice on these susceptibilities.

Lord Camden was a hobbledy-hoy, and had no polish of manners. Pitt was cold; showed little curiosity about, or complacency for other men; and, on ordinary occasions was incapable of rudeness. His manners had little grace or kindness. Once, when riding out with Bentham, who entreated him to slacken his pace, as he (Bentham) was mounted on a dangerous horse; he did so, but with an unchanged countenance, and without dropping a word of interest or kindness. Of Banks, Bentham formed a low estimate.

At Bowood, all the statesmen he met seemed wanting in the great elements of statesmanship: always engaged in discussion about what was, and seldom or never about what ought to be.

"I have sent," he said, "to the present Lord Lansdowne, a history of my intercourse with his father and his family. He will have shown it to those who remain of that generation. He was in his nurse's arms when Miss V— was about twenty or twenty-one. She had the reputation of a great beauty, which I could never discover. The Earl of P— courted, and was refused, because he had the scurvy; and Lord E—, the son of the Duke of G—, was not allowed to marry her by his father, because she was not rich enough. She was a piece of aristocratical ice. The unmarried Miss V— was a good, sociable kind of person, very good tempered. I went with Moore, Secretary to the Society of Arts, to Warwick castle with Bauber Smith. Miss V— blushed; but there had been no flirtation between her and me. Miss E. V— was not more than seven or eight years older than Miss F—.

"Though Lord L— has neither the wish nor the power to do much good, yet the other lords are as much below him, as he is below what he ought to be. He said to me, the lords were a wall against improvement. Only conceive his father, with a bad education, taking up 'Judicial Establishment' with the highest glee. There was much criticism that was amusing to him. He was 'awe-struck,' he said, with the "Essay on Morals and Legislation," which he read through.

"I am so much an animal mei generis, that people must bear from me what they would not bear from others. I shall tell Lord Lansdowne that aristocracy is on the wane, and that things would have been borne in his father's time, which would not be borne now."

Among the beauties of the day were Lady Pembroke, and her sister Lady Diana Beauclerc. They were daughters of the Duke of Marlborough. Lady Pembroke was somewhat short, but had still a handsome countenance, on which Bentham often looked with delight, charmed with being in the presence of one he had often heard called a goddess. He found that she was on bad terms with her lord; and no wonder: for Lord Pembroke was a roué, and openly unfaithful. There was some management at Bowood, so to invite Lord and Lady Pembroke that they might not meet. Bentham visited Lord Pembroke, who showed him many curiosities: he was a great horse-breeder; and, on exhibiting a fine Arabian steed, took some trouble to explain how the genuine race might be distinguished from the mixed or spurious. The thickness of the neck was the only point that Bentham brought away from the lesson. Lord P.'s house was like a statuary's shop—crowded with antiquities. He told many anecdotes; among which was one of a serious dispute between two French naturalists, who had long vehemently discussed the existence or non-existence of an animal between a horse and a mule, called a Jumard. One of them, Maupertuis (the other was Beaugerard,) cried out, on his death-bed, "Laissez moi mourir dans la douce persuasion qu'il n'y a point de Jumard." Lady Diana Beauclerc was renowned for her limning productions, and was considered a most accomplished person. Her husband, though but a commoner, had ducal and royal blood in his veins. He studied chemistry, and to much purpose, under the instructions of Dr. Fordyce, at a time when scarcely anybody but professional men condescended to pay attention to the subject. "One of the visitors at Lord Pembroke's was Fonthill Beckford, who, as soon as he entered, sat down at the harpsichord, and played delightfully. The Bishop of Derry was another guest. He, with Flood, my old bed-fellow's brother, had well-nigh republicanized Ireland; but they were put down by Lord Charlemont. The bishop was a pleasant and a clever man. He did not believe in revealed religion: he was very tolerant in his judgment of others; and, in political opinions, most liberal.

"There were, Sir James Long; Mr. Bull, who managed, I think, the borough of Calne; Lord Dartry, who loved the bottle so well, that Lord S—— used to complain of his passing it too briskly; but Lord S—— owed him no small number of pecuniary favours; there were Mr. Banks, Mr. Pratt, and Mr. Dunning, who shocked me by narrating one of his exploits at Bristol. He had been hanging two poor wretches there, and he talked of it with consummate glee. There was then an odd sort of animal in the House of Lords, whom we sometimes saw,—one Lord Harborough, who was not a bishop, but only a parson!"

Bentham once met at Bowood, Edward Poore, whom I have mentioned among his fellow-students at Oxford. Edward was a very remarkable character. He was of a considerable family in Wiltshire, one of whom had been a Welsh judge. He was two years older than Bentham, and joined him at Oxford, having got a five-guinea prize at Winchester. He was very precocious, but withal a conceited chattering coxcomb, and remarkably ugly. But his head was full of ideas, as was Bentham's, and so they became intimate friends. The friendship did not last. Poore came into possession of a large estate—went to Italy—fell into profligate habits—came home, and went to Italy again. He was a barrister on the Western Circuit. His language was pompous and affected. On one occasion, in a case about rubbish, he called the rubbish in his opening, quisquillious matter; and Jekyll, on his cross-examination of the first witness, asked, "Did you ever see any quisquillious matter deposited?" "No, not I indeed," was the reply. Harris, who had patronized Poore was compelled to drop him. He fell into all sorts of misfortunes, and became the object of public indignation. Once, while Poore was in his opulent state, and during their greatest intimacy, Bentham had been robbed of all his money, and asked of Poore the loan of a guinea. He refused.—"Strange creature!" was Bentham's ejaculation when speaking of him.

"Lord L——, the son of the great Lord L——, was a tall, pale-faced lord, whose countenance indicated a bad disposition; but for that unfortunate expression of visage, he might have been deemed handsome.

"Linguet wrote a book in defence of despotism. He was the violent enemy of the democrats, and was the most celebrated orator of his time. He was clapped into the Bastille. He was the remarkable man of his day for the eloquence with which he justified despotism. He used to dress himself out very finely with sword and satin in all its glory. Lord Shelburne introduced him to my acquaintance. He was obliged to expatriate himself. His plaidoyers are extant, and I made use of them. He speaks of the enormous expenses of the decrees of the judge.

"When Sir Benjamin Hobhouse visited Bowood, in 1781, he was put into my hands, to show him the lions.

"Townsend, the Spanish traveller, was a favourite at Bowood. He married a person who was a Lady Clark: she was the widow of a navy captain; plain enough; but she was a good cook, and Townsend liked good eating. She had something of a jointure too. When I visited them, the table was distinguished for many delicacies and much variety. There were all sorts of powders, such as hung beef to spread upon bread and butter. Something was wrong with the lady's mouth; I know not what; but I know she wore what were called plumpers, or pieces of cork in her mouth. There was always a piece of work to manage the plumpers so that the defects might not appear. I used to be amused with the droll effects of her anxiety about her plumpers. She spent the whole morning at her toilette, plumping and painting, and never appeared till three o'clock in the afternoon."

When the Treaty of Peace was negotiated in 1783, M. Rayneval assisted the Count Choiseul in the negotiations. The count found rank,—the plebeian, brains. Rayneval, though somewhat clever, was both dull and proud. He and the young Viscount de Vergennes, son of the prince, then Prime Minister of France, were handed over by Lord Shelburne to Bentham for the purpose of being escorted to the sights of London. Bentham was struck with the extraordinary ignorance of the viscount, who, though only from twenty to twenty-three years old, was married, and carried about his wife's picture in his fob with his watch. His visit lasted some weeks. Lord Shelburne's eldest son was generally of the company. Sharp's Iron Works, Boydell's Print Shop, and Longman's Musical Instrument Manufactory were, at that time, among the most interesting of the trading establishments of the metropolis. At one of the dinners at Lord Shelburne's, Gibraltar was the topic, and Rayneval was very desirous it should be given up by the English. There were among the guests those who thought Gibraltar was not worth keeping. One instance of Vergennes's incredible want of knowledge, was this:—he said to Bentham, "Are there any such people in England as authors?" "Yes, truly," was the answer; "there are—perhaps not so numerous nor so good as at Paris, but the race is not wholly unknown." "Indeed!" said he, "are there really?" He was a very child in information, yet was he the man sent to make peace between two great nations. His ignorance offended less than Rayneval's morgue; he covered it over with no veil, however thin. I have heard Bentham mention his fright at having overturned a screen upon Rayneval, who, however, did not resent the misfortune. It was compensated by a breakfast which Bentham gave him in Lincoln's Inn, and by some lessons in the pronunciation of the English language.

It was to George Wilson, of whom more anon, that most of the letters from Bowood were written. "He," said Bentham, "was a follower of mine, but he always put himself at the door of some aristocrat or other. He had a great deal of mauvaise honte, and fear of ridicule. His ideas were clarified by my phraseology. I was blind in 1781 for two or three months, and he was reading Coke upon Lyttleton. I wanted ideas, and asked him to read aloud, for those ideas were better than none. I made many observations, showing him that these ideas were to be amended: he did not want them to be amended, but only to learn how he could make money out of them.* He once saved my life. We went to bathe at Leyton. I could not swim—not a single stroke. The tide was rapid. I walked on up to my neck. I thought of turning back; I turned round, but could not resist the tide. I floundered about, my head sometimes above, sometimes under the water. He was scampering about in the meadows; I cried out. He saw me, now up, now down; he plunged in and saved me. I was then thinking of my death, and the effect my death would have upon others. I thought of my brother, and that his affections were not as strong as mine. George Wilson told me to be perfectly passive. I felt that I was a-going, a-going; but he rescued me, and dragged me to the shore. This must have been in 1782."

At Bowood, Bentham was engaged in writing his "Introduction to Morals and Legislation." It made progress by no means satisfactory to him. "I had got into a mizmaze," he said; "I could not see my way clearly,—it was a dark forest,—for the vast field of law was around me, with all its labyrinths. Little by little, great principles threw their light upon the field, and the path became clear. At this period of my life, I was not proof against dogmatism. I was more willing to listen to the man who spoke of what ought to be, than to him who described what was. Experience has given a different value to conversation."

Dr. Anderson* had written a pamphlet on the Value of the Western Fishery. Like most authors, exaggerating the importance of the matter on which he was engaged, and anticipating most improbable results from the remedies he was suggesting for the redress of national grievances; he was exceedingly desirous of obtaining Bentham's approval of his plans, and his concurrence in the desirableness of their being communicated to the public. I find in his letters the expression of a strong desire that, when dead, he may be thought of, as having written something which the world would not willingly let die. In answer, Bentham sent him the following admirable letter:—

Wednesday, May 28th, 1783.

DEAR SIR,—I am sincerely sorry you do not seem to acquiesce in Mr. Wilson's opinion, which is entirely mine. I will own myself anxious that this pamphlet may never see the light, and that much more on account of your reputation than your purse. There is really a combination among your friends—who are indeed very much your friends, or they would never undertake so invidious a task—to strangle this unhappy bantling in its cradle. Without pretending to assign all their reasons, to which I might not be able to do justice, I will take the liberty of giving you a few of mine. I say a few, for you will not expect that I should write a pamphlet, in order to prove that you ought not to publish another pamphlet. Why it is you should be so much attached to it, I cannot conceive; for I really do not see a syllable in it that is new. Whether the observations relative to the difficulty

* Few of our old Edinburgh readers require to be told who this George Wilson was; and many must know him from the Memoirs of Romilly, of whom he was the early and life-long friend. The Memoirs of Romilly give a much more favourable, and probably as accurate an impression of a man, whom Bentham seems to have known only on the lawyer and worldly side of his character.—E. T. M.

of collecting a revenue in thinly-peopled countries, are originally yours or not, I will not pretend to say, though I confess I suspect the negative; but sure I am they are yours already: witness your last pamphlet. Those relative to the inefficacy of bounties, and the injudicious, or supposed injudicious, conditions annexed to them, I thought ingenious when I read them, and well worth more attention than it suited me to bestow; but they too, are yours already: witness your observations on national industry, in which this very subject is treated more satisfactorily, as far as I can speak upon recollection, than in the very pamphlet which professes to treat of nothing else. What you say of the difficulties attending infant manufactures, is there also anticipated. What is there in all this that you should be so anxious to "discover" and to "preserve?" Look back to your own works and you will find it discovered and preserved already, as far as printing and publishing can discover and preserve it. Is it the idea of getting towns built on the spot in question? This has been suggested, and, you will excuse me for saying, suggested, I think, in a more instructive manner, almost these twenty years, by Sir J. Stewart, in the concluding passage of book ii. chap. 30, which I have before me; and I am told, over and over again, in Campbell's Political Survey, which I have not seen. Is it the idea of engaging people at large to build, by grants of land? America, a country in much better repute, justly or unjustly, than the Scottish Isles, gives land without stint, without such conditions, and with timber on it that cries, "come out me," as plain as ever a herring cried "come catch me." Is it the idea of giving the son of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, a place to rest his head on? America is large enough for him, and as open to him as to any disciple of Christ. I question whether you are aware that Jews, native Jews, are already, and have been for hundreds of years, upon just as good a footing, as to the acquiring of land, as native Christians; and that the object of the act (are you aware of that act?) which was so soon repealed, in consequence of a temporary and party clamour, was only to hold out naturalization to foreign Jews. I speak from Blackstone and from the act itself. Is it the idea of getting Parliament to venture the sum required, because that sum would not exceed, as you suppose without any calculation, the amount of one month's expense of the war, as you have written it in huge letters? My dear sir, do you consider that one month's expense of the war is about a million of money, more or less? that a work not of supererogation, but of pressing necessity, long ago begun, and far advanced in the building,—I mean a penitentiary house for the home circuit,—stands still for the want of a tenth or a twentieth of that sum? that a house somewhat upon that plan is wanted for Edinburgh, that £8000 would do the business, and that this trifle, as it may seem to you, is more than Mr. Stewart, late Lord Provost of Edinburgh, the patron of the scheme, a most intelligent and public spirited man, has any hopes of getting? so he told me himself within these three

Catching fish in the Western Isles might be made a very beneficial business—a business much more beneficial than it is,—a business more beneficial than any other that could be carried on with an equal capital; but not unless conducted by people, and they in considerable numbers, having fixed habitations in those isles. All this may be true; but what reason have you offered further than your own averment (repeated, and enforced in abundance of declamatory language,) for thinking it so? What data have these twenty years' reflection and experience of yours (experience of what?) furnished, upon which any, even a most superficial judgment of the matter, can be grounded? What are the trades and manufactures, the association of which would be necessary for carrying on this branch of industry? Net-makers, hook-makers, and so forth. This might be known by surveying and analyzing the furniture of a fishing ship, &c., and considering whence it came. What would be the capital necessary for the stocking of those trades and manufactures? How is that capital to be supplied? If too great for one private undertaker, would it be too great for a partnership? If too great for a partnership, would it for an incorporated company? If too great for an incorporated company, who would be working for their own profit, is there any chance of its being carried on by agents appointed by the crown, working for the benefit of I don't know who? What do the Dutch lose by the disadvantages of distance? Is that disadvantage more than equal to the habitual and inveterate difference between British and Dutch economy? Supposing a greater profit might be made by a given capital employed in this way, than by the same capital employed in any other (a point necessary to be made out, with at least some general show of probability,) why am I, who am carrying on a flourishing manufacture at Manchester, to be taxed, to have money taken out of my pocket, to be given to you to catch fish with in the isles of Scotland? Certainly I ought not, unless with that money you could bring to market a great many more pounds worth of fish than I could of cloth. When you have given something of an answer to these questions, I may perhaps be able to supply you with as many more; and when you have answered those, then perhaps your pamphlet may have some claim to the title it assumes: supposing all the while that I, who am a mere novice in political economy, can, in the course of a most hasty and superficial glance, have gone any part of the way towards exhausting the considerations necessary for founding a judgment upon this complicated question. When you have collected the matter above alluded to, you may then the better afford to leave out all general disquisitions about human nature, especially if they should have nothing either very new in the matter, or pointed in the manner: all histories of the European transactions in the East Indies: all controversies founded on loose expressions of Mr. Howlett, or Mr. anybody else, relative to abstract propositions on the subject of population: all caveats against Dr. Tucker, or Dr. anybody else, about the property of supposed new ideas: all invectives against ministers, in or out of place, on the score of measures which have no other connexion with that in question, than in so far as they relate to money: all declamations founded on the supposition that the ruin of a country, which is to be starved this summer, is no otherwise to be prevented than by raising piles of brick and mortar, which may come to be lived in two or three years hence; but of all things, all passages tending to insinuate, in terms more or less explicit, that all political men, if not all men whatever, are equally blind and profligate, and that the whole stock of intelligence, as well as probity in the world, happens by some odd accident, to centre in a single person, whose censure, without the weight of proof, is to stamp indelible infamy on every head it lights on. It is now past one—I began at past eleven; and these representations, I see, but too plainly are coloured by the impatience which late hours, and multiplied avocations, give to a sensible temperament and feeble constitution: but if you make the requisite abatements you may profit: and as you know the motive (for what motive but one could have induced me to give us both this plaguing-bout,) you will forgive."

He proceeds on a second sheet:—

"In the other sheet you have my opinion on your pamphlet; if, notwithstanding, you persist in printing it, all I have to say to you further is, that your orders will be obeyed. And yet, why in London?—in Edinburgh, printing is not only cheaper, but better done. But that you must doubtless have made up your mind about."

The answer to this letter is characteristic enough. It occupies nine closely written pages; and is intended to show to Bentham, that if he had studied the subject as thoroughly as the author, he would have formed a higher estimate of the value of his labours. Reputation is less his end than usefulness—glory than truth; yet he had read the letter three times over, on three several days, coolly and calmly, but still finds the knowledge it exhibits "extremely crude and undigested, and the tone of the epistle peevish, petulant, sarcastic, fretful:" "exhibiting qualities which self-knowledge would have taught him to avoid exhibiting," and suggesting that Bentham might "profit by" Anderson's "lessons." He calls Bentham's letter a "humiliating inadvertency,"—"degrading him to an inferior level," and so forth—yet expresses high admiration for his talents and his virtues. It is to the credit of both, that these sharp discussions did not interfere with friendly intercourse,—but it must not be forgotten, that the criticisms of Bentham were invited—those of Anderson intruded.

To this correspondence Bentham made allusion when he had passed his eightieth year. "I remember a correspondence with Dr. Anderson. He was grievously offended with one of my letters. I did not, when young, show that attention to the feelings of others which I have learnt since; and I believe he had some reason for being offended."

A letter to Mr. Stewart of Edinburgh, exhibits the character of Bentham's inquiries with reference to the effects of Scotch education upon the public morals. It would be interesting to follow the inquiry here reverted to, through the various states of Europe. Compare the cost of religious instruction in different countries, and then compare the state of crime. Let it be seen what effect money, as a means of procuring the discharge of ecclesiastical functions has upon the morals of a community;—whether a richly endowed church is productive of the riches of good works—whether the cheaper Presbyterianism of the north is more or less prolific of Christian excellence than the richer Episcopacy of the south; in a word, whether the money disposed of by our opulent Establishment is well, or ill spent, with a view to the end proposed, namely, the increase of virtue and the diminution of crime.

"June 27th, 1783.

"SIR,—I take advantage of your very obliging permission, to trouble you with a memorandum of the documents I wish for, relative to the criminal law of your part of the island.

"By way of a clue, give me leave to mention the purpose. Upon the supposition that the influence of religious instruction is beneficial, upon the whole, to the temporal interests of society, and that the labours of the clergy do a certain degree of service by what they contribute towards turning this influence to account; I know of no observable standard more exact for estimating the value of that service, than the comparative paucity of such mischievous acts, as the law has stigmatized under the denomination of crimes. England, which, containing such a number of people, and such a quantity of wealth, pays to its clergy such a sum (which is distributed among them in such a manner,)—has in a given period, such a number of criminals: Scotland, which containing such a number of people, and such a quantity of wealth, pays to its clergy, so much less in proportion, and that distributed in a different manner—has in the same period, such or such another number of criminals. I am apt to think it would turn out that this latter number, instead of being greater than that in England, in proportion as the pay of the clergy in Scotland is less, is in fact less; and that therefore, in Scotland, the clerical work is not only done for less money than in England, but better done. This is the inference I am disposed to draw from the Table of Convictions in Scotland, already published by our excellent friend Mr. Howard. But, as that table extends to no other than capital crimes, the information it affords, can be, as you must perceive, but very unsatisfactory with a view to my purpose. It is the more so, inasmuch as the same crimes which are capital in England, are not so, in every instance, in Scotland, and vice versa. To be sure, in both countries the denominations of crimes, &c., are, in but too many instances, determined not so much by the real nature of the mischief, as by extraneous and accidental circumstances, such as the punishment or mode of prosecution—but this is an imperfection I cannot help. I must take the information, and be glad to get it too, as it stands. What I wish for is, therefore, a table of the crimes, that within a certain period (suppose from the beginning of the century,) have been known to be committed in Scotland,—the more extensive as to the sorts of crimes, and the more minute the distinctions, so much the better. As to the distinctions, those given in Mr. Howard's table are, as far as that goes, sufficiently particular: the head of murder excepted, inasmuch as it makes no distinction between homicide in prosecution of robbery, and the murder of a defenceless person through particular enmity, fair duelling, and I don't know how many other species I could point out, but which are as different from one another as guilt from innocence.

"I say, have been known to be committed; and therefore, a table of the trials would be much more satisfactory than a table of the bare convictions,—and still more so, an account, which I suppose it is impossible to obtain, of informations lodged before a magistrate. You have a method, I have heard, of transporting suspected persons, with their consent, without a trial; of these, some, I presume, would, were it not for such provision, have gone into the class of those informed against, but discharged for want of sufficient evidence—others into the class of convicts.

"I dare say it is but a small part of all this information that is attainable; but any part that it should be in your way to obtain for me, without too much trouble, I should think myself infinitely obliged to you for.

"To a man of Mr. Stewart's turn of mind, the various public uses which at any rate such a sort of document might be put to, and the credit which (if my conjecture be well grounded) the result would reflect upon his friend, must, if fame says true, hold out inducements infinitely more favourable than any that could be presented by the acknowledgments of so insignificant an individual as myself. And that the information may receive a much greater degree of circulation than I could expect to give it, we will make Howard insert it in his next publication. He will, I dare say, be very glad of it, for he seemed to acquiesce in my remarks on the incompleteness of that printed in his own appendix. Be there more or less of it, the copying of it must necessarily be attended with some expense.—You will be kind enough to direct the copyist to make a memorandum of it, that I may pay the amount of it to your house in London.

"I took the liberty, as you may perhaps remember, of claiming kin to you and Mr. Howard as a kind of brother of the trade; which I certainly am, as far as endeavours go at least, however inferior in point of means. The only proof I can as yet produce to you, in support of such a pretension, is contained in a little pamphlet, [the letter to Mr. Eden,] a copy of which herewith sent, I hope you will do me the honour to accept.—I am, with great truth and regard, Sir, your most obedient humble servant.

"J. B.

"The expense and trouble it cost me, were not wholly thrown away; as the Bill, which was the subject of it, underwent a number of alterations, several of which, I understood by a note from Sir W. Blackstone, were the consequence of my remarks."

In a letter of George Wilson to Bentham, dated 3d Nov., 1783, is the following passage:—

"Wallace is gone down to Tinmouth in Devonshire; they say it is the place where Dunning died, and in all probability Wallace goes on the same errand. Everybody says that Erskine will be Solicitor-general—and if he is, or indeed whether he is or not, he will have had the most rapid rise that has been known at the bar; it is four years and a half since he was called, and in that time he has cleared £8,000 or £9,000, besides paying his debts, got a silk gown, and business of at least £3,000 a year—a seat in parliament,—and over and above, has made his brother Lord Advocate. For my part, I have great doubts whether his coming into parliament was a wise thing; he sacrificed his House-of-Commons business, which was very profitable; and besides, his success seems to me very doubtful. He has several of Burke's defects, and is not unlikely to have his fate; and the expectation from him will be too great to be satisfied. We expect a match between him and Pitt, and another between Fox and Flood.

"The apprehensions about Ireland are not quite so great since the Leinster meeting, where there was not the same appearance of unanimity as at Dungannon. We have not yet heard of any meeting of the other two provinces; and their parliament has been adjourned for some time. The Bishop of Derry goes to the House of Peers attended by a troop of horse, who remain on duty during his stay there. He quite eclipses the Lord Lieutenant. What a pity he is not captain of a man of war, and his son a bishop!"

APROPOS TO THE ROYAL NURSERY!

BY N. OR M.

THERE is an order of the day in even the chit-chat of society; and, since the birth of the Princess-Royal, it is amazing how people have taken to thinking and talking about the pains and pleasures of the rising generation. Everybody is handling a coral,—all the world appears to be cutting its teeth. Little Bo-peep, Margery Dave, and a great many more nursery canzonets, are actually set to music: harmonized for three voices, or arranged as duets, and dedicated to the Princess Royal.

It is curious to observe how the graver interests of life fluctuate at the instigation of trivial influences; a breath more or less sufficing to agitate the vane of public opinion. An industrious flea, or a new air plant; will create a sect, or beget a science. A year or two ago, the corruptions engendered on the hot-bed of civilisation having created a new crime, by causing a poor little Italian boy to be Burked for dissection, as an easier mode of plunder than robbing on the king's highway, Italian boys rose cent. per cent. in public estimation. Christian people who, for twenty previous years, had seen them, their white mice and marmots, freezing in the snow or pattering in the mud,—their sharp features gaunt with famine,—their naked feet gangrened with blains,—became suddenly touched with pity. Their tears gushed forth, like the waters of Horeb, because the Daily Advertiser assured them it was a monstrous thing for helpless infants to be kidnapped at Como, and sent to London, like Whittington's cat upon a venture, to be starved, bullied, flogged, stupified with laudanum, and chopped into mince-meat, in order to meet the commercial exigencies of a nation the least scrupulous in matters of traffic of any that ever drove a bargain since Joseph's brethren sold him into slavery. Nay, an artist hitherto unnoticed, rose into fame from adopting, as his school, the specific delineation of monkey-boys. All the world grew tender as a chicken towards the little grinders of street-organs, and the long-neglected itinerant Savoyard.

We would fain have the birth of the little Princess-Royal beget a similar feeling of sympathy with the juvenile classes of the community, in all situations of life.

Among the gaudy blossoms of literature flowering annually on our library tables, there is one which purports to delineate the children of the British nobility, in their everyday attire,—purple and fine linen—furbelows and foolscaps. Without entering into the good or bad taste which allows lords and ladies in their second childhood to make a show for money of lords and ladies in their first, we are inclined to agree with a merry fellow, named Albany Poyntz, who proposes, in a contemporary periodical, a crusade or war of liberation, to enfranchise these unhappy victims of aristocratic vanity and pride, from the torture of stocks and backboards, curling irons, and tight shoes.

But with all due commiseration for that suffering race, the children of the nobility, previous to rending asunder their chains of gold, we would fain strike off the iron fetters from the still more miserable children of the poor. Before we propose a remedy for a surfeit of the milk and honey of Canaan, we are in duty bound to alleviate the tortures of the house of bondage.

It is all very well for lachrymose travellers to go and cry in the gallery at Munich over Rubens' "Massacre of the Innocents;" or grow pensive at home over Lord Ashley's speeches in favour of factory children, or Mrs. Norton's charming poem. In all homes, in all places, infant martyrs are lying within reach of the interference of the humane, bound to the rack of persecution. If the maudlin philanthropists, who have instituted a society for the suppression of cruelty to animals; and who are incessantly besetting the magistrates in behalf of some costermonger's donkey or over-driven ox, would only direct their attention to the thumpings and bumpings, starvation and flagellation, of the juvenile generation in Spitalfields or St. Giles's, or any other refuge of the poor, they would show a finer sense of humanity than by protecting the tougher skins of the beasts that perish.

We look upon this as one of the most urgent duties of our mission. CHILDREN were the first pledge committed to the charge of Adam, after his fall, to enable him to work back his way to the favour of the Maker he had offended. CHILDREN are the holiest trust delegated to our mortal hands; —CHILDREN are the objects whereupon we are permitted to exercise an authority approaching nearest to the power of the Creator over the created. Our responsibility is nowhere greater than in our entreatment of these hostages of God.

Yet how audaciously do we abuse our power! —not as regards the children of our own loins; for if they are flogged too hard, their roaring disturbs us; if they are starved, there is the undertaker's bill! Seriously speaking, our personal comfort is too closely embarked in their well-doing to admit of closing our hearts against their claims. But, for at least one half of the human race, these helpless beings—these chartered victims of selfishness, carelessness, and cruelty—the children of the poor, are of no more account than if they were so many earthworms crawling forth to be trod on. The children of pride contemplate the children of the poor as Pharaoh regarded the plague of flies and other abominations infesting his kingly chamber.

We confess there are more of them in the world than the world, as at present apportioned, can well provide for. The anti-population question we leave to the abler hands of Malthus and Miss Martineau. But from the moment the children encumber the earth, we hold them to be entitled to our good offices. The CHILDREN—the CHILDREN—we lift up our hands and voices in intercession for the CHILDREN! The penal legislation of this moral realm is duly severe upon mothers found guilty of assisting out of a world of wo the infants they have assisted into it; and even to conceal the birth of a child of shame passes for an act of criminality still more shameful. When are we to direct our retribution against the authors of the death that "dies daily?"—against the concealers of the sufferings of the still unmurdered child? When shall we have to punish the parents who suffer their children's features to sharpen with want, while they infest the gin-shop—their children's frames to sicken in filth and squalor, while they pursue the easy vocation of the street-beggar?—for there are two species of loungers on the pavement of every metropolis—the loungeur who duns you for a glance, and the loungeur who implores you for a halfpenny—both idle, thriftless, useless creatures, in their several generations.

The lordly legislator who, as he is proceeding to the House to vote with or against Lord Ashley, according to his political animosities, (as if Christianity admitted the distinctions of Whig or Tory,) damns the troublesome little brutes who run under the wheels of his cabriolet—giving them a cut with his whip, to punish them for not having been run over; is, ten to one, a man who indulges in vagaries about Prison Discipline, and gets up crack speeches once a session upon the Penitentiary System. Why not rather direct his tender mercies towards this troublesome seed-crop for the gallows and the solitary cell—this well-cultivated field?

vice and crime? While, on one hand, we hang (to get him out of the way) some troublesome burglar, or a cut-throat, who will not allow elderly lords to sleep comfortably in their beds, we are rearing up thousands of Greenacres and Courvoisiers, and patronising normal schools for the diffusion of crime. Your Corn-law supporter will scarcely pass a thistle on the king's highway without switching off its head, in the interest of agriculture, for the benefit and security of his land. Will he do nothing toward the extirpation of the human weeds of the soil? Will he not so much as uplift his hand in behalf of the "little children?"

Scarcely a week but brings to light, before the tribunals of the land, some act of heinous barbarity committed upon the persons of children. Charles Lamb, in one of his admirable essays, bewails the fate of the poor, who have to "drag up" instead of "bringing up" their offspring; and talks of the careworn features of the needy child, and its talk of the price of coals, or the repayment of clearstarching. Why, this is the very luxuriousness of pauperism! Blessed those who are even acquainted with the value of coals, or who can produce clearstarching to be paid for! The starveling, whose blood stagnates in its blue veins, or the little wretch who fights with the cat for the bone it has pilfered, looks with envy upon the thrifty young clearstarcher. The damp sack or dirty shavings it has to sleep upon—the cuffs and imprecations wherewith it is roused before daybreak from even that uneasy couch—the miserable yearnings after food, which it wants only courage to pick and steal—are bitterer evidences of the hardness of its destinies, and of our hearts, than the longings after bats and balls, and hawthorn bushes, imagined by the tender instincts of Elia!

From this matter-of-fact consideration of the children of the mobility, how are we to find courage for the consideration of the elegancies of a royal nursery, or the fair features displayed in the "Juvenile Annual?" The pearly skins and flaxen curls of these favourites of fortune—their joyous looks and guileless smiles, basking in the sunshine of prosperity and love, oppress us with too painful a sense of sympathy with those into whose souls the iron of destiny hath entered! They are as angels before the fall: their ragged rivals, the howling imps, whom the wrath of the Almighty hath overtaken!

But a dawning hope persuades us that these evils are about to experience a partial remedy. Our young QUEEN has become a MOTHER!—her feelings are daily and hourly interested in the condition of a frail and tender being, in whose behalf the prayers of her kingdom are offered up to heaven. In the name of this young child, we earnestly entreat of her to take into her gracious consideration the wants and woes, and consequent vices, of the CHILDREN OF THE POOR.

NEW NOVELS.

MRS. GORE'S GREVILLE; OR, A SEASON IN PARIS.

BULWER'S NIGHT AND MORNING.

THE novel season of 1841 has opened brilliantly. Sir Edward Bulwer makes his bow to the public, after an absence of three years; Mrs. Gore her curtsy, after about the same number of months. The former occupies his original English ground, with no diminution of force and vigour, and with ripened experience of men and manners; the lady has changed the scene, with evident advantage to her readers, both as regards their amusement and information. Mrs. Gore, who has been domiciled in Paris for a good many years, now that she has left that gay capital for London, is exactly in the best imaginable position for painting Parisian society; while remoteness allows freedom of handling, and the original impressions remain fresh and sharp. Whatever the English may think of this new fiction, the French, and especially the Parisians, must be enchanted with her flattering and delicately discriminative portraiture. In taste, in manners, and even in truly refined epicureanism; in the genuine philosophy of luxurious enjoyment, Mrs. Gore places the noblesse and fashionables of Paris by many degrees above those of the same rank in London; and if we are to admit her premises, and receive her report implicitly, and without modification or abatement, her estimate is just. Those of the French who live but for themselves, and their own little circle, scarcely taking the rest of mankind at all into account, and never but as subordinate existences, are not only more good-natured than their proud, fastidious, and supercilious insular neighbours, but they better understand the secret of enjoyment, and obtain a vast deal more pleasure for their time and money. Their frivolity is not really greater than that of their English compeers, though it may wear a gayer aspect; and if their selfishness is equally intense, the development of their egotism, in social intercourse, is more graceful, animated, and amiable, and much less offensive to the more important classes of society. In points involving the higher interests of morality, there may be little essential difference between the idle and dissipated portion of the French and English aristocracy; but in the minor humanities, in courtesy, considerateness for the feelings of others, general amiability of deportment, and bien-séance, the French of the higher orders are superior to the cold-mannered and haughty insular slaves of a conventional code, which they have formed to be their own torment, and to which they would subjugate all around them.

To point out those differences of opinion and circumstance which regulate or modify the manners and habits of the French noblesse, and which mark a quite distinct race, if not rather the social antipodes of the English nobility, is one main object of "GREVILLE;" which is to be viewed as an animated and faithful representation of the French character, and of existing Parisian customs and modes, as well as an entertaining novel. In respect of invention and plot, "Greville" has little to boast. It is a mere shifting of the old ground from Mayfair to the Faubourg St. Germain. The incidents are still balls, fêtes, dinners, and operas; but they are Parisian; and if the characters are of the same class as those that figure in all Mrs. Gore's romances, they are at least French marquises, and dowagers, and demoiselles, instead of English. This change is a relief; for we are glad to perceive symptoms of the stanchest romance-reading milliners' apprentices becoming heart-sick of the weary inanity of English high life, and seeking relief in "Jack Shepherd." The vehement popularity of the Beggars' Opera must, we suspect, have been in part attributable to the sickening and mawkish sentimental dramas, and unnatural and vapid operatic pieces of that period. In "Greville" we have not even those reflexes of the great, the toadies, hangers-on, roguish valets, and adroit ladies'-maids, which Mrs. Gore often introduces; but, in compensation, we have whatever of variety the fashionable society of Paris affords, and a few admirable specimens of the pure old school of the Faubourg, deriving its lustre from the age of Louis XIV., but softened and purified by adverse fortune.

Lord Greville, the only child of a mother who loves him better than anything in the world, save power, is, with every advantage of mind and person, the heir of forty thousand a-year. To protract the period of pupilage, the countess educates her son in strict seclusion from society, and gives up the world to devote herself wholly to the single object of her love and her ambition. She has other motives for her conduct, but it is long before these transpire; and hence the actions of Lady Greville often appear as inconsistent as if she were a real person; a license, we believe, not permitted by the critics. One consequence of the excess of maternal vigilance is, that, in trying to save the young Earl from being snapped up the moment of his appearance, by some manœuvring dowager of Almack's, he is, by a train of trivial incidents, charmingly narrated, launched into the highest society of Paris, before he has seen anything of the London world.

He is sent yachting to the Mediterranean and Levant, and travels in Greece and other eastern countries, until his return to England becomes inevitable. His mother then intercepts him at Naples, whither the family physician had sent her, at her own suggestion, for the benefit of her health, when every other scheme of keeping Greville from England had failed. The same motherly over-care precipitates Greville on Paris, and, in escaping one imagined danger for her heir, the countess exposes him to real peril; for, by the way, Greville nearly falls a sacrifice to the blue eyes of a lovely and charming French girl, united, by a marriage of convenience, to an ancient Marquis de Rostanges,—a polished specimen of the old school, and the tender and indulgent partner of a singularly amiable and affectionate young wife. Madame de Rostanges has a younger orphan sister, Eugénie, of a higher and more classic style of beauty than her lovely self, and of superior intellect and noble character; who gradually becomes attached to the manly, accomplished, and ingratiating young Englishman, with whom her acquaintance had commenced in those romantic circumstances which gave him a powerful hold upon the warm gratitude and affection of the Rostanges family. The innocent anxiety of Sophie, the marchioness, to promote the happiness of her beloved Eugénie, leads to endless misunderstandings and embarrassments, which, in Greville's ignorance of the true relations of French society, betray him into a rash declaration of love to the married sister; while he is almost equally in love with Eugénie, and only attracted to Sophie by the remarkable sweetness of her manners, and that frankness and ease of intercourse, which French usages permit to the youngest matron, but forbid to the unmarried girl. When he learns the secret of Eugénie's attachment to himself,—an attachment fostered by Sophie's original belief that the attentions shown to herself by Greville, arose from the desire of recommending himself to her sister, his vagrant fancy vanishes like the distempered dream which gave it birth. But, to say the truth, the plot is not very skilfully or carefully constructed. It is enough that the flimsy texture is able to sustain the brilliant and shifting scenes and characters, the many just and piquant remarks with which it is embossed; and those nice traits of difference in national aristocratic manners, which it has been Mrs. Gore's especial object to paint. With the exception of Fred Massingberd, an insolent, supercilious, and thoroughly selfish London dandy, and his caustic old father, an Oxfordshire squire, the few English personages are cut on Mrs. Gore's ordinary patterns, of courtiers, roués, fashionable mothers and daughters, surly John-Bull Daronets, and their pretty and insipid overdressed wives. It is into the French characters, and the scenes and incidents in Paris, that her strength is thrown.

It is worthy of remark, that it is generally the well-informed and well-bred English themselves who are the most apt to observe and censure the absurdities, conceit, ignorance, insolence, and purse-pride displayed by their dear country-people when on the continent. Upon our table, at this moment, lie together the united testimonies of Mrs. Gore in "Greville," Mrs. Bray in her "Mountains of Switzerland," Captain Basil Hall in "Patchwork," and Miss Pigott, in her amusing work, reviewed in the present number of this Magazine; all alike condemnatory of the foibles and follies which make so many of the travelling English ridiculous in the eyes of Europe. Nor is this censure confined by these writers to the mere dandies, who, like Greville's friend, Massingberd, overtop their parts.

This superlative gentleman, an old schoolfellow of the young earl, fastens upon him to enjoy the luxuries of his travelling establishment, and to initiate him into what Fred considers the world of fashion in Paris, in its different spheres. The companions arrive in the capital, at what is in Paris the most delightful season of the year—early in May—Greville preoccupied by the cordial invitation he had got to the Hôtel de Rostanges, at which the inmates were daily expected. After the accident—a fire—which had thrown them together, he had left them on the road in his carriage. The acquaintance he had formed with this charming family had been greatly to the discontent and annoyance of the supercilious dandy, who plays off all manner of insolent airs to prove his superior acquaintance with the great world and with Paris; while his untractable pupil runs carelessly about enjoying himself, and feeling delightfully amused in a scene where all is novel and enchanting; quite indifferent to his fashionable reputation, or want of bon ton. His fame was in imminent jeopardy. It was necessary, among many other important nothings, for Massingberd first to ascertain, “if these De Rostanges were people with whom one can associate.” The Englishmen went to dine at Véry’s; and Fred breaks out:—

“Not here—we are not going to dine in the salon!”—cried Massingberd, in a rage, as the garçon, with his skirtless jacket and white apron, showed the way into a spacious saloon, whose widely-open windows overlooked the green alleys of the gardens of the Palais Royal, in which at that hour hundreds of persons were enjoying their newspaper and their demi tasse. “The dinner was ordered by my courrier. Show us into our cabinet.”

It was in vain the civil waiter assured the indignant Massingberd that “the courier had said nothing of a cabinet particulier;—that the courier had probably supposed ces messieurs would find it more cheerful in the public room than in a close little chamber.”—The dandy answered by a torrent of hybrid oaths, half English, half French; insisting that a cabinet should be instantly prepared to receive them. After a moment’s anxious colloquy with the dame du comptoir, to whom the insolent irritability of English exquism was probably familiar, they were entreated to wait a moment, while a lady and gentleman who were paying their bill made a hasty exit; and, instead of sitting down to the comfortable table prepared for them beside the open window, were shown into a little stuffy closet looking towards the dirty, noisy street, strongly perfumed by the pommes de terre à la Lyonnaise and other savoury plats enjoyed by their predecessors.

“Here, we shall be completely to ourselves,—here, we shall be comfortable!”—cried Massingberd, as the garçon proceeded to disencumber a chamber, the size of a four-post bedstead, of the dirty plates and dirty tablecloth. “One could not possibly dine in that horrible salon,—full of English—English of all sorts and conditions of vulgarity.”

“I saw several gentlemanly old Frenchmen look up from their dinners, surprised and disturbed by our sudden entrance and exit,” said Greville, taking up the Charivari while waiting for his bisque d’oreviesces.

“Chevaliers d’industrie, most likely,” retorted Massingberd, in his usual tone of disparagement. “What wine shall we have?—some Comète Chablis?—No!—it is the Rocher which is famous for that. We will try the Condrieu with our fish,—then, some light claret.”

“I condition only for champagne, and well iced,” said Greville, oppressed by his hot and dusty walk of the morning.

“Not till the dessert, I entreat!” cried Massingberd; “unless you wish to be set down as an unsophisticated John Bull. It is so thoroughly English to come to a café and call for champagne before the soup is off the table!”

“Will you allow me some seltzer water, then, and some hook?”

“Vin du Rhin, and welcome,” replied the gastronome. And Greville found that, to lead a quiet life with his friend, he must eat, drink, and sleep only according to his discretion.

The dinner, though sworn at dish by dish by Massingberd, proved its own excellence by putting him into high good humour.

“After such a dinner, and so many months’ abstinence from viands fit to be placed before a Christian,” cried Fred, as they re-entered their cabriolet, “one feels as if existence were not quite so great a bore;—one feels as if there were still something worth living for.”

“Lord Greville, who was of opinion that this world contains a variety of things worth living for, even without reference to the épigramme d’agneau and meringue glacé he was digesting, ventured to inquire of his companion in what manner he intended to dispose of their evening.

“La belle Wilmen is no longer here, and Dejazet’s name is not in the affiche to-night, or I should have proposed remaining where we are,” said he, as they passed that dirty, but amusing little temple of ungodliness,—the Theatre of the Palais Royal. “To say the truth,” he continued mysteriously, “I have a word or two to say to St. George, at the club. You shall drop me near the Rue de Grammont. I recommend you to try the Vaudeville. One is always amused at the Vaudeville; or, at worst, made to forget that one is bored.”

Enough of the English dandy. In spite of him, the young and unsophisticated earl makes his way to the Hôtel de Rostanges in the Rue St. Dominique, which hôtel is in itself a picture and a history:—

The Hôtel de Rostanges, which, seen by the dim light of a réverbère slung across the centre of the street, produced this unfavourable impression, was, nevertheless, a residence such as the Parisians of high caste delight in;—entre cour et jardin,—that is, having an ill-paved courtyard in front, rendered unsightly by the stables and their appendages; and in the rear, a small garden, surrounded by lofty walls, obscuring the inner apartments of the rez de chaussée, and securing dulness and dampness for the whole house. Still, it was the Hôtel de Rostanges; the self-same house in which, a century before, the Marchionesses of Rostanges had smiled upon the gallantries of the Richelieus and Bouffiers of their day; the self-same house in which bigotry, ignorance, vanity, and pride, had united to create a race tending to engender the madness of the first revolution and the folly of the second.

At this venerable aristocratic residence, the young Englishman is frankly and most cordially welcomed; and his natural and national shyness vanish at once:—

“It is strange enough,” said he, in describing the scene afterwards to Frederick Massingberd, “that I, whom you accuse of being reserved, and who feel myself to be the shyest dog on earth, am never gêné among French people!”

“I suppose their cursed impudence serves to put you at your ease,” replied the most modest of dandies.

“No,—I know many impudent people who never put me at my ease,” replied Greville drily. “I believe it to arise from their great simplicity of manners. The English are always pretending to be something beyond their reality; the French are content to appear what they are. Our country-people, with great affectation of sincerity, are the least genuine of created beings. An Englishman situated with respect to me as the Marquis de Rostanges is, would have sent me a dinner invitation at a fortnight’s notice, and got up a gorgeous entertainment. The old gentleman on finding me alone here this morning, carried me off to his home, which I found in all the confusion incident on their recent arrival; presented me sans façon to his friends; and would fain have me share what he called his soaps and bowlls to-day, had not pleaded my engagement with you and St. George at the Rocher."

"What an escape!—you have no conception of the ordinaire of an ordinary French family!" cried Massingberd, with an air of nausea.

"I am no great gourmand. I should have been quite satisfied to pass the day and dine with them, as they wished," replied Greville; "but I knew that you and St. George would make an outcry. However, I have promised that we will both dine there to-morrow!"

"Thanks!—I hope I know better!—St. George and I dine at the club."

"You must write your own excuse, then!"

"Not I. I have not French enough for any such undertaking. You may tell them that I had another engagement."

"But you would not be guilty of such rudeness to any Englishman of Monsieur de Rostanges's age and rank!—Why give him such an opinion of our ill-breeding as must arise from such marked disrespect!" cried the earl.

"Disrespect!—Why, who on earth ever heard of the Marquis de Rostanges?" exclaimed Massingberd.

"Who on earth, out of England, ever heard of half our own nobility?" argued Greville. "The marquis seems to hold an excellent position here."

"My dear fellow, remember the brown Noah's-ark!—the marquis's travelling carriage. Recollect the snobbish country-cousin who burnt down his house, toasting cakes for their supper!"

"Recollect the equipages of some of the eminentissimi of Italy," replied Greville. "And what great family in England but has some small squire of a country cousin, among its junior branches?" Then, hastily resuming, lest Massingberd might see in this remark a sarcasm levelled at himself, he added, "We must not measure everything by the narrow scale of our English experience. I am convinced that the Rostanges family is one of high account; and whether it be so or not, it is one from whose society I expect to derive my chief enjoyment during my stay in Paris."

"Je vous en fais mon compliment!—All I entreat is, that you will allow me to look for my amusements elsewhere!" rejoined Fred Massingberd, with unfeigned contempt.

"By the way," added the earl, "the Princesse de Chaulieu, to whom you were mentioned by her friends the Rostanges, desired me to tell you that she was at home every Tuesday evening; and the Duchesse de St. Pierre, that she receives every Thursday. You will, of course, call on both as an acknowledgment of their civility."

"My fellow shall leave a card for me; but as to those cursed evening visits of the Faubourg, all I have heard from St. George determines me not to waste my time in any such corvée," replied Fred.

Greville was soon almost domesticated in the house of the kind and courteous old marquis; and, in a few weeks, we find him thus attacked by his English friends:—

"Invited to the Princesse de Montfaucon's déjeuner, to the Russian Ambassador's morning concert, to the Duchesse de Monthémont's soirées dansantes!" cried Lord St. George, casting his eyes over the billets d'invitation, lying on Greville's table. "Upon my soul, Greville, for a shy fellow (as you say you are) you manage to get on wonderfully!—Why, these are the fixed stars of the Faubourg!—I flatter myself I stand pretty well in Paris. I flatter myself I am pretty well received at the embassy, and on a tolerably good footing with Orleans and Nemours. But I never so much as saw the interior of one of those Faubourg houses!"

"You have perhaps assigned the reason," said Greville, willing to spare his self-love, "in your intimacy with the princes."

"No, no—my dear fellow. Many men of the Faubourg have been drawn into an acquaintance with the Duke of Orleans, through the interests of the Turf. The Jockey Club, like misery, makes a man acquainted with strange bedfellows. No!—it is not politics that have caused my ostracism; for, sooth to say, I never was at the trouble of setting foot in the Tuilleries."

"Perhaps equally you avoided the trouble of seeking an introduction to the Carlist circles! They are not people to thrust their civilities upon a stranger. Their habits of life are simple,—their fêtes unostentatious: and unless certain that foreigners really desire to be acquainted with them, and to accept their hospitalities in the same frank spirit they are offered, they would rather not see fussy, sneering Englishwomen, or cold supercilious Englishmen, encumbering the doorways of their salons."

"I am never likely to encumber their doorways!" cried Lord St. George, reddening. "I hate all that sort of thing. Twopenny whist, (the everlasting French game, too!) cassuorée and a couple of quinquets, do not enter into my conceptions of amusement. Ten to one rather stick to my club!"

"There! you have exemplified my meaning at once. The old French society is afraid of inviting us, because they know we don't like modest soirées, and would rather stick to our club. You have completely justified them. They measure our desires by the splendid hospitalities of our embassy, where everything is conducted on a scale which three of their fortunes united could not compass; and which, even if they could, would be incompatible with the general simplicity of their modes of life."

"Simplicity!—shabbiness, you mean!" cried St. George. "The French are naturally addicted to paltry pitiful ways. They talk about the excellent arrangement of our establishments, and the admirable order of our household service. By Jove! a Monsieur le Comte would die of fright at a single day's expenses of one of our steward's rooms, servants' halls, or hunting stables!"

"And well he might,—since it would probably include his quarter's income!" replied Greville, seriously. "That which you call shabbiness I call order. The French are prudent people; they seldom run out. It is rare, I find, for one of their great families to be in embarrassed circumstances. I will not ask you to look at home."

"They can't run out if they would," sneered Lord St. George. "Credit is unknown in Paris; and how can people be ruined who are required to pay ready money?"

"You are offering an unanswerable argument in favour of short payments," cried Greville, laughing. "However, I must still maintain that the French possess more than ourselves a tendency to regulate their expenses by their means. Their fortunes are inconsiderable compared with those of England; yet, the prudence of their domestic arrangements enables them to do twice as much with their money."

"They are not eaten out of house and home, I admit, by a pack of useless servants. They don't keep a hall full of powdered footmen for mere show. They have only the men they require, each of whom costs them, from first to last, fifty pounds a-year, the mere wages of an English butler," observed St. George. "But then these brutes are kept in the rough, in the way that no English fellow would support."

"They at least do not appear dissatisfied. What attached servants! Admire the length of time they remain in families, and with what respectful affection their duty is performed! The Marquis de Rostanges has barely four thousand a year, and lives within his fortune. Yet I declare to you I never saw an English intérieur more unexceptionable."

"I dare say he takes care that everything shall be tolerably well got up for you!"—observed St. George, with a significant smile.

"On the contrary, the great charm of the thing consists in the fact that nothing is got up. A French house does not admit of the superficial ostentation practised in England. Everything passes under one's eyes,—everything is canvassed. It is not an article of good breeding, as with us, to be ignorant of all that is going on in your establishment."

"Thank Heaven, we have better things to amuse us than such dirty details!" exclaimed St. George, warning. "Our women boast accomplishments that afford occupation for their time ; our men, their political pursuits, which—

"Do not altogether detach us from the stable, or prevent our better halves from wasting their mornings in shopping, or gossiping with their attendants," replied Greville.

"With respect to our countrywomen, at least," observed Lord St. George, "it behoves us to speak feelingly. An Englishwoman with her half dozen, dozen, or dozen and a half of children, passes her best days as a nurse, and consequently as the companion of nurses. Two or three olive branches at the utmost, form the stint here, where the property must be equally divided ; and your Frenchwoman, married at seventeen, turns over her two little ugly monkeys to the care of a bonne, and returns at twenty, unencumbered to the pleasures of society."

"I have reason, nevertheless, to believe them tender and attentive mothers," remonstrated Greville, angrily.

"Because the meagreness of their establishments compels them to have their children always in the way !"—retorted St. George, with a smile. "At Greville Abbey, at least, Madame la Comtesse will acquire habits more suitable !"

"Of whom, and what, are you talking ?"—cried Lord Greville, in utter amazement.

"Of Eugénie, Countess of Greville,—with whom, I trust, my friend Lady Greville may be as much enchanted as yourself," replied St. George, settling his cravat at the glass.

In the meanwhile, Greville's heart, as we hinted above, is divided between the soft blue eyes of the gentle marchioness, and the brilliant dark orbs of her high-spirited and high-minded sister, whose character is cast in a deeper mould than that of an ordinary French demoiselle, usually a puppet in the hands of the friends who are to marry her. Eugénie is every day more and more captivated by the refinement, spirit, and solid understanding of the English earl : he becomes, in short, the Oswald of a new and more natural Corinne.

A ball given by the Duchess de St. Pierre, a cousin of Sophie and Eugénie, a beauty and a finished coquette, yet a good wife and mother—for that character is possible in France which could hardly exist in England—throws the manners of the two countries into amusing contrast, and exhibits, with every advantage, a Parisian interior of the most distinguished kind. The Lady Cobham, who represents the beauty and fashion of England, is the pretty and silly sister of Fred Massingberd, with whom, by a strange crotchet, Lady Greville fancies her son in love. That pattern matron, who followed her son to Paris, had not been at a ball for twenty years ; but, to restrain "these imprudent young people," she subjected herself to the annoyance, and accepted the invitation of the duchess.

And to the amazement of her son, she persevered in the intention.

"She will certainly be the belle of the ball," mused her ladyship, when, on the eventful evening of the fête, Lady Cobham, covered with diamonds, in a white satin dress trimmed with a profusion of artificial flowers, entered the room. "How richly and elegantly dressed !—what lustre diamonds impart to the countenance !" And she scarcely wondered at Lord Greville's desire to exhibit so favourable a specimen of English beauty in that brilliant assemblage.

The Hôtel de St. Pierre, enclosed within a spacious courtyard in the Rue de Varennes, and containing on the ground-floor a suite of magnificent apartments, was admirably calculated for a fête. To a vestibule full of antique furniture of richly-carved ebony, succeeded several rooms fitted up in a fantastic style, with old china, paintings, cabinets, and sculpture ; ending in a saloon of princely dimensions, the gorgeous gilding of which, intermingled with rich hangings of yellow damask, was lighted on every side by multitudes of candles in lustres of ormoulu, profusely interspersed with crystal drops.

To this stately chamber, on whose fauteuils and ottomans were crowded all the fair and fashionable of Paris, succeeded a dancing gallery of fine dimensions, opening to illuminated gardens ;—the parquet being composed of a rich mosaic of foreign woods beautifully inlaid, while the orchestra was half hidden in a fanciful recess. In all directions, draperies of the lightest muslin, or arabesques of the most delicate tracery, ornamented the walls. Lights, innumerable lights, filled up the spaces between. It was, in short, a Parisian mansion in the richest style of modern decoration.

With the exception of the attachés of the embassy, the Grevilles and Cobhams were the only English present ; and nothing could be more studiously courteous than the mode of their reception. Scarcely, however, had Lady Cobham made her appearance in the ball-room, when a murmur of mingled approval and condemnation greeted the party.

"What a pretty woman,—but how outrageously attired !" cried Albert de La Roche Aymar, attracted by a new face.

"Charmante !—il est à parier que c'est une Anglaise !" cried the Comte de St. Sévrou, one of the sommités of the Faubourg.

"Plutôt une comédienne de province !" retorted Achille de Cerny. "But no !—she is accompanied by Lord Greville,—she is accompanied by Masanbert !—C'est quelqu'une de la société."

"But what a toilette !" remonstrated one of the lionnes most in vogue.

"A satin gown in the month of May !" cried another.

"Diamonds at this time of the year !" added a third.

"And artificial flowers at a summer ball !" exclaimed a fourth.

"Sins of ignorance are always deserving mercy !"—pleaded the Comte de St. Sévrou ; "d'autant plus that this milédi is really a woman of rare loveliness."

"The more the pity that she should be so horribly fagottée !" murmured a chorus of lionnes.

There was not leisure, however, for circumstantial criticism. Waltzing was the order of the night, for Strauss conducted the orchestra ; and scarcely a single contredanse was allowed to give breathing time between the real business of the ball.

Lady Cobham, meanwhile, stood leaning on her husband's arm, à l'Anglaise, as near the door as possible, wondering at the rapidity of the valse and the gay aspect of the scene ; and more particularly at finding the French ladies, of whose taste and elegance she had heard so much, so miserably underdressed.

"Nothing but muslin dresses and natural flowers !"—whispered she to Lady Greville, as les lionnes, in their coiffures of roses, pinks, geraniums, Judæa, blossoms, or amaryllises, were whirled past them rapidly in the dance, emitting all the fragrance of a moving flower-garden. "Not a single jewel,—not a single ornament !"

"They look like so many school-misses at a dancing-master's ball !" sneered Sir James Cobham. "How different from our Englishwomen of rank and fashion !"

"Our ladies are not forced to trust entirely to their mantuamakers and hairdressers for attraction !" again growled Sir James Cobham ; and again the country baronet was honoured with a bow of affable amazement.

"The arts of lighting and ventilation, in short, are in their infancy," resumed Achille de Cerny, addressing himself pointedly to Lady Cobham. "I doubt whether the whole London season affords a ball so light, so gay, so airy, so well imagined, as this,—unless indeed in one or two of your great houses, whose proprietors have adopted the habits of the continent !"

"Est-il impayable !" exclaimed the Prince de Chauvieu, addressing Madame de Rostanges, whom he was leading towards a set that was forming. "Is there any man in Paris, saving Cerny the Anglomane, capable of uttering such a speech as that to an Anglaise? Cerny, too, who to us is always bepraising the fêtes of London!"

"Let us conclude that he has imported the brusquerie of the English dandies with his grooms and horses," observed the marchioness, gaily.

"Traïtress!"—whispered Chaullieu:—"do you dare to breathe a word against England,—you, the last conquête won from us by our national foe!"

The observation was fortunately lost upon Madame de Rostanges; who, being one of the most exquisite dancers of the Faubourg, was more interested in ascertaining that they had secured a satisfactory ris-à-ris for the contre-danse, than in listening to the whispers of the Prince de Chaullieu.

"Ah! we have got Claire de St. Pierre and La Roche Aymar!"—said she, eagerly taking her place; "and near an open window too. Quel bonheur!"

Greville, meanwhile, who had never in his life been prevailed upon to dance a step, could find no better occupation than to assume beside Lady Cobham the place which Madame de St. Pierre, who had been doing the honours of her ball to the pretty foreigner, had just quitted for the dance.

"Who is that pretty delicate girl, with white geraniums in her hair?"—asked Lady Cobham.

"The Marchioness de Rostanges,—a cousin of the duchess, and the person through whom we were invited here to-night," replied the earl.

"A marchioness!—a married woman,—and yet so light and lively!"—Madame de St. Pierre, too, dances with all the spirit of a girl!"—sighed poor Lady Cobham; "and yet she assures me that she is the mother of two children!"

"And why not?"—cried Greville, laughing; "a Frenchwoman would never have occasion to dance at all, unless she danced after her marriage. In this room, there are not a dozen unmarried girls, and those chiefly the daughters of diplomatists and foreigners. All the young and gay creatures around us are mères de famille."

"How happy they all look!—What spirits!" said Julia, wistfully, while Sir James Cobham shrugged his shoulders with an air of compassion.

We have seen the pleasures and amusements of the young, and of those not too old for gay society, in one of the first houses in Paris; but the aged have also their appropriate and tranquil social enjoyments. The dowager Marchioness de Rostanges, the aunt of the marquis, was the mother of the Duchess St. Pierre. On a particular evening, Greville returning unexpectedly from the Chantilly races, found the charming sisters going out, and invited himself to accompany them.

"You ought to apprise Lord Greville, said Mademoiselle de Nangis, "that he will have to support the ennui of a dowager party,—the Saturday boston of old Madame de Rostanges."

"The marchioness resides, then, with her daughter?" inquired Greville, intent only upon the beautiful face on which his eyes were riveted; while Sophie proceeded to explain, that the marquis, being one of the habitués of his kinswoman, had repaired to her soirée at the time they had set forth for their evening drive.

"It would have amazed Fred Massingberd and Lord St. George, who were at that moment quaffing Lord Greville's Chamberlain to his health, amid shouts of laughter and piquant allusions, to have witnessed with what delight he was proceeding to a dowager party in the Faubourg; composed, according to Lord St. George's former description, of two quinquets, a few glasses of au sucrée, and old women, male and female, à discretion.

The Marquise de Rostanges, a woman venerable alike from age and character, occupied an entresol over the brilliant rez de chaussée of the Hôtel St. Pierre. According to the French custom which unites the mother and only child till death does them part, this distribution had been made on the marriage of Claire de Rostanges with the Duc de St. Pierre; and, unsatisfactory as such arrangements prove in England, in France they are felt to contribute to the happiness and respectability of all parties.

The marchioness, a woman of serious habits, was never seen in the gay assemblies of her daughter; nor was the duchess invariably present at the sober parties, uniting weekly round the old lady persons of her own age and opinions. But there never passed a day of which some portion was not devoted by Claire to her mother. Amid all her gaieties, all her dissipations, that duty was never neglected; and it was perhaps owing to the restraining influence of that grave mother's precepts and example, that, notwithstanding the coquetry of Madame de St. Pierre, and the dangers to which it exposed her, she was still worthy the praise lavished on her by her cousin Sophie, as the best of wives and mothers.

The dowager, on the other hand, obtaining from her daughter's society the enlivenment of which she stood in need, experienced no temptation to intrude into gayer scenes unsuitable to her age. Nothing more rare, indeed, than to see a Parisian fête disfigured by the presence of a woman advanced in years. No palsied dowagers, as in London, dishonouring the name they bear by the exhibition of their wrinkles, their rouge, and their unreverend weakness for the things of this world! Satisfied that every age has its appointed pleasures, and reconciled by the deference of their families to resign the frivolous dissipations of the world, they retire with decency from the stage, to make way for a younger generation.

The amusement of this high-bred ancient party of friends is whist, and the lively and polished, if not the witty conversation of the salons of the old régime. But the polish appears somewhat dimmed; and the subtle essence has evaporated. We should have liked to display something of the "gay, outdoor Paris of May," but must here leave to the reader's leisure the lively and brilliant work, whose beauties we have very faintly indicated.

NIGHT AND MORNING; DAY AND NIGHT, LIGHTS AND SHADOWS, GLIMMER AND GLOOM,—there is not much in a name after the first five minutes; but the author of "Pelham" has prudently chosen one which may catch the ear, and which besides furnishes opportunities of rounding off a few resonant periods, and indulging in a vein of moralizing and reflective sentiment. "Night and Morning" is composed of sterner stuff than the light and graceful fiction which we have been describing above: it probes social ills more deeply, and takes a larger and holder survey of life, and all that it inherits of good and of evil. It must be confessed, that great latitude of exaggeration, and an overstrained energy, are too often employed to bring out the intended effects; but then they are brought out. It is the triumph of genius, that those creations which, critically, may be pronounced the most improbable, forced, unnatural, and monstrous, are precisely those which, under its plastic hands, become the most effective: like Fanny, the half-idiot girl, the female Cymon, of this novel; whom physiologists and all scientific and sober-minded persons would at once denounce, but in whom the imaginative will but the more delight. In judging of works of imagination, the degree in which they arrest and conquer the educated, ordinary reader is, after all, the final standard of popular criticism. No great portion of the world ever went long astray in admiration of any one book, or style of composition, which was not pos-seemed of some enduring quality that appeals to universal nature; from Ossian's air-woven ghosts to the modern "thieves' literature." The critics have been as severe in judging "Werther," and "The Robbers," as the moralists; and yet both proscribed productions continue to enjoy a tolerably extensive popularity. Commend us then to those writers who, boldly infringing, or, haply, despising, every rule of Art, contrive, notwithstanding, to impress and fascinate the great body of readers; charming by the very hardihood and daring that intimates the consciousness of undisciplined power. The reading public begin—and, as we conceive, wisely and most legitimately—to consider those who interpose between them and the free, unbiassed enjoyment of their author, as not a little impertinent and officious; and to claim the great Protestant privilege of private judgment—the literary franchise—at least in works intended for their entertainment. With a more modest sense of the limitations of our province than some of our learned contemporaries, and at all times a strong disposition to be pleased with whatever shape in which we find literature ministering to harmless and refined enjoyment, and as great a disgust to the idle and inglorious task of "breaking a butterfly upon the wheel," as if it were spinning a cockchaffer, we flatter ourselves that we perform our function with sufficient good-nature, and have our reward in often finding ourselves, like the admirers of the irregular and intractable authors to whom we have alluded, pleased and delighted in spite of every good reason the critics can allege why we should be just the reverse: with the extravagances of "Night and Morning," for example, which displays all its author's ordinary faults—we call them idiosyncracies, characteristics, individualities—but makes rich amends by the liberal exhibition of the power and beauty which distinguish the fictions of its author. Sir E. Bulwer has now a ripened knowledge of the principles of his art, and great facility in the practice of its resources; but these he holds subordinate to that which is greater than art.

As the production of a new unknown author, "Night and Morning" would have obtained a high reputation. It is, taken by itself, a popular addition to a series of popular fictions. Possessing all the characteristics of the author, and even a larger infusion of the purely melodramatic, the "elevating and surprising," than any of Bulwer's former works, it has many scenes of genuine passion, and some new modifications of character, especially of the comic kind, such as the country bookseller who fancied that he resembled Napoleon. One of the most original and powerful of the personages is Gawtre, a vaurien, represented as the victim of circumstances and temperament; a character to which those critics who look strictly to moral tendencies, may take exception, though he is, at least, a fine new variety of the species. Gawtre is the Bethlem Gabor of ordinary life; a man of colossal proportions, robust animal spirits, generous feelings, and warm affections. Save that his intense, perennial and unabating hatred of his first undoer, his dark and revengeful feelings, cherished for so many years, seem incompatible with the genial nature of Gawtre, we fear that he is far from being a character out of nature, in a polished and corrupt society, where, in a mind originally of warm and generous impulses, the kindly and tender affections will often survive moral principle, never healthfully developed, or stunted and perverted by nearly every circumstance in an untoward career. The object of Gawtre's hate, loathing, and justifiable scorn, is one of those characters which can only be found in the higher classes of society, and which Bulwer delights to gibbet—a cold-blooded, selfish voluptuary—a callous, conscienceless wretch, incapable of remorse, and capable of any villany, which a peer of the realm may practise with impunity from the clutches of the law, and that code of honour which strictly prohibits a gentleman from being detected in cheating at the gaming-table or on the turf, or in telling a lie, save to betray a woman. But we shall meet Lord Lilburne; for, as it is impossible to convey any adequate notion of the work without longer and more varied extracts than our space admits, our single sample shall be Gawtre's early history, in which the peer figures.

At an early period in the story, this reckless but generous person had accidentally befriended the young hero of the tale, Philip Beaufort, whom, from no bad motive, he tried to attach to his own desperate fortunes. The friendless and unhappy boy, though grateful for Gawtre's kindness, and even cherishing a warm affection for the only individual who, since the death of his parents, had shown him disinterested regard, shrunk from intimate contact with a stranger of dubious pursuits and character, until, in despair, he is driven from London to Paris, to solicit the protection and friendship which he had formerly rejected. Here he found Gawtre, under the appropriate name of Monsieur Love, flourishing at the head of a bureau de mariage, which he called the Temple of Hymen, and which affords some amusing scenes of broad farce. This trade of bringing the amorous and the over-reaching together for lucre's sake, is but a paltry office for the huge and jovial Gawtre, who afterwards plays the rogue, or the law-defier, on a more manly and magnificent scale; but he is satisfied; amusing himself, and indulging his shrewd humour with the follies and knavery of his clients, and making money by the undertaking.

Philip Beaufort, the proud, passionate boy, kept out of his inheritance, and branded with illegitimacy by the uncle he defies; reduced to rags and beggary, with a blasted character, and the wrongs of his dead mother burning at his heart, tells Gawtre the story of his sufferings, before he had been forced to seek a perilous refuge with him in Paris:—

"Poor boy! your story interests me. The events are romantic, but the moral is practical, old, everlasting—life, boy, life. Poverty by itself is no such great curse; that is, if it stops short of starving. And passion by itself is a noble thing, sir; but poverty and passion together—poverty and feeling—poverty and pride—the poverty, not of birth, but reverse; and the man who ousts you out of your easy-chair, kicking you with every turn he takes, as he settles himself more comfortably—why, there's no romance in that—hard every-day life, sir! Well, well; so after your brother's letter you resigned yourself to that fellow Smith."

"No; I gave him my money, not my soul. I turned from his door, with a few shillings that he himself thrust into my hand, and walked on—I cared not whither—out of the town, into the fields—till night came; and then, just as I suddenly entered on the highroad, many miles away, the moon rose; and I saw, by the hedge-side, something that seemed like a corpse: it was an old beggar, in the last state of raggedness, disease, and famine. He had lain himself down to die. I shared with him what I had, and helped him to a little inn. As he crossed the threshold, he turned round and blessed me. Do you know, the moment I heard that blessing, a stone seemed rolled away from my heart. I said to myself—'What, then! even I can be of use to some one; and I am better off than that old man, for I have youth and health.' As these thoughts stirred in me, my limbs, before heavy with fatigue, grew light; a strange kind of excitement seized me. I ran on gaily, beneath the moonlight, that smiled over the crisp, broad road. I felt as if no house, not even a palace, were large enough for me that night. And when, at last, wearied out, I crept into a wood, and laid myself down to sleep, I still murmured to myself, 'I have youth and health.' But, in the morning, when I rose, I stretched out my arms, and missed my brother! . . . In two or three days I found employment with a farmer; but we quarreled after a few weeks; for once he wished to strike me; and, somehow or other, I could work, but not serve. Winter had begun when we parted. Oh, such a winter! Then, then I knew what it was to be houseless. How I lived for some months—if to live it can be called—it would pain you to hear, and humble me to speak. At last, I found myself again in London; and one evening, not many days since, I resolved at last—for nothing else seemed left, and I had not touched food for two days—to come to you."

"And why did that never occur to you before?"

"Because," said Philip, with a deep blush—"because I trembled at the power over my actions and my future life that I was to give to one, whom I was to bless as a benefactor, yet distrust as a guide."

"And it was hunger, then, that terrified you at last, even more than I?"

"Perhaps hunger—or perhaps rather the reasoning that comes from hunger. I had not, I say, touched food for two days; and I was standing on that bridge, from which on one side you see the palace of a head of the church, on the other the towers of the abbey, within which the men I have read of in history lie buried. It was a cold, frosty evening, and the river below looked bright with the lamps and stars. I leaned, weak and sickening, against the wall of the bridge; and in one of the arched recesses beside me a cripple held out his hat for pence. I envied him!—he had a livelihood—he was injured to it, perhaps bred to it—he had no shame. By a sudden impulse, I too turned abruptly round—held out my hand to the first passenger, and started at the shrillness of my own voice, as it cried 'Charity.'"

Gawtreys threw another log on the fire, looked complacently round the comfortable room, and rubbed his hands. The young man continued—

"'You should be ashamed of yourself. I've a great mind to give you to the police,' was the answer, in a pert and sharp tone. I looked up, and saw the livery my father's menials had worn. I had been begging my bread from Robert Beaufort's laquay! I said nothing; the man went on his business on tiptoe, that the mud might not splash above the soles of his shoes. Then, thoughts so black that they seemed to blot out every star from the sky—thoughts I had often wrestled against, but to which I now gave myself up with a sort of mad joy—seized me, and I remembered you. I had still preserved the address you gave me."

"Yet, you would know more of me. Faith, my boy, I cannot tell you more at this moment. I believe, to speak fairly, I don't live exactly within the pale of the law. But I'm not a villain!—I never plundered my friend, and called it play!—I never murdered my friend, and called it honour!—I never seduced my friend's wife, and called it gallantry!"—As Gawtreys said this, he drew the words out, one by one, through his grinded teeth, paused, and resumed more gaily—"I struggle with Fortune; viva la mort! I am not what you seem to suppose—exactly a swindler, certainly not a robber! But, as I before told you, I am a charlatan; so is every man who strives to be richer or greater than he is. I, too, want kindness as much as you do. My bread and my cup are at your service. I will try and keep you unsullied, even by the clean dirt that now and then sticks to me. On the other hand, youth, my young friend, has no right to play the censor; and you must take me as you take the world, without being over-scrupulous and dainty."

It is Gawtreys's early story at which we are aiming:—

THE HISTORY OF A GOOD-FOR-NOTHING.

"My grandfather sold walking-sticks and umbrellas in the little passage by Exeter 'Change; he was a man of genius and speculation. As soon as he had scraped together a little money, he lent it to some poor devil with a hard landlord at twenty per cent., and made him take half the loan in umbrellas or bamboos. By these means he got his foot into the ladder, and climbed upward and upward, till, at the age of forty, he had amassed £5000. He then looked about for a wife. An honest trader in the Strand, who dealt largely in cotton prints, possessed an only daughter; this young lady had a legacy, from a great aunt, of £3220, with a small street in St. Giles's, where the tenants paid weekly (all thieves or rogues—all, so their rents were sure.) Now my grandfather conceived a great friendship for the father of this young lady; gave him a hint as to a new pattern in spotted cottons; enticed him to take out a patent, and lent him £700 for the speculation; applied for the money at the very moment cottons were at their worst, and got the daughter instead of the money; by which exchange, you see, he won £2520, to say nothing of the young lady. My grandfather then entered into partnership with the worthy trader, carried on the patent with spirit, and begat two sons. As he grew older, ambition seized him; his sons should be gentlemen. One was sent to college, the other put into a marching regiment. My grandfather meant to die worth a plum; but a fever he caught, in visiting his tenants in St. Giles's, prevented him, and he only left £20,000 equally divided between the sons. My father, the college man," (here Gawtreys paused a moment, took a large draught of the punch, and resumed with a visible effort,) "my father, the college man, was a person of rigid principles—bore an excellent character—had a great regard for the world. He married early and respectably. I am the sole fruit of that union; he lived soberly; his temper was harsh and morose; his home gloomy. He was a very severe father, and my mother died before I was ten years old. When I was fourteen, a little old Frenchman came to lodge with us; he had been persecuted under the old régime for being a philosopher; he filled my head with odd crotchets, which, more or less, have stuck there ever since. At eighteen I was sent to St. John's College, Cambridge. My father was rich enough to have let me go up in the higher rank of a pensioner; but he had lately grown avaricious; he thought that I was extravagant; he made me a sizar, perhaps to spite me. Then, for the first time, those inequalities in life, which the Frenchman had dinned into my ears, met me practically. A sizar! another name for a dog! I had such strength, health, and spirits, that I had more life in my little finger than half the fellow-commoners—genteel, spindle-shanked striplings, who might have passed for a collection of my grandfather's walking-canes—had in their whole bodies. And I often think," continued Gawtreys, "that health and spirits have a great deal to answer for! When we are young we so far resemble savages—who are Nature's young people—that we attach prodigious value to physical advantages. My feats of strength and activity—the clods I thrashed, and the railings I leaped, and the boat-races I won—are they not written in the chronicle of St. John's! These achievements inspired me with an extravagant sense of my own superiority; I could not but despise the rich fellows whom I could have blown down with a sneeze. Nevertheless, there was an impassable barrier between me and them—a sizar was not a proper associate for the favourites of fortune! But there was one young man, a year younger than myself, of high birth, and the heir to considerable wealth, who did not regard me with the same supercilious insolence as the rest; his very rank, perhaps, made him indifferent to the little conventional formalities which influence persons who cannot play at football with this round world; he was the wildest youngster in the university—lamp-breaker—tandem-driver—mob-fighter—a very devil in short—clever, but not in the reading line—small and slight, but brave as a lion. Congenial habits made us intimate, and I loved him like a brother—better than a brother—as a dog loves his master. In all our rows I covered him with my body. He had but to say to me, 'Leap into the water,' and I would not have stopped to pull off my coat. In short, I loved him as a proud man loves one who stands betwixt him and contempt—as an affectionate man loves one who stands between him and solitude. To cut short a long story: my friend, one dark night, committed an outrage against discipline of the most unpardonable character.

The college incident is not important. It is enough that Gawtreys is ignominiously expelled, to save the reputation of the young lord, and to prove his devoted friendship. He continues:—

"I went home in disgrace: I need not tell you what my father said to me; I do not think he ever loved me from that hour. Shortly after this my uncle, George Gawtreys, the captain, returned from abroad; he took a great fancy to me, and I left my father's house (which had grown insufferable) to live with him. He had been a very handsome man—a gay spendthrift; he had got through his fortune, and now lived on his wits—he was a professed gambler. His easy temper, his lively humour, fascinated me; he knew the world well; and, like all gamblers was generous when the dice were lucky, which, to tell you the truth, they generally were, with a man who had no scruples. Though his practices were a little suspected, they had never been discovered. We lived in an elegant apartment, mixed familiarly with men of various ranks, and enjoyed life extremely. I brushed off my college rust, and conceived a taste for expense: I knew not why it was, but in my new existence every one was kind to me; to be sure they were all ne faut riens, and I had spirits that made me welcome everywhere. I was a scamp, but a frolicsome scamp, and that is always a popular character. As yet I was not dishonest, but saw dishonesty round me; and it seemed a very pleasant, jolly mode of making money; and now I again fell into contact with the young heir. My college friend was as wild in London as he had been at Cambridge; but the boy-ruffian, though not then twenty years of age, had grown into the man-villain."

Here Gawtreys paused, and frowned darkly.

"He had great natural parts, this young man; much wit, readiness, and cunning, and he became very intimate with my uncle. He learned of him how to play the dice, and to pack the cards—he paid him £1000 for the knowledge!"

"How! a cheat! You said he was rich."

"His father was very rich, and he had a liberal allowance, but he was very extravagant; and rich men love gain as well as poor men do! He had no excuse but the grand excuse for all vice—SELFISHNESS. Young as he was he became the fashion, and he fattened upon the plunder of his equals, who desired the honour of his acquaintance. Now, I had seen my uncle cheat, but I had never imitated his example; when the man of fashion cheated, and made a jest of his earnings and my scruples—when I saw him courted, flattered, honoured, and his acts unsuspected, because his connexions embraced half the peerage, the temptation grew strong, but I still resisted it. However, my father always said I was born to be a good-for-nothing, and I could not escape my destiny. And now I suddenly fell in love—you don't know what that is yet—so much the better for you. The girl was beautiful, and I thought she loved me—perhaps she did—but I was too poor, so her friends said, for marriage. We courted, as the saying is, in the meanwhile. It was my love for her, my wish to deserve her, that made me iron against my friend's example. I was fool enough to speak to him of Mary—to present him to her: this ended in her seduction." (Again Gawtreys paused, and breathed hard.) "I discovered the treachery—I called out the seducer—he sneered, and refused to fight the low-born adventurer. I struck him to the earth, and then we fought; I was satisfied by a ball through my side! but he," added Gawtreys, rubbing his hands, and with a vindictive chuckle, "he was a cripple for life! When I recovered, I found that my foe, whose sick chamber was crowded with friends and comforters, had taken advantage of my illness to ruin my reputation. He, the swindler, accused me of his own crime: the equivocal character of my uncle confirmed the charge. Him, his own high-born pupil was enabled to unmask, and his disgrace was visited on me. I left my bed, to find my uncle (all disguise over) an avowed partner in a hell, and myself, blasted alike in name, love, past and future. And then, Philip, then I recommenced that career which I have trodden since, the prince of good-fellows and good-for-nothings, with ten thousand aliases, and as many strings to my bow. Society cast me off when I was innocent. Egad, I have had my revenge on society since!—Ho! ho! ho!"

The laugh of this man had in it a moral infection. There was a sort of glorying in its deep tone; it was not the hollow hysteric of shame and despair—it spoke a sanguine joyousness! William Gawtreys was a man whose animal constitution had led him to take animal pleasure in all things: he had enjoyed the poisons he had lived on.

"But your father—surely your father—"

"My father," interrupted Gawtreys, "refused me the money—(but a small sum)—that, once struck with the strong impulse of a sincere penitence, I begged of him, to enable me to get an honest living in an humble trade: his refusal soured the penitence—it gave me an excuse for my career—and conscience grapples to an excuse as a drowning wretch to a straw."

"And your friend," said Philip, after a pause in which his young sympathies went dangerously with the excuses for his benefactor; "what has become of him, and the poor girl!"

"My friend became a great man; he succeeded to his father's peerage—a very ancient one—and to a splendid income. He is living still. Well, you shall hear about the poor girl! We are told of victims of seduction dying in a workhouse, or on a dunghill, penitent, broken-hearted, and uncommonly ragged and sentimental; may be a frequent case, but it is not the worst. It is worse, I think, when the fair, penitent, innocent, credulous dupe, becomes in her turn the deceiver—when she catches vice from the breath upon which she has hung—when she ripens, and mellow, and rots away into painted, blazing, staring, wholesale harlotry—when, in her turn, she ruins warm youth with false smiles and long bills—and when worse—worse than all, when she has children, daughters, perhaps, brought up to the same trade, cooped, plumped, for some hoary lecher, without a heart in their bosoms, unless a balance for weighing money may be called a heart. Mary became this; and I wish to heaven she had rather died in an hospital! Her lover polluted her soul as well as her beauty: he found her another lover when he was tired of her. When she was at the age of thirty-six, I met her in Paris, with a daughter of sixteen. I was then flush with money, frequenting salons, and playing the part of a fine gentleman. She did not know me at first; and she sought my acquaintance: for you must know, my young friend, said Gawtreys, abruptly breaking off the thread of his narrative, "that I am not altogether the low dog you might suppose in seeing me here. At Paris—ah! you don't know Paris—there is a glorious ferment in society, in which the dregs are often uppermost. I came here at the Peace; and here I have resided the greater part of each year ever since. The vast masses of energy and life, broken up by the great thaw of the Imperial system, floating along the tide, are terrible icebergs for the vessel of the state. Some think Napoleonism over: its effects are only begun. Society is shattered from one end to the other; and I laugh at the little rivets by which they think to keep it together. But to return: Paris, I say, is the atmosphere for adventurers. . . . Here I met Mary, and her daughter by my old friend: the daughter, still innocent, but, sacré! in what an element of vice! We knew each other's secrets, Mary and I, and kept them: she thought me a greater knave than I was, and she intrusted to me her intention of selling her child to a rich English marquis. On the other hand, the poor girl confided to me her horror of the scenes she witnessed and the snares that surrounded her. What do you think preserved her pure from all danger? Bah! you will never guess!—It was partly because, if example corrupts, it as often deters; but principally because she loved. A girl who loves one man purely has about her an amulet which defies the advances of the profligate. There was a handsome young Italian, an artist, who frequented the house: he was the man. I had to choose, then, between mother and daughter: I chose the last."

Philip seized hold of Gawtreys's hand, grasped it warmly, and the Good-for-nothing continued—

"Do you know that I loved that girl as well as I had ever loved the mother, though in another way; she was what I had fancied the mother to be; still more fair, more graceful, more winning, with a heart as full of love as her mother's had been of vanity. I loved that child as if she had been my own daughter. I induced her to leave her mother's house—I secreted her—I saw her married to the man she loved—I gave her away, and saw no more of her for several months."

"Why?"

"Because I spent them in prison! The young people could not live upon air: I gave them what I had; and, in order to do more, I did something which displeased the police."

Fanny, the unfortunate child, of hazy intellect, is the orphan of this pair, the idol of Gawtry, and the heroine of "Night and Morning;" the Undine whose slumbering soul love gradually awakes, and endows with a beautiful intelligence—the love of the child, of the maiden, the mother.

We might easily have found more startling incidents, and a more passionate and dramatic illustrative extract than the above, but upon the whole none more significant of the strength and charm of the work.

TOO FUNNY BY HALF!

BY N. OR M.

MATTERS are getting beyond a joke! The aspect of affairs in England exceeds even our most painful anticipations. Rumours of wars in Kam-schatka, or Japan, must certainly be brewing, or new failures of old banks impend over the Gazette; for nothing but the blackest and most profound national hypochondriacism can excuse the strenuous determination to be funny, manifested on all sides this winter by the literary world.—"The Comic English Grammar,"—"The Comic Latin Grammar!"—Why not a funny condemned sermon?—why not an edition, illustrated by Cruikshank, of the Seven Penitential Psalms?—why not a droll treatise upon pulmonary consumption?—why not a humorous description of a dissecting-room,—charnel-house,—the Polytechnic Institution!—

From respect towards Shakspeare's gravediggers, we bore and forbore with "The Comic Almanac"—which affected to make a jest of so grave a matter as the weather—labouring earnestly to distort the world into a grin between the sun's rising and the sun's setting. We were leniently disposed even towards recent pseudo-funny diocesan charges,—addresses to juries,—Government circulars,—and notes from the Home or Foreign offices. It comforted us to find that there was food for mirth in such grave quarters. But certain tingling reminiscences of our minds and bodies, attest that there is sacrilege in trifling with topics so awful as the conjugation of verbs, and declension of nouns. It is like exchanging the wand of an undertaker's mute, for a fool's bauble; it is like replacing a judge's wig with a cap and bells. If any thing in this miserable world still deserves to be respected, it is Lindley Murray; and the wisdom of our ancestors knew better than to crack jokes with the head of Priscian.

It is true the most popular puns current in fashionable society last season, in London, arose from the midnight assassination of an infirm nobleman. It is true the clubs are ready to split their sides every Sabbath morning, with laughing at the funny accounts given in John Bull, of the railway accidents of the week—particularly when death has been caused, or defeature secured, by any very original process of steam-engineering. But what is the gravity of human life to the gravity of grammar!—grammar which causes our earliest tears to flow, and our first penance to tinge the fascicular birch of our first enemy—the Schoolmaster!—We really cannot encourage the desecration of a thing so sacred. Grammar must be tabooed!—

Truly the Great British are a nation most spasmodic in their affections! A poet appears before the public, whose muse and countenance lend themselves to the lugubrious, like the muse and profile of Byron; and straightway Old England puts on weepers, and invests herself in crape and bombazine. Anguish and despair,—terror and remorse,—excruciate the bosoms of the innocent linendrapers' apprentices, from Oxford Street to Cornhill. Howbeit their blackest crimes have consisted in the coveting of raspberry tarts in the confectioners' windows, or a supposititious flirtation with their laundresses, they begin to smite their bosoms like Lara, or tear their hair like Manfred, simply because the popular writer of the day has indited "The Giaour" and other lord-like despondencies! For many succeeding years, not a poet presumes to depict himself otherwise than on the verge of felo de se; while every countenance of consideration assumes an expression of nausea, as if turning away from that great black dose, called human life!—Parnassus becomes a church-yard,—cypress replaces the laurel,—every muse of the sacred nine assumes a garland of “funereal yew, alivered in the moon’s eclipse.” The republic of letters, instead of writing itself down in black and white, enters itself as “black and all black,”—a genteel melancholy being the order of the day.

Anon, comes the merry peal of some joyous fellow of a scribbler, rousing the world into a horse-laugh,—who throws the sops into the sexton’s face, and changes the aspect of the three kingdoms!—Every body knows the story of the country curate, who offered a volume of sermons to a London publisher, just when the success of Tristram Shandy had comicalized the country; and was gravely asked, “Whether they had a touch of the humorous, as nothing now went down but humour.” So, since the triumph of Marryat’s “Peter Simple” and “Jacob Faithful” succeeded to that of the Scotch novels, every blotter of foolscap has grown facetious,—every body pretends to a touch of humour. The Dickenses, Trollopes, Peter Priggenses, Yellow Plushes, Hoods, Hooks, Pooles, Gores, Chamiers, Ingoldsbyes, Quiz, Phiz,—all the successful writers of fiction of the day, vie with each other in their drolleries!—We seem to hear the voices of Liston, John Reeve, or Keeley, chuckling in all their pages; and before we open the volume, prepare our handkerchiefs, that we may laugh till we cry again! Comic annuals, comic all sorts of things, make us wonder how we could have existed before this deluge of deadly liveliness poured its vials of wrath upon the land.

But again, we say,—GRAMMAR!—Who can convert a passing bell into a chime,—an anthem into a carol?—Who would violate the distinctions between a mourning coach and that of the Lord Mayor;—between a private box in a fashionable cemetery, and a private box at the opera?—Shades of Parr, Busby, Johnson,—put forth your buzzwigs, and forbid that your ingenuous disciples should reply to us with a foolborn jest, when we require of them their Propria quæ maribus! It were just as becoming that her Majesty should deliver her next speech from the throne in the strain of Hudibras, or that the ensuing ode of the laureate should be in the style of John Gilpin, as for syntax to be made a joke of!—

We really cannot go on laughing at this rate. At any rate, we beg we may not be required to shake our sides where, to the end of time, heads only should be shaken.

We appeal to Church and State;—to the Speakers of both their Houses, and the talkers of all,—to uplift their voices, staves, and maces, in behalf of the injured gravities of GRAMMAR!—

RHYMES FOR THE CORN KINGS.

Ye tyrants! would ye chain the winds,
And check even nature’s laws!
Would ye with your fetters bind
The Universal Cause!
Ye revel ‘midst a nation’s wreck—
Wax wanton ‘midst its wail;
And will that all should bow the neck
Before your idol, Baal.
The mammon god, whose priests ye are,
Too long has borne the sway;
And in his blood-stained, tear-washed car,
Too far hath held his way.
’Neath gorgeous fanes, proud Pharisees,
For “daily bread” ye ask;

Yet from your starving fellow seize
The meed of labour’s task.
Ye hypocrites! who proudly dare
To doom the poor to death;
How may ye use the lowly prayer
Of him of Nazareth!
Man’s cup is filled by tinselled drones,
With trembling, to its brim;
For want the widowed mother groans—
The orphan’s eye is dim.
God said of old, “Let there be light” —
And light her wing unfurled;
When, when, shall Truth dispel the night
That wraps our moral world.

LINES.—BY A LADY.

SUGGESTED BY THE DIVISIONS IN THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

In vain contending parties fight,
And proudly call their darkness light,
Can man the law of God improve?
Christ’s “Veto” was for mutual love.
For this His “new command” was given,
That would have made our earth a heaven;
But men cling to their fallen state,
Still cherishing revenge and hate.
Unholy discord! from its influence fly
All social love and Christian charity;
While infidels rejoice to see
The Kirk approached with levity.
Men sheath the sword, but now the pen employ,
And spare the life, but character destroy.
“Union is strength,” yet churchmen disagree,
All Christian love lost in wild anarchy.
Contests on creeds our fire-side pleasures mar,
And (without bloodshed) there’s perpetual war!

When will these weary disputations cease?
Men of the altar! oh! be men of peace!
Happy the hearths, (and they seem holy ground,)
Where peace and true religion yet are found;
There do the sick and poor (whate’er their creed)
Find aid and comfort in the hour of need;
There Christian hearts are in each other blest,
And home’s their haven of repose and rest.
No censures harsh on others they advance
Who love a song, or join the merry dance;
Or blame the young, who, innocent and gay,
Pluck the bright flowerets scattered in their way.
They know right judgments but by God are made,
And that He sunshine grants, as well as shade:
Retir’d they pray,—nor to the public view
Parade hysterics, and religion too!
But Christian hopes and pious thoughts impart
A blest “revival,” to the chastened heart.

Mrs. Bray's Mountains and Lakes of Switzerland.
3 vols. Longman & Co.

THE narrative of this lady's travels is given in a series of letters extended from her notes, and a journal kept by her husband, "a Sexagenarian" and a clergyman, making his first appearance on the continent after the time of life indicated by the title he assumes. Mrs. Bray is already known as an authoress of "Travels in Normandy," "Descriptions of the Local Scenery of Devonshire," and several novels. She possesses some knowledge and accomplishments, and a taste for the Fine Arts, thorough High Church principles, and a becoming degree of confidence in her own powers. Save for this last distinction she might naturally have felt some distrust of being able to tell English readers much that was new of the threadbare scenes which she visited, so far in the wake of so many other clever publishing ladies and gentlemen. The truth is, that there is not a little of her book which might, with great propriety, have been confined to the family circle to which the letters are ostensibly addressed; not a little of what the impatient will call tiresome, and the irreverent twaddle. How could it be otherwise with a party, so late in the day, upon ground so often trodden, and who did not cross the threshold of one private dwelling in Holland, Germany, or Switzerland? The Journal of the Sexagenarian and Churchman, who, for the first time, ventured abroad, carrying with him his fagot of opinions as tightly bundled up as his portmanteau, whose impressions were all fresh, and to whom many things, become common-place enough, were each small wonders, forms the most racy portion of the joint work. There is occasionally a touch of something like quiet humour about Mr. Bray; and his dislike of German beds and German cookery, smoking, moustaches, and the exhibitions of the mummeries of papistry, is genuine and natural. He is a most minute observer; the only doubt being, if the things he noted were always worthy of observation, or novel to any one save himself. A nephew of the lady accompanied this respectable couple on their grand and long-talked-of tour, and left them safely at Geneva to make their way home at their leisure. Bitterly does Mrs. Bray, and with reason good, complain of the faithless and flattering "Handbook" of Mr. Murray, which so often promised, not only splendid and beautiful scenery where no such thing appeared to their unanointed eyes, but good eating, comfortable lodgings, good tea, and fair wine, where nothing of the sort was to be obtained by the weary and hungry travellers. The castles and cathedrals, and even the Rhine itself, were disappointing. After being grievously disappointed in the far-famed Cathedral of Strasburg, Mrs. Bray was farther disappointed in her supper; and this not for the first time, for she had scarcely found anything fit to eat since she had landed at Ostend. She says—

It was at Strasburg I first began seriously to apprehend being half starved before we might find our way back to England; not, however, from any want of provision, but from the mode and manner of preparing it. We had here a regular sample of German cookery: to my mind it was detestable; and I should fear for any one who, like myself, happens to have a weak digestion: the viands thus cooked must be anything but healthful.

All meats and poultry were generally so tough, that they were scarcely eatable; and even had they been less so, from the circumstance of their being not roasted, but baked, or rather soddened, in the oven, and still half raw, they would be totally unpalatable. Ham is often sliced off the joint, and brought at once to table, without any kind of cookery whatsoever; and to eat it in this state is deemed luxurious: it certainly would be so to a North American Indian. And then we were served with such an appearance of a dinner—such a number and variety of miserable dishes that one could not touch; such masses of vegetables, stewed till they had literally lost all colour and all taste, excepting that of the grease with which they were saturated; and when they were only boiled, they were generally almost green,—scarcely cooked at all. And then everything was so spiced, that more than once, when attempting to dine off a half-raw chicken, as tough as a halter, I could taste nothing but spice; whilst the bread in all the German inns was so unlike itself, that I fancied at first the people had given us something resembling a disagreeably-flavoured tea-cake in mistake for it. But I found we were served with the best sort.

The following is very English:—

The different way in which a dinner is served here, to the fashion of our own country, is not unworthy notice. The fish never comes first, and sometimes it is eaten cold! Indeed, even the difference existing between the most common utensils of household convenience is not a little amusing. Instead of a tureen, they frequently bring in their soup in a round vessel (and this I have lately observed in England also, from our too great affection for foreign fashions;) and if you ask for a slop-basin at breakfast, they bring you one four times as large as the teapot and all the cups besides. . . . On the other hand, the wash-hand-basin is seldom larger than a pie-dish, and their water-vessel little other than a cream-jug.

The "Hand-book" was appealed to in all cases of difficulty; but it seemed to have no more efficacy with extortionate landlords and cheating coitwriers than a reference to the regulations of fares by the magistrates, on a London, or any other, porter or cabman. Sometimes the travellers did see fine scenery; but one desirable feature of a new country was ever wanting: the women were nearly all ugly. Even Rhine wine was only "not bad," upon the Rhine. Mrs. Bray is a better judge of manners than of wines: of the Rhine wine she honestly says—

I do confess that I have such a distaste for acide, that I should very much prefer a cup of good English small beer to most of the so-vaunted wines of the Rhine, that the English swallow with such avidity; admiring, because they think they ought to admire, whatever is recommended by the fashion of being foreign, in spite of the grievous stomach-aches often inflicted upon them by such acid potations, for which they are neither prepared by custom nor constitution. But in this, and in many other respects, it is really wonderful to see how soon the English get through their stock of common sense, and squander it away, as fast as they do their money, upon the continent. I never like to meet an Englishman abroad, unless he is a man of good sense enough to continue to shave himself, (not to let his beard and whiskers grow in imitation of foreign fopperies,) and does not smoke till he makes his mouth and nose like an ill-swept chimney, and, in short, has mind and originality enough to remain a thorough John Bull, go where he may among strangers. An English cockcomb, turned into a foreign one, is, in my estimation, the most disgusting of all the monkey tribe, be they blue-faced, or white-faced, or short-tailed, or long-tailed, or of any other grade of the species.

In another place she remarks—"Some of the English, even at this fine hotel at Lucerne, were very sorry personages, poor examples of our country; and these, I remarked, gave themselves so many airs that I suspected some of them to be of no higher grades than wealthy tailors and mantua-makers when at home." Mr. Bray is equally severe on the English they encountered.

In another place Mrs. Bray gives us a glimpse of the freedom and independence enjoyed abroad by the hopeful youth and boyhood of England, as well as of their manner of thinking. And Mrs. Bray does not confine her censures to the puppyism and gourmandise of the boys of her own country. At the Lake of Geneva, or in sight of the Rocks of Mellerie, she feels herself in duty bound to lift up her testimony against the New Héloïse, which "ought to have been burnt," "the infidel Gibbon, and the not very moral Madame de Staël;" remarking, in conclusion, "It is singular enough that the writers who have given the greatest celebrity to Lausanne should all be persons whose works are of an immoral, irreligious, or, at least, an objectionable nature."

Geneva does not escape. Mrs. Bray is "no admirer of Calvin, nor of his doctrines;" and Geneva has yet greater sins to expiate, in her eyes, than being the scene of Calvin's career. We could scarce have imagined any educated English person still entertaining such Guy-Fawkes notions in the present day, who had not been at Oxford some time far back in the last century. Alas for poor Geneva! "the seed-plot of all the rebellions, revolutions, and heresies of Europe," which many persons make a stir about, "and which has set up a statue to Rousseau on the spot which gave him birth;" which statue Mrs. Bray seems to have pointedly cut, feeling no more interest about it "than if the memorial of a man that had been hanged." We are glad to get her away to the Vale of Chamouny, and into a more charitable temper. Had her uncharitableness been confined to such utter abominations as the English ogres she encountered at Ghent, we could have sympathized in her indignation; but mercilessly to pelt not only Rousseau, Gibbon, and De Staël, but the venerable Calvin, is more than Presbyterian patience can endure. We must exhibit these Ghent ogres. The scene is quite what the Americans term a regular Trollope.

We returned a good deal fatigued to our hotel, to be in time for the table-d'hôte, prepared for the English. Some part of the fare was very good; but on the whole, it was insufficient for so large a company; and it was made less by the conduct of certain individuals, too amusing to be passed in silence. When we entered the room all the seats were filled, excepting those we took, and five chairs set apart for "a very great English family," who were in the house, and expected every moment to join the party at dinner. "The great English family" kept all the company waiting, and the dishes cooling; at last, in walked a very fat and most vulgar-looking man, dressed in mourning. Then followed his spouse and three misses, also in mourning. The lady-wife looked proud and cross, and glanced her eye round the table, as if she disdained to sit down with the persons about it. The misses had a very boarding-school air; all pert, and talking loud and forwardly to each other, with a good deal of the haughty airs of mamma about them: and this was the way in which they behaved at dinner. Being at the head of the table, all the dishes that were carried round, according to custom on the Continent, were first handed to them. Mamma helped herself and her chickens to everything that was the best and most eatable: in the rudest manner, she nearly cleared each of the best dishes, leaving nothing but their scraps for the rest of the company. Mr. Bray and myself could not eat the foreign messes; and since our illness on the Rhine, we had been cautioned by the good doctor, from whom we parted at Mannheim, to be particularly careful as to diet. Dish after dish, therefore, passed me; and, when I cast my eyes on one that I hoped might reach me to satisfy my hunger, the she-wolf in black and her three cubs divided it among them, or sent it round with only scraps in the sauce. At last there appeared three plump roasted partridges on one dish. I thought to myself those women have eaten so much they must let me have a chance now, and Mr. Bray also; but I was never more mistaken in all my life. The lady in black took the very dish out of the garçon's hand; and, calling to her brats, as the hen does to her chicks, with a "Sophy, my dear," or a "Mary and Betsey," first helped herself, and then crammed each of their plates, sending round the necks, heads, and legs to us starving lookers-on. In the same way she treated the dessert, and indeed everything of the best at table. Mr. Bray was so disgusted, that he said, had he been about to remain in Ghent, he would not have dined again at that table-d'hôte with that woman.

This family-party will, we hope, be recognised by some of their good-natured friends at home. Mr. and Mrs. Bray were not singular in such misfortunes. Among the nobility and aristocracy returning home in the Batarier steamer, was an unfortunate little fat man, who Spoke the most Cockney English—had been to Germany and down the Rhine—could find nothing that he could eat, and nobody he could speak to with any comfort; and was seemingly going home with a memory stuffed with recollected miseries, and nothing else. He was very angry, too; for some Germans had, on the previous day, he told me, insulted him at the table d'hôte, at Rotterdam, by eating up all the pudding (the only thing he could fancy at the table,) and sending the empty dish, with the sauce in it, round to him.

Long catalogues of the paintings seen in the churches and galleries of Dutch and Flemish towns are given, with some, we presume, just criticism; but we prefer the few originals introduced, and like the honesty and frankness of such confessions and strictures as the following about the Rhine:—

My criticism on the Rhine will be given in a few sentences.

First, then, although the banks are in many places of vast height, yet are they generally too sloping to produce a striking effect. There are very few precipitous rocks, and none of those are of the fine forms and colour of our Morwel rocks in Devon, which are not half so high. Indeed, one great defect in the rock scenery of the Rhine is its want of good colour. There is in it little of variety, and still less of richness—no woods on the sides of the eminences above the mighty river, but a never-ending succession of low, stunted, unpicturesque vineyards; and these rendered more disagreeable to the eye by an additional formality—that of walls to divide or bank them up. The earth, we were informed, having in very many places been brought to the spot, to make a bed of soil for the vineyards, needs such support, or it would fall down the slopes of the eminences.

Then the castles so much talked of:—with a few exceptions, they are generally nothing more than plain walls, and as plain towers. Many have not even a battlement upon them; yet I am perfectly willing to admit that some few of these buildings have great beauty; and that, standing aloft on heights and crowning promontories, they give an importance to the rocks as they are seen from the river beneath, which they would not possess without them. The Gothic walled towns and villages, that stand low on the banks of the Rhine, are, generally speaking, of much greater interest and beauty than most of the old castles. One solitary battlemented tower, standing near a most picturesque town of this description (which tower, I think, has been drawn by Stanfield, and published in one of the Annals.) we thought most beautiful in itself and in its position.

Another castle, peering aloft on a portion of projecting rock, was (though a miniature resemblance) somewhat like Falkenstein: this we also greatly admired. But the finest of the whole, and by far the most striking scene on the Rhine, is where the lofty heights and the castle of the Drachenfels come into view. This does, indeed, deserve its fame.

We can give but one specimen of Mr. Bray's journal. The scene is quite a subject for a picture: the unfortunate and too susceptible gentleman, annoyed and dragged about by the tassels of his active, curious, and vivacious lady's shawl. The locale is Antwerp.

Whilst in the church I felt a person fumbling about my coat pocket, but in so bungling a manner that I at first took but little notice of it. At last, however, I turned round, and, seeing a little man in a blue frock, told Eliza that, had I been in London, I should think he was a pickpocket. She said she had never heard of pickpockets of this description on the continent, and wondered at my suspicions; adding that, as I was tall, he probably raised himself above my shoulders to catch a sight of the ceremony. Afterwards, however, I discovered that my suspicions were not ill founded; for I lost my silk handkerchief. I was doomed also to be somewhat annoyed by Eliza's shawl; for, owing to its having a long fringe, I was continually catching it, whilst pushed by the crowd, either in my button or in the knobs of my umbrella, and was drawn, sometimes rather unwillingly, whithersoever her curiosity chanced to lead her.

In conclusion, we must hint our suspicion that the travellers were a few years too late in life of undertaking so fatiguing a tour; and probably have been habituated to enjoy ten times too much English comfort in their Devonshire vicarage, to be indulgent or impartial judges of foreign customs and manners. Such travellers should not set out in the expectation, gallantly repudiated by the magnanimous Bailie Nicol Jarvie, in his journey to Rob Roy's country, of "carrying a' the comforts o' the Saut Market at their tail."

The Cyclopaedia of Domestic Medicine. Part I. By Keith Imray, M.D.

This is a work intended for popular use, and one which, in our opinion, is exceedingly well adapted to be practically beneficial to families and individuals. It is clear and concise; quite free of professional pedantry and the love of mystery; and is, besides, the production of one who appears thoroughly versed in the modern practice of medicine, whether as a physician or in the humbler but most important capacity of apothecary or nurse. We have seen no work of the kind of which, from the I. Part, we could augur more fairly. As a specimen of the work, and, moreover, as generally useful information, we shall transcribe a part of the directions for the treatment of scalds and burns:—

After noticing the old remedies of carron oil and cotton wool, it is said of the former specific, "That dirty plan of treatment is, however, no longer necessary, since the air can be excluded more effectually, and with greater comfort to the patient, by covering the burned or scalded parts with flour, or enveloping them with cotton wool. These are both popular remedies, and the latter was long in use in the United States of America and in Scotland, before it was adopted by medical men. . . . But, as far as our own observation has gone, we have not found cotton give that immediate relief which is derived from the application of cold water or flour. It is, in general, advisable, before employing the cotton, either to immerse the parts in cold water, if their situation will admit of this being done, or apply to them pieces of fine linen, dipped in cold water, or vinegar and water, and wetted frequently during several hours, or until the pain and heat are removed. But when the burned surface is extensive, there is always a sensation of chilliness, which is generally accompanied with cold shiverings. In this case, cold applications would do harm; and they ought not to be employed, even when the burn is slight, if there be a tendency to shivering; nor should they be continued if the patient be not relieved by them, or if they bring on shivering; and they are always improper when the burn is situated on the breast or the belly, or any other part of the trunk of the body. When the legs and feet are scalded, they should be plunged as quickly as possible into cold water, and kept immersed in it a considerable time before the stockings are removed. By this means blisters are often prevented from rising.

The application of flour to burned or scalded parts is a remedy very extensively used at present, and is now preferred in some of the London Hospitals to any other plan of treatment.

The best way of applying the flour is to sprinkle it over the burned parts with a kitchen dredger, until they are completely excluded from the atmospheric air, and then apply soft linen cloths over it. Thus the burned surface is immediately protected by a cool and soft covering, to the great relief of the patient. When the pain returns, the flour is to be renewed without disturbing what adheres to the surface. When matter begins to be thrown out it mixes with the flour, and forms, over the injured part, a thick paste or crust similar to that formed by the cotton, which is not to be removed until new skin forms. It may, however, be easily removed at any time when circumstances require it, by covering it with a large warm poultice, which softens and allows it to come away easily."

This extract may be enough for the treatment of slight burns and scalds. For cases of a more serious nature we refer to the original work, of which we beg to reiterate our approbation.

Dr. Royle on the Productive Resources of India.

European science is at length beginning to atone to India for the misery which European ambition and cupidity have inflicted on her tribes. The attention of civilians and military men, but especially that of gentlemen of the medical profession living in India, has been, for some years, turned to that fair, fertile, and exhaustless field, which has hitherto lain comparatively neglected and waste—at least if we measure its powers of production by the slender and imperfect results. The present volume is principally devoted to giving an account of the experiments, successful or otherwise, which have already been made in different parts of India, either to improve the staple productions of the soil, or to introduce new ones. Fifty years since, attempts were made, by different physicians in the Company's service, to introduce the cultivation of pepper, cochineal, and various other productions, suited to the soil and climate. So early as 1800, seed potatoes were brought from St. Helena to Bangalore, and supplied to the natives, who now cultivate and sell them; from their superior quality even finding a market in Madras. During the early part of the present century, the mahogany tree was brought from Jamaica to Bengal, where it thrives so luxuriantly, that already articles of furniture have been made of the wood. Pimento and coffee have also been introduced. Mace, cloves, and nutmegs thrive; and the cinnamon tree has been brought from Ceylon, and the camphor-tree from the Cape of Good Hope, to the Botanic Garden of Calcutta. Though cotton has been raised in India from time immemorial, its proper cultivation is still in infancy, though there can be no doubt of ultimate success. The cultivation of sugar, another ancient production of India, is also capable of being carried to much greater extent and perfection than at present. The details given of its recent revival, and the introduction of the Otaheite cane, are curious, though less important than the account of the culture of the poppy, of silk, and, above all, of the tea-plant; of the success of which, the author, who has made this a particular study, augurs very favourably. He considers the British territory, in the Himalaya, as equally favourable to the cultivation of the tea-plant with Assam, and points out sites for experimenting, in the immediate vicinity of the British hill stations. But the principal value of the volume is, that it gives a condensed view of the labours and experiments of scientific men, in different parts of India, to improve or develop the productive resources of that vast country; and finally showing that, even in the most favoured climes, "All is the gift of industry."

As a specimen of the work, we subjoin an extract on the means adopted for the culture of sugar in India; a subject to which the present state of the sugar market, and other causes, concur to give great temporary interest.

In the year 1792, sugar rose by degrees to an enormous price, in consequence, it was supposed, of the annual importation being very unequal to the increased consumption of Great Britain, combined with the demand for exportation. The East India Company were called upon, at a general meeting of the public, to lend their assistance towards effecting a reduction of the price of sugar, by encouraging importations of it from the East Indies. A general court of proprietors was held, on the 15th of March 1792, for the purpose of considering an application intended to be made to his Majesty's Ministers or to Parliament, for lowering the duties then payable on East India sugar. Upon this occasion, a report by the committee of warehouses, dated the 29th February 1792, relative to the culture and produce of sugar in British India, was read. As further authentic information appeared still indispensable, the court of directors ordered, agreeably to a suggestion in this report, that the collectors of the Indian revenues should be called upon "to ascertain various particulars relative to the existing state of the sugar cultivation, its increase or decrease; whether it laboured under any peculiar disadvantages which could be removed by proper encouragement."

It had, however, been directed in the year 1789, that a quantity of sugar and some other articles should be sent for trial. In the year 1790 a quantity of Benares sugar, with samples of other sugars, and of tobacco in the leaf, the produce of Bengal and Behar, were transmitted to England. In February 1791, Lieutenant J. Paterson, of the Bengal establishment, addressed a memorial to the court of directors, stating that sugar could be cultivated in Bengal with many superior advantages, and at less expense than in the West Indies; though, after making his contracts, and returning to India, he does not seem to have found the facilities so great as he expected.

The result of the above orders was a series of valuable reports by the collectors of revenue upon the culture of sugar in India. Among these, that of the political resident at Benares is the most full and comprehensive in its views; and it may be profitably referred to, even now, for the improvement of the culture of sugar in India. With these were obtained a few essays on the subject by scientific persons in India—as those drawn up by order of the supreme government, by Drs. Roxburgh and Buchanan Hamilton. Large quantities of sugar were also imported, as is fully related in the "Papers respecting the Culture and Manufacture of Sugar in British India." The result may be briefly summed up, as is done in the above report of the committee of buying and warehouses, 11th December 1822: "In the course of the thirty years which have elapsed since the former proceedings of the general court of proprietors relative to East India sugar took place, this article has risen, by a regular gradation, to be an important branch of the national commerce; the quantity of East India sugar imported in the year ending the 5th of January 1821, having amounted to about fourteen thousand tons, and in the year ending the 5th of January 1822, to thirteen thousand five hundred tons."

The great extent of the Indian territories in which sugar may be grown, the quantities which were imported, and the cheapness with which it can be manufactured, had, no doubt, considerable influence in reducing the price of sugar, and would perhaps have injured the commerce of the West Indies, had not this been prevented by the great distance, high freights, and the very unreasonable duties, amounting to £37 16s. 3d. per cent. charged on this country on East India sugar. At this time English metals were admitted free of duty, and English manufactured goods, cottons even, entered India on paying only two-and-a-half per cent. The continued demand for sugar, of which the consumption seemed to increase in proportion to the extent of its production, had also its influence in preventing any very great reduction of price taking place.

But at the very time that these efforts were making in India, the West Indians were assisted by the introduction of a new kind of sugar-cane, which far surpassed that originally introduced from the Canaries, in size and in productiveness of juice. This was the Otaheite cane, of which Captain Bligh says, "Some very fine sugar-cane was brought to me, each of the pieces was six inches round." The French, about the year 1794, introduced three new kinds of sugar-cane into Martinique, and into their other West India colonies; one from the island of Bourbon, another from Otaheite, and a third from Batavia. The Bourbon and Otaheite canes were found to be nearly of the same nature, both being much larger than the old West India cane; many of their joints measuring nine inches in length, and six in circumference. When trimmed and fit for grinding, some of the canes weighed seven pounds, being about two pounds heavier than the largest picked canes of the old kind. They ripened quicker, and were fit for cutting in ten months; their juice also granulated sooner, and threw up less scum in the boiling than that of the old canes. They also resisted the injuries of excessive dry weather, and the ravages of that destructive insect, called the borer in the sugar islands. So that in one season—in a year wherein the dry weather and the borer were particularly fatal to the other canes—a proprietor estimated the produce at 3500 pounds of sugar from an acre. In a subsequent season, however, 5700 pounds an acre are recorded as having been produced. Macpherson, in his "Annals of Commerce," says, "After such proofs of their superiority, the new canes, generally under the name of the Bourbon canes, were soon spread over all the British West Indies, where they very quickly superseded the old canes, and with such advantage to the proprietors of sugar plantations, whom they have inspired with the most splendid hopes, that the introduction of them will undoubtedly constitute an important era in the history of the West Indies."*

It is a curious coincidence that the Otaheite cane should have been introduced into the West Indies at the very time that vigorous efforts were making for establishing the sugar trade of the East Indies. It is remarkable also, that among the numbers who at that time paid attention to the subject, so few should have thought of improvements in the culture of the cane in India, or even in the manufacture of the sugar, and still fewer of the introduction of new kinds of sugar-cane from other countries. Some, however, acquainted with the West India method, forcibly called attention to the unthrifty manu-

* A proprietor of the greatest respectability in the Island of Tobago, writes on the 20th September, 1797,—"My properties here, since we were restored to the British government, have become very valuable. I have for three years averaged five hundred hogheads of sugar, and a large proportion of rum; and the Bourbon canes are so wonderful, that I expect from six to seven hundred hogheads next year if I can make them. This cane passes wonder, and renders the appearance of the old canes unpleasant. I would not as a planter have credited a report of what I have witnessed of it."

facture in India, where, from delays in the processes, much of the saccharine principle was destroyed before the juice was boiled down into sugar. The Bourbon, or Otaheite sugar-cane, was at that time probably little known: but Dr. Roxburgh was well aware of the importance of this subject, as at the beginning of the year 1796, he applied to the government to write to the Supercargoes at Canton for the seeds of all vegetables that yield flax and hemp, or that produce substances employed in their stead, as well as for the various sorts of sugar-cane.

We cannot go farther. The West India monopoly, of which the present high price of sugar is rendering the country doubly impatient, and the want of a large free market, have no doubt greatly retarded the advance of sugar cultivation in India; but to this it lay out of the author's way to advert.

An Essay on a Congress of Nations. By William Ladd, Esq. of Boston.

The American "Peace Society," some time since, offered a prize for the best essay on this subject. Many were presented; and five of them were approved and ordered to be printed in a volume for general diffusion. This done, Mr. Ladd was requested to give the substance of the approved essays in one, and with his own additions; and this forms the pamphlet before us—A Scheme for a Congress of Nations for the Adjustment of International Disputes, without resort to Arms. Dare we hope that the world will ever see this magnificent idea realized, in the spirit of that purely Christian feeling which has suggested it? If ever there was a time that called for promptitude in exposing the evils, the miseries, the improvement-preventing, the crime-begetting character of war, this is it; and we therefore hope that this well-timed essay will obtain extensive circulation in Britain, and do its own part as an enlightener and peace-preserver.

Guizot's Essay on Washington. Translated by Paul Parnell, Esq.

The work of the distinguished French statesman is perhaps less important for what it can tell the English reader of Washington, than for the light which it reflects upon the views of the writer. From the present position which M. Guizot occupies in European politics, and the influence which he may yet exercise upon the destinies of the human race, the tone of his essay is to be appreciated, and thence valued and admired. While so many vain-glorious Frenchmen are running crazy about the bones of Napoleon, it is no small thing to find one of the best thinkers of France, making, though not a Republican, a just and warm appreciation of the character, genius, and career of Washington.

Edinburgh Cabinet Library, vol. xxviii., Iceland, Greenland, and the Faroe Islands. With Maps, Engravings, &c. &c.

This volume forms a valuable addition to the series, and a desirable portion of the history of the great human family. Ourselves a northern people, and descended from a common stock with the inhabitants of Iceland, curiosity or interest is more excited by their history and present condition, than by that of most other imperfectly civilized nations; and in their desolate wilds, foaming cataracts, volcanoes, and glaciers; their sunless clime, interminable day, and more is found to stimulate and affect the imagination.

"Long night of revelry and ease;"

The author of the account of this family group of northern tribes has well fulfilled his duty, by compressing a vast mass of information within narrow bounds, and placing this information collected and arranged in a clear light. The far largest division of the volume is, of course, devoted to Iceland; but all that is necessary to be known of the other countries described, finds a place.

The Student's Cabinet Library of useful Tracts.—

No. 38., "On the Life, Character and Style, of the Apostle Paul, by Professor Tholuck."—

No. 40., "On the Nature and Moral Influences of Heathenism," by the same. Edinburgh: Thomas Clark.

Mr. Clark's efforts to popularize, among our British readers, the profound learning and comprehensive philosophy of the German thinkers cannot be sufficiently lauded. At an uncommonly cheap rate studious individuals, or popular libraries, may now supply themselves with the ripest results of continental scholarship as applied to the most interesting of all subjects. Professor Tholuck's two Essays, which Mr. Clark has here reprinted, require no recommendation from us. We may content ourselves with testifying to the pleasure we have had in perusing them. Neander, Gesenius, and the first names in Germany and America, testify to their merit.

Alda, the British Captive. By Agnes Strickland; author of "Lives of the Queens of England;" &c. &c.

This is a tale illustrative of the benign and saving influences of the Christian religion. Alda, a young maiden of the blood-royal of Britain, is carried a captive to Rome, after the last fatal battle of her relative, the warrior-queen Boadicea. Fierce, haughty, and high-spirited herself, Alda becomes the slave of a haughty Roman lady, Lælia, the daughter of her captor. In the service of the same lady there is also a Jewish captive maiden, Susanna, who has embraced the faith of Christ, and who becomes the affectionate friend, and sympathizing comforter of the British Princess, whom she converts from Druidism to Christianity; though it is long before the proud and revengeful spirit of Alda can be subdued to the meek, forgiving, and loving precepts of the gospel. The tender friendship of the captive maidens, fellow-sufferers, fellow-believers, fellow-worshippers, is terminated by the death of the meek Susanna; after which Alda is no longer able to submit to the tyranny and cruelty of her mistress, and the Roman superior slaves who exercise their malice upon the "barbarian girl." She flies from Rome, and is protected by a Briton, the leader of a party of banditti, who had been a general under her father. Her lonely life in that mountain-wilderness where the flock of ewes and goats which she tends forms her subsistence, and her endeavours to win her rude but generous benefactor from their native idolatry to the faith of the Christians, is very sweetly described. Alda, in her solitary wanderings, discovers a Christian colony of new converts driven to seek a refuge in the mountains; but, though enjoying occasional religious communion with them, she refuses to join their community, and is still alone in her solitude when the caprice of Nero and the arts of enemies drive from the capital, to this wilderness, the Roman general who had made her a prisoner, and his haughty daughter, her late mistress and oppressor, fugitives and helpless. Lælia, the Roman lady, believes that now the season for revenge has arrived, and that she and her father will be at once betrayed to their enemies, who set a rich reward upon their heads, by her former ill-treated slave. But Alda is now a Christian, whose duty is forgiveness, and whose law is love. She conceals the Roman general and his daughter from their enemies in her grotto, comforts and cherishes them; and when the father sinks and dies, the slave-girl becomes the sole friend and stay of the noble Roman lady. The latter is slowly won to Christianity by her own afflictions, and by witnessing its blessed fruits in the heart and life of the British Princess, her friend and instructress. Together they nobly suffer, willing martyrs for the divine faith, which had changed, purified, and exalted their natures. Alda, in brief, is an exceedingly well-written and beautiful story of a pure and ennobling tendency.

The South Sea Islanders, a Christian Tale; and Moraig, or the Seeker for God, a Metrical Tale.

By John Dunlop, Esq., author of "The Philosophy of Drinking Usages," &c. &c.

In general character, this dramatic story closely resembles the above work. The actuating principle is the Christian religion, as new and strange to the idolaters of the South Sea Islands, when the first missionaries arrived among them, as to the civilized Romans and savage Britons eighteen centuries before. A wide field is opened to the dramatist in the lovely scenery and delicious climate, the rich productions, strange customs, and wild and singular manners of the natives. The principal personages are, the Christian missionary, Annesley, and his enthusiastic disciple, the native Princess Metabora, the daughter of the King of Utonga; which island, before the drama opens, has been invaded and conquered by the king of another island. Lockhart, a shipwrecked British officer, is the only other European: not yet coming up to Metabora's exalted ideal of a Christian, though he becomes one; and after doing gallant service in the wars of the king, he, of course, marries his lovely Christian daughter. We fear the composition of this dramatic tale will not satisfy the critics: but if it please many easily-pleased readers, which we think is probable, that is better fame. The same remark will apply to "Moraig," which contains a good deal of fresh and vigorous, if somewhat unpolished, description of every-day Celtic manners, and the rude modes of life and wild scenery of the Hebrides. The story is very simple; and is said to be founded on a fact which occurred in the latter end of the last century; when a little Hebridean girl, who had heard of God, set about questioning all who fell in her way about how she was to seek and find the chief good, and was naturally supposed to be a lunatic. She questions first a gay Hebridean maiden, going off to the Sacrament, hoping to meet her lover at the "Holy Fair;" an angler, deeply engaged in his favourite recreation; a hunter, a shepherd, and the ferryman, unsuccessfully; and Moraig reaches the mainland, and is not informed by a minister, who is not a tee-totaler. Not one of these satisfy Moraig's passionate desire to know concerning God; but the satisfactory reply is at last obtained from the Saint, an aged lady of high rank, whom little Moraig accosts in the streets of a city to which she had wandered, and who first shows her truth and good—"the way and the life." As a specimen of the poem, we choose the opening description of the spot which is Moraig's Hebridean home:—

In this recess of nature dwelt a race
Alert and hardy, brave; where we might trace
Courteous demeanour bland, gestures that preach
In unison with words of ancient speech;
A ready native promptness, though a want
Of learned nurture, such as is the vaunt
Of their compeers amid the Lowland plains,
Supplied with lettered lore and book-taught swains.
And yet sublime tradition came, instead
Of erudition, to inform the head;
And wild and stinted nature's scarce supplies
For human sustenance, were met by wise
Address and art.

On banks of a deep stream that did convey Unmeasured crystal currents to the sea,
Some hovel cots, unstable, might be seen:
The abodes of Moraig's sire and all her kin;—
A refuge from the long, wild winter's ire—
In summer scarce a shelter they require.
The mountain breeze freshens the scene; and usance
Makes peat-smoke and front dunghill scarce a nuisance.
Young Moraig's sire was, on the Hebridean plan,
A shepherd, fisher, and a husbandman.
The mother severed still her cares between
Her kilted boys and cow, half-starved and lean,
That shared the family harbour, in her stall,
Bedded with breckans, by the inner wall.
The elder youth succoured their father's hand,
Accomplished his behests by sea or land:
They clamb the steepy mountain's giddy height,
To turn the goats when wandered out of sight;
Or on the deep, mindful of family wants,
They hooked the turbot* from his hidden haunts.
Upon the river's brink, the infants stand,
In emulation keen, with hazel wand
And crooked pin, and thread; and, with a shout,
Whisk forth, adroit, the struggling, precious trout.
The bank and lucent stream had just before
Served as the general table and boudoir;
Beside, a summer-house of turf they share;
Make dinner-sets of fractured earthen ware.
With Celtic courtesy and mock parade,
The honours of the rustic feast are made:
Well stued with bilberries from the purple moor,
And dulse and tangle from the briny shore;
But tempting cherry tree, with ruddy smile,
And apples—all are strangers to the isle.

Of the wide district, scarce a denizen
Could spell a syllable or handle pen;
From house of God they most part were exiles:
Distant more than a score of Highland miles,
No child had ever held the church in sight
But once, as offered to baptismal rite.
A sermon some had heard from the Stag's Pale,
A huge rock in the midst of a deep vale,
Where drowsy dulness, in five tedious years,
Preached once to ignorant and wondering ears.

This is a not unfavourable specimen of a poem, which will be valued more for its purpose than the author's accomplishment in verse.

Chapters on the Poets of Ancient Greece. By Henry Alford, M.A., Vicar of Wymeswold, Leicestershire, &c. &c.

This is a series of essays, written by a scholar, and a man of fine literary and poetical taste. The description of the works of each poet or dramatist is illustrated by specimens, which are original translations. Besides being an agreeable work to the scholar, this volume will afford ladies, and merely English readers—all those who have "little Latin and less Greek"—the means of obtaining a competent knowledge of those great works, which, for a series of ages, have obtained the admiration of every civilized people.

* Quare—Cuddies!—PRINTER'S DEVIL.

Statistical Exercises on the Maps of Great Britain and Ireland. By E. C. Nanni.

We can safely recommend this as a most useful auxiliary, in schools and families, to a thorough knowledge of the most important part of geography—that of our own country. The exercises may be easily turned into questions by the teacher,—thus both testing the solidity of the pupil's knowledge, and extending it.

NEW POEMS AND DRAMAS.

THE MOREA, and OTHER POEMS. By Alex. Baillie Cochrane. Second Edition.

THE CORSAIR'S BRIDAL, SCIO, and OTHER POEMS. By W. M. Henry, Esq.

RECOLLECTIONS, and MISCELLANEOUS POEMS. By John Jonas Johnson.

THE KENTISH CORONAL. Edited by H. G. Adams. [This neat volume may be described as a provincial or county annual. The idea is good; the contents are varied; and not the worse that a small portion of the whole consists of well selected extracts, though the greater number of pieces are original contributions.]

ETHELSTAN; a DRAMATIC CHRONICLE. By George Darley.

CONRAD WALLENROD; an HISTORICAL POEM, TRANSLATED FROM THE POLISH OF ADAM MICKIEWICZ. By Leon Jablonski, Captain in the late Polish Army.

Poland, unlike Russia, has long had a literature, though it is little known in England; and has hitherto been rather classical than national; Polish authors, until of late, having either written in Latin, or employing the French or German languages. But latterly they have begun to use the mother-tongue of Poland, without which there can be no national literature. Among the most celebrated of the modern Polish writers, is the poet Mickiewicz, of whom the account given by his translator, Captain Jablonski, is full of interest. Of him, it is said—

Mickiewicz, we may say, is the founder of a new school in the national literature. In Poland, as well as in other countries, men of letters used to imitate the ancients; the more they approached the old models, the greater was their success: but Mickiewicz, like Schiller, broke the barrier of imitation, and went on a vast and unexplored field, following but the inspiration of his genius. He revived the ancient reminiscences, the primitive legends, and the popular traditions of Poland, and formed a new poetry, with all the boldness and success of a master. He admired Goethe and Byron; but he knew that, in order to be admired in his turn, he should imitate none. To attain this end he had but one maxim:—

"Miej serce i patrzaj w serce."

"Have a heart and look into it."

Early in life did he begin to feel the extent of his country's misfortunes, and to acknowledge the duties which its situation imposed on every true Pole; but he soon also felt the weight of the cruel persecution with which the Russian government visited all those who manifested patriotic sentiments.

Born in Lithuania, at the beginning of this century, Mickiewicz completed his studies in the University of Wilna. At the age of nineteen he had already made himself known as a poet, by publishing his ballads. A short time afterwards, his poems "Dziady," or the feast of the dead; and "Grazyna," an affecting episode of Lithuanian history in the fourteenth century; rendered his name celebrated. There existed then among the students of Wilna an association, called "The Society of the Philaretes," the object of which was to excite emulation in study, to encourage science and letters, and to cherish the love of liberty and of fatherland. This society was therefore considered by the Russian government as a focus of rebellion, and punished as such. In 1824, many of the students were imprisoned, exiled, or condemned to labour in mines. Mickiewicz was sent off to the Crimea. There he composed his admirable and inimitable "Sonnets on the Crimea." Some time afterwards he was sent to Moscow, where he wrote the historical poem of "Conrad Wallenrod." In 1829, he left Russia for Italy, and, since 1831, has shared the fate of the Polish emigration. During his stay in Paris, he added the third part to his "Dziady," and wrote "The Book of the Polish Pilgrims," "Sir Thaddeus," a national poem, &c. France has lately acknowledged the merit of Mickiewicz in the most flattering manner. The Chamber of Deputies, in the last session, on the motion of the minister of Public Instruction, instituted, at the "Collège de France," a chair for the Polish language and Slavonic literature, the professorship of which was offered to this celebrated poet of Poland.

This account of Mickiewicz may give the reader an idea of the mastery over the English language which the translator has acquired. With equal judgment and good taste, he has not attempted to render his author in English metre, which, besides presenting great difficulties, would, we are persuaded, have given a much less perfect idea of the original. But quite apart from the merits of the poem, and the translation, every person of liberal opinions, and patriotic feelings, must take warm interest in the attempt made by a Polish exile, to introduce the best literature of his unfortunate country to the notice of English readers. We cordially wish the translation of "Conrad Wallenrod" the success which it deserves.

PAMPHLETS.

SANATORY INQUIRY—TOWNS IN SCOTLAND.—[This is the Report made to the Poor-Law Commissioners by Dr. S. Scott Allison, of the sanatory condition of a particular Scottish parish and small town in the colliery districts. The picture is, in every view, deplorable. Many excellent hints for reform and improvement follow the details of disease, immorality, crime, and misery.]

THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT AND THE IDOLATRY OF CEYLON. By R. Spence Hardy, Wesleyan Missionary. [This pamphlet exhibits a curious picture of superstition, besides enforcing those duties on the mother country in relation to the important colony of Ceylon, which individuals seem to have more at heart than governments.]

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE ASSOCIATION FOR OBTAINING AN OFFICIAL INQUIRY INTO THE PAUPERISM OF SCOTLAND.—[We have here many new and painful facts in support of that inquiry which cannot be much longer delayed, concluded by a Memorial of the Magistrates and Town Council of Glasgow, addressed to the Marquis of Normanby as Home Secretary, urging immediate inquiry. We shall cite two clauses of this important memorial:—"That your memorialists have observed, with deep concern, the recent increase in the numbers and destitution of the poor in this part of the country, and are anxious that measures should be adopted for the improvement of their condition. . . . That your memorialists are informed that the parochial and voluntary assistance afforded to the poor of Scotland is inadequate to procure for them the necessary supply of food, clothing, and lodging; and that the poor have suffered severely from diseases occasioned by the want of such supply." For these and other reasons, the memoralists urge an inquiry, which, to be impartial and effectual, must, they argue, be conducted by strangers.]

A SHORT STATEMENT OF FACTS CONNECTED WITH THE PROPOSED CHANGES IN OUR COMMERCIAL TARIFF. By the Rev. Thomas FARR.—[A valuable pamphlet, costing only a groat, and containing a digest of facts which ought to be worth pounds to those who have at heart the prosperity and happiness of their country.]

A late SUPPLEMENT TO THE SPECTATOR ON THE IMPORT DUTIES, is, on the same subject, still more valuable, as it is more full, and may be had (we presume) for sixpence, as it is only threepence to the readers of The Spectator. We hope that hundreds of thousands of both pamphlets may be circulated, to which the cheap postage gives great facility.

SERIAL WORKS.

CHAMBERS'S INFORMATION for the PEOPLE. Improved Series. Part I. [This is a revised re-issue, in a good form—(about the size of Tait's Magazine)—of those brief and comprehensive treatises which the Messrs. Chambers published some time since. It is, in short, a Cyclopædia not alphabetically arranged. The First Part comprehends an outline of Astronomy, Geology, Geography, and the Physical History of Man. In the age of cheap publications, this is about the cheapest work we have yet seen, independently of its other merits.]

PICTORIAL SHAKSPEARE. Part XVIII. As You Like It. [This number of the series, besides the usual annotations on the play, contains an ingenious defence of the character of Shakspeare, as a husband, against the air-woven theories of those who, upon the slenderest, if not imaginary, grounds, try to make out that he lived on bad terms with his wife all his life, and insulted her in his will at the close of it. This Part, the play of As You Like It, which holds the place among the dramas of Shakspeare, that the Lady of the Lake does among the poems of Scott—not, perhaps, the best, but yet the best beloved—is richly illustrated; and, as a new feature, contains the music of one of those old melodies, to which Shakspeare so often felicitously alludes.]

BULWER'S NOVELS. Volume VI. The Disowned.

VIRTUE has issued Part I. of "FOX'S BOOK OF MARTYRS," which, if not too high-priced, is likely to be a successful work, as it has always been popular in England.

MACULLOCH'S GEOGRAPHICAL AND STATISTICAL DICTIONARY. Part IX.—[This Part progresses from a general description of the kingdom of Hungary to the length of Cutch in Hindostan, and includes India, Ireland, and Italy. It is, therefore, as interesting as valuable in information. The Part also contains a large coloured map of Asia.

MANON LESCAUT. Parts V. and VI.

SAVAGE'S HISTORY OF PRINTING. Part X.

PHILOSOPHIC NUTS, OR THE PHILOSOPHY OF THINGS. Part II.

JUVENILE BOOKS.

MISS SEDGWICK'S STORIES FOR YOUNG PERSONS.—[Charming little stories, breathing the tenderest humanity, and the finest religious spirit. How we wish that many of our religious tract writers would study the character of these tales, and improve by the example, so as to write for the young and the ignorant in a way to awaken their attention, and impress their hearts!]

RURAL SCENES; OR, A PEEP INTO THE COUNTRY.—[A new edition of a charming little book, with many pretty rural pictures.]

TALES OF TRAVEL. By F. B. MILLER.—[The Tales are of many lands; the pictures illustrative of the countries described.]

SUMMER RAMBLES AND WINTER AMUSEMENTS. By a Clergyman's Widow.—[This is a series of conversations intended to instruct and amuse young people. They are principally about memorable natural productions, or notices of remarkable facts in English history.]

A PRESENT FROM GERMANY; or, the Christmas Tree. Translated by Emily PERRY. [A charming little book of those fairy tales, which none now can tell save the Germans. A few scraps of natural history are interspersed to give variety.]

CHILDHOOD ILLUSTRATED by a SELECTION from the POETS. [A series of tender and elegant poems are here collected, not so much illustrative of childhood, however, as of the feelings with which childhood is regarded by grown people. The poems are nearly all such as modern readers may be presumed to be familiar with, but here they are found gracefully grouped, which heightens the general effect of their beauty, whether of form or colouring.]

STORIES OF THE ANIMAL WORLD. By the Rev. H. B. DRAPER. [This JUVENILE ZOOLOGY will, from its plan and style, be found an exceedingly pleasant as well as instructive little compendium; and the cuts of animals and birds with which it is illustrated, are so lively, accurate, and beautiful, that they might alone give value to the work, without the descriptions.]

FINE ARTS.

SCENERY AND ANTIQUITIES OF IRELAND ILLUSTRATED. Part I. [The drawings of this pictorial work are by Bartlett, the letter-press by N. P. Willis. Those who have seen the Canada of the same co-partnery, will have a perfect idea of Ireland. The views are well selected, well drawn, and neatly engraved. The letter-press is lively and entertaining, carrying the reader from Donaghadee to Drogheda. The Part is ornamented with a portrait of Mr. Willis—not Yankee-like—seeming youthful, for a man so long before the world; and exhibiting one of those preposterous piles of forehead, above a boyish face, with which artists have for some years back complimented authors, Sir Walter Scott included. Scott's head, by Raeburn, before this fashion came in, looks absolutely flat, compared with that given him by other painters, and by Chantrey; yet, Scott had really an unusually lofty forehead.]

PROTESTANTISM.

"The Reformed Churches separated from the great Babylon to build them those which were lesser and more tolerable; but yet not to be tolerated for ever."—DR. HENRY MORE.

THERE are five great revolutions in the history of Man, by virtue of which he now is what he is, and society now stands as it does stand, or moves as it does move. The first of these, Christianity, the great religious revolution, is Hebrew; the second, Printing, the great literary revolution, and the third, Protestantism, the great ecclesiastical revolution, are German; the fourth, which alone is commonly called revolution, is French, and political; the fifth belongs to us English, and is, like the French, only now in progress: we may call it the revolution of steam-engines, spinning-jennies, railways, and joint-stock companies. Any man that wishes seriously to know on what ground he is now standing, and will not be buffeted about by priests, statesmen, and political economists, who knows whither, must study seriously and conscientiously, digest inwardly, and turn over again and again, so far as he has opportunity, the history of these five revolutions. It is our intention, on the present occasion, to offer a few remarks on the second great German revolution, commonly, but not with much propriety, called the Reformation. There was some reformation at the Council of Basle in 1431, and something of the same kind on a greater scale at the Council of Trent in 1545; but what we call the Reformation in church history was a REVOLUTION, if ever revolution was. In what we have to say, we shall study brevity as much as possible; our space does not allow of historical description or disquisition; we simply propose to offer a few "Aids to Reflection."

Properly speaking, every Tory ought to be a Papist; and it is a strange enough thing, considering the matter on grounds of reason, that the British Tory normally is not only not a Papist, but a fierce denouncer, and (what is bad) a vile calumniator of Popery; for a man should not calumniate or speak falsely of any one, not even of the devil. Much less should the Tories speak falsely of the Romanists; for if Toryism be a thing of any organism or consistency; if it exist by virtue of any independent, moral, and intellectual vitality, it must acknowledge the Roman Pope as the most consistent, thorough-going, philosophical, practical Tory, that the history of the world exhibits—not even excepting Napoleon. But the truth of the matter is, that no political or religious party (and British Toryism, least of all) represents purely or consistently a system of principles: parties represent interests; and it may be the interest of a man's heart on many occasions, and of his purse on some occasions, (for we would not think altogether basely of human nature,) to screw his head into a contradiction. British Toryism, or Conservatism, as it now pleases to be called, ("the world is governed by names") represents the stable principle of society generally, and in this regard may be said to be as necessary to the constitution of society as the bones are to the body, though the principle of life is in the heart and in the blood, which we of the movement boast ourselves to be. Now, it is manifest that the Pope stands in history as a sort of osteology, and firm frame-work of the church; he represents the stable principle of the Christianity of churchmen; so long as he exists, he exists as a living and visible pledge of the indefectible interests of the Christian hierarchy. All churchmen (who are mostly Tories,) therefore, and all church Tories (that is to say the great majority of Tories—for the church in these times, we are told, is "the only cock that will fight")—ought naturally to acknowledge the Pope as the great founder of their faith, or at least as an ancient and venerable ally; a doughty, though not always a wise, champion. But here comes in the miracle of time and place, the "overwhelming influence of external circumstances," the power of purse, the phantasmagoria of imagination, the fond jugglery of class and caste, the noxious exhalations, and the dim-flickering blue lights of rotten and boggy hearts, disturbing all our calculations; for the Tories represent not only the stable or Conservative principle of society generally,—but, specially and mainly, in this country they represent also the interests of the Protestant clergy in Great Britain, by act of Parliament established, of Protestant peers, and of a Protestant noblesse de la robe. This practical interest confounds all philosophical principles, suspends all moral affinities. In this country, if we will look beneath the skin, we have, in truth, not one Pope only, but many—Cunningham, Candlish, and Tail, lording it over the Court of Session as Hildebrand over the German emperor; and these modern men, for denouncing their brother in Rome, and breaking the ninth commandment daily, being only baptized with the name of Protestant (though God, out of these stones, can raise up children to Calvin,) are paid many guineas from the state Treasury, and fare sumptuously every day.

But while, in Scotland, this sacerdotal gospel of old Gregory is being preached in a Protestant name, on the other side of the Tweed, it is pleasant to observe, men are beginning to act more honestly. A large section of the Anglican Church—a Church commonly, if not correctly, called Protestant—has publicly discarded the designation that has hitherto marked its opposition to Popery; and out of this wambling limbo of private judgment wherein we now roll, boasts to be building a bridge into the ancient, devoutly-desired region of infallibility;—of which bridge, the Pope is not, indeed—as in the Romish system—the key-stone, but still remains a chief corner-stone. The Pope is not the worst thing, nor the essential thing, in Popery: in him there is no more of the Roman Church than was of the Venetian Republic in the Doge—than there is of a large lustre in the topmost jet. Substantially, the bridge which the Puseyites project, is the same as that which was built by the doctors of the Council of Trent: it is a sacerdotal bridge; every stone is a priest legitimately descended, and lawfully ordained—preserving, also, within itself, the magical power of perpetual propagation; and the cement of both is the same—the pride and ambition which is the besetting sin of the priestly order, and the faith of silly women and intellectual imbeciles, without which it seems impossible that such a portentous structure should hold together.

The vital doctrine of Popery we hold to be the infallibility, not of the Pope, but of the Church—by the Church meaning the priesthood; for the Pope can no more act without the Church than the Queen of England can without the Parliament.* If this view be correct, (and we may take another opportunity of proving it at length,) then the Puseyites are substantially Papists; for if they do not teach the infallibility, or “indefectibility” (if they will have it so) of the priesthood, they preach nothing new, and nothing that comes in collision with the Protestant doctrine of private judgment. But that they do preach something new is altogether too plain: they make as much noise in the world as Robert Owen; and they have got parallelisms in their scheme too—only diocesan ones: they call the REFORMATION publicly a CRIME; whereby it is only strange (in accordance with what we above remarked) that they call Popery also a crime, and in the same breath.* If they mean anything at all, they mean that the exercise of private judgment is a crime; and that the men who exercise it—the people commonly called Protestants—use the weapons of the devil. There can be no mistake here—no compromise. The alternative is plain: stand upon your own legs, if you can; if not, take the crutch which the clergy provide. There can be no doubt that an honest man may get to heaven both ways; only it certainly does seem more honourable to march up stoutly on one's own legs, than to be carried in on the back of an old woman.

Protestantism is a thing very simple to be understood. We have expressed it very plainly here. The Puseyites have said very plainly, that, as we here express it, they will have nothing to do with it. We have no difficulty in pronouncing an opinion on the merits of these men. We admire the chivalrous candour of their hearts; we despise the puerile imbecility of their intellects,—as if God's whole creation, and man, his noblest creature, were doomed to trip continually behind the petticoats of a nurse, and be fed with spoon-meat! Fie! fie! fie! If, indeed, God had stereotyped visibly among men a council of angels and archangels, cherubim and seraphim, and creatures “all eyes,” as Ezekiel saw them in vision; then we might have rejoiced to sit upon the knees of the gods, and from the lips of the wise know an end of all mysteries. But when we see creatures with the stature of full-grown men, with solemn display of Greek and Hebrew, mumbling and maundering the sheerest puerilities; were it not better to have been born altogether without reason, than to have it only that we may hand it over to the safe keeping of these men? Nature rebels against such base betrayal, such stupid prostration of her noblest functions; and in this REBELLION Protestantism properly consists. Is it strange that a man having eyes should rebel against spectacles,—which, indeed, are useful to the weak-sighted, but to the man of healthy vision, bring only dimness and perplexity?

That the right of private judgment is the grand watchword—the articulus stantis vel cadentis—of Protestantism, is a matter on which it is impossible to entertain any doubt for a moment. Luther, indeed, when the Emperor and the Papal Legate refused to hear him, appealed to a general council of the church—a very proper, prudent, and modest procedure in all respects; as the Romanists themselves admit that, in the fixing of doctrines, the Pope is not independent of councils: but it is quite certain, from Luther's whole future conduct, and

* We do not pretend here to decide dogmatically what the Popish doctrine is, as to the power of the Pope independent of general councils, or Pope-presided councils, called general; but practically, in great and important matters of Church doctrine and discipline, the Pope has never acted without councils. The doctrine of the Popish Church, as it now stands, is the product of a long series of decisions of councils.

* “The Crimes of Popery and the Reformation.”—Quarterly Review, March 1840, p. 524.

from the doctrines preached by all the Reformers, that they did not use the decrees of councils as an authoritative rule, but only as an useful help of faith. So, in particular, our Westminster Confession says (chap. xxxi.)—"All synods or councils, since the apostles' times, whether general or particular, may err, and many have erred; therefore, they are not to be made the rule of faith and practice, but to be used as an help in both."* And the Helvetic Confession (de Interpretatione Scripturæ, c. ii.†) has a passage to the same effect, standing in striking contrast with the Papistical doctrines now preached by the Puseyites:—"Wherefore we do not suffer ourselves, in matters of religion, to be pressed by mere opinions of the fathers, or determinations of councils, much less by received customs, or by the multitude of persons agreeing in the same opinion" (this is Puseyan Catholicity to a T; arithmetical orthodoxy, as we may say,) "or by the prescription of ages; and we allow no judge in the matter of faith but God himself, pronouncing in the Holy Scriptures what is true and what false; what to be pursued, and what to be eschewed. We acquiesce only in the judgment of spiritual men, gathered from the Word of God." About this matter, therefore, there can be no doubt. Another matter, however, closely connected with it, may not bear such intuitive evidence to all. It is this; that the Protestant Churches utterly discard and repudiate the idea of a priesthood; that a clerical class, caste, or order, in any shape, is altogether foreign to their genius. The Presbyterian Church, for instance, in this country, recognises neither clergy nor laity as a distinct class, but only brethren; no difference of class, but only a difference of function, for the sake of order and convenience.‡ And we see weekly, and monthly, and yearly, in our Kirk Sessions, Presbyteries, Synods, and Assemblies, that there exists, in fact, no separate body in our Church similar to that which is called clergy in the Roman-Catholic or Monarchical, and in the Anglo-Catholic or Oligarchic Church. Our laymen rule the Church conjointly and severally with our churchmen; and in the annual assemblies held at Edinburgh in the month of May, (we particularize here for the sake of our Trans-Tweedian brethren, not over-well informed generally on these matters,) the clerical members from the far North are often sadly humbled to find that the Church is ruled virtually in the metropolis more by laymen (specially lawyers) than by churchmen. So the leader of the Church, in the present great anti-patronage movement, was a layman and a lawyer; and where the layman led, the churchmen followed—into a bog. This, however, can be looked on, in no sense, as a fair specimen of the working of our non-clerical Church; for there is no doubt that the laity, (we call them so, for want of another word,) by their mere presence, neutralize much of the violence and exaggeration which the "very fervid genius of the Scots," in clerical incarnation, is peculiarly liable to emit. Nor let it be supposed that the denial of a priestly class is, in any way, peculiar to Scottish Protestantism. The Helvetic Confession (chap. xviii. de Ministris Ecclesiæ) is very express and very edifying on the subject:—

"There is no priesthood (sacerdotium) in the New Testament, such as was under the Old, which had an external consecration by oil (unctionem), sacred vestments, and divine ceremonies, which were types of Christ, who, when he came, fulfilled all these things, and abrogated them; for Christ remains the sole priest to eternity, and it is due to the reverence we bear him, that none of his ministers assume so high a title; for our Lord did not ordain in his Church any priests of the New Testament, who, receiving power from the suffragan, should offer up the host, yea, and the very flesh and blood of the Lord for the living and the dead; but he only appointed persons who should teach and administer." . . . "Concerning the power of the ministers of the Church, we avoid the error of those who make large disputations, subjecting almost all earthly things to churchmen, contrary to the commandment of the Lord, who prohibited dominion to his followers, and chiefly commended humility. In truth, power is twofold—the supreme and absolute power which Christ reserves to himself, and the power of office or ministry, limited by him who exercises the full power. This secondary power is, properly speaking, not an authority, but a mere administration (ministerium quam imperio similior est.) For the Lord grants to his steward (oconomus) power in the house, and gives him the keys whereby he may open this door and shut that. But unless the minister do everything according to the commands of his Lord, and if he exceed the limits of his commission, the Lord will not ratify his deeds; and it is only when the minister does everything according as his duty is prescribed in the Word of God, that the faithful will respect his doings."*

The reader will perceive, from this final sentence, how intimately the two doctrines are connected,—the doctrine that there is no Christian priesthood, with the doctrine of private judgment. For what is the use of a bench of judges if any man may expound the law for himself? It is the every day

* We are quoting from a cheap and convenient little edition of the Confession, printed at Aberdeen. (George King. 1840.) This publication was much wanted; and cannot fail of a good circulation in these church times—only we cannot but express our disapproval of the impudence of the motto on the title-page: Deut. vi. 6, 7,—"And these words which I command thee this day shall be in thine heart," &c.—most papistically and most heretically setting forth that the Confession is of equal authority with the Bible. The proper motto for a Confession is that of St. John,—"Try the spirits whether they be of God."

† We quote from the Syntagma. Geneva: 1654.

‡ "The bail policy of the Kirk consisteth in three things: in doctrine, discipline, and distribution. With doctrine is annexed the administration of the sacraments; and according to the parts of this division, arises a threefold sort of office-bearers in the Kirk; to wit, of ministers or preachers, elders or governors, and deacons or distributors. And all these may be called by one general word, ministers of the Kirk. For to take away all occasion of tyrannies, God willeth that they should rule with mutual consent of brethren, and equality of power, every one according to his functions." Second Book of Discipline, II. 2. 3.

case of trial by jury in those cases where the jury substantially judges of the law, as well as of the fact; or where the fact, as in a question of mercantile practice, makes the law. It is useful to hear the address of the judge; but it is not necessary; and the decision—guilty, or not guilty—may be given directly in the teeth of the charge from the bench. In fact, ministers preach and administer in a Protestant church, just as professors lecture and exhibit in a German university,—listened to with respect, with enthusiasm, and even reverence, when they speak sense; but neglected, ridiculed, and discarded, when they speak nonsense: for they have no monopoly.

On these two corner-stones, therefore, Protestantism stands:—1. On the assertion of private judgment; 2. On the denial of a Christian priesthood.

Let us now observe shortly how the several points of difference, that divide the Popish and the Protestant churches, are either specializations or generalizations, or modifications of these. We do not affect a complete enumeration; but the main points seem as follows:—

1. The Pope.
2. Tradition.
3. Indulgences. The Keys.
4. The Mass and other Sacraments.
5. Auricular Confession.
6. Penance.
7. Celibacy.
8. Purgatory. Prayers for the dead.
9. Good Works. Merit.
10. Worship of the Virgin Mary and the Saints.

1. As to the first matter; why does Protestantism deny the Pope?—not merely or mainly as an ecclesiastical monarch,—for it would be difficult to show (supposing always that no particular form of Church government is laid down in scripture) why the Church should not be governed by a limited monarch as well as the State,—but the Pope is obnoxious to us as the living head of the aristocracy of the priesthood, and as the highest power of sacerdotal presumption. We denounce him, not because he claims to be the head of the Church, but because he is the ringleader of the priests. In the denial of the Pope, therefore, the main thing with Protestants is the denial of the priesthood in him. If Pope Leo, in Luther's time, had ruled the Church as moderately as Queen Victoria rules us, no person would have quarreled with his supremacy; and if Dr. Pusey, in our time, preaches salvation by the same exclusive privileges of the sacerdotal caste, against which Martin Luther protested, it will not save him from being a Papist that he does not seek to be called a Pope.

2. As for tradition, the denial of that arises necessarily out of the assertion of private judgment. The Protestant mind rebels against the arbitrary interposition of any secondary source of evidence, as authoritative between itself and the primary source of evidence—the Bible. So we seek for the doctrines of Romanism in the Canons of the Council of Trent, not in the reasonings of Bellarmine. The denial of tradition in the Protestant Church, is precisely similar to the refusal of hearsay evidence in a court of justice, where better evidence is to be had. Of course, where primary evidence fails, a reasonable man will take the best he can get. No wise theologian despises church history; but what rational man will peril his salvation on the infallibility of a wandering sound?

3. Indulgences were the first thing that Luther quarreled with,—the rank offence that stunk in the nostrils of all good men,—as if God's favour were a thing to be bought with gold. It is almost needless to remark, that the denial of indulgences is merely the denial of the privilege, claimed by the priesthood, of forgiving sins; or, as they now express it less offensively, the privilege of remitting the temporal punishment imposed on sin by the Church;* and the revindication of that privilege to God in Christ. It is a discarding of the priest as a mediator between God and man, and a restoration of the independent communion of every free man with his Creator. It is an implied denial of the sacerdotal caste. It is ecclesiastical democracy.

We must mention, however, that the Confession of Faith (chap. xxx. of Church Censures) asserts the power of the keys in very strong terms, and peculiarly liable to abuse. But this is a matter of small moment in a Protestant Church; because the whole body of the laity, and each individual separately, is, by the right of private judgment, constituted a supreme judge over all judgments put forth by the clergy; so that, if any clergyman with us were to attempt to stamp the seal of God upon his own puerility or delirium, and launch the same, with ban and bluster, upon the head of a poor layman, he would only be laughed at. But, indeed, the thing with us is impossible, having no priesthood; if we are excommunicated, we are excommunicated by ourselves, by our own peers and brethren in the Church courts: no mere clergyman can touch a hair of our heads.

4. The mass is the daily miracle performed by the Christian priesthood; and in so far as Martin Luther protested against this, he robbed the clergy of that which they must necessarily hold most dear—not an exclusive privilege only, but a magical power. It is curious, however, to observe how backward Protestantism was to acknowledge the sacrament of the Supper, in its original, simple, symbolical nature, as an acted parable; for it was, in truth, nothing more, and, in this view, characteristically consistent with Christ's whole manner of teaching. Zuingli, the Swiss reformer, alone, has the honour of having first, in the sixteenth century, proclaimed the ancient doctrine in its grand simplicity. Luther helped himself with consubstantiation, which seemed at least intelligible; Calvin affected a distinction between himself and Zuingli, which is little better than a solemn trifling with words—(Confession of Faith, xxvii. and xxix.) and the Puseyites—whom, however, we cannot call Protestants—stand most stoutly upon what they call the real presence, utterly repudiating the common-sense doctrine of the Swiss reformer, but less gross and carnal in their conceptions, as they think, than the Romanists. All Protestant Churches, however, agree in this, that they ascribe no miraculous virtue to the clerical ministration. With them the clergyman, presiding at the communion table, is merely the dispenser of the means of grace; with the Papists and with the Puseyites, he is the conductor (and the one indispensable and necessary conductor) of the matter of grace.

* See "Declaration of the Catholic Bishops and Vicars Apostolic in Great Britain;" Tract, No. I., published under the superintendence of the Catholic Institute of Great Britain.

The same holds with regard to the other sacraments. As livery of land can be given only by the attorney of the proprietor, duly authorized, and such livery only is a real and substantial transference; so the Papists and the Puseyites hold that Baptism can only be administered by a priest duly commissioned; and that when so administered, and only when so administered, it operates, by the grace of God and the magical power of the priest, a real and substantial regeneration of the baptized soul. All this Protestantism repudiates, and must repudiate, because it does not allow of a priesthood at all.

5. As for the matter of auricular confession, it is plain enough that if there is no priestly order, there can be no confession to them, imperative on Christians. The Lutherans, indeed, practise, or did practise, confession to their ministers (they call it Beichte in German;) and there is nothing to hinder the clergy in this country from introducing the same practice, if they think it tends to edification, and if the people do not kick; but the proper Protestant doctrine, on the subject of confession, is contained in that text of the Apostle James (v. 16,) "Confess your faults one to another;" and, in this scriptural sense, it might be well for Protestants if auricular confession were somewhat more common than it is.

6. Penance is an arbitrary, priest-imposed punishment for sin, and with the denial of a priesthood necessarily falls.

7. Celibacy, like the Mass, if it could only be practised, would be another miracle of the priesthood, not more astonishing to common men than if every priest were born into the world without a mouth, and with eyes on the point of his fingers, like the magnetic girls. Even as it is, however imperfectly practised, celibacy is the surest fence of the sacerdotal caste; it being very naturally conceived that the men who cannot do common things, must possess the power of doing uncommon things; and thus celibacy not only marks the priestly order, and separates them from vulgar mortals, but establishes a sort of presumption in favour of the extraordinary gifts with which they boast themselves endowed.

8. The denial of purgatory is one of the most remarkable instances of the anti-sacerdotal character of Protestantism. Purgatory, or a middle state of cleansing and preparation for indeterminate and mediocre souls, is in itself a most comfortable and consoling doctrine; and unless a person can prove (which it will go hard to do) the contrary from the Scriptures, it is a doctrine which every benevolent-minded Christian, if he does not know it to be true, will at least wish to be true. And the fact is, that, latterly, many of the most pious Protestant writers have taught a middle state, or Purgatory.* But the Romiah priests abused this consoling creed, for the purpose of increasing their own power over the souls of men, and furthering their unholy warfare of masses for the dead, sung for hard cash; and this roused the righteous spirit of Luther so much, that, being given to passionate outbursts (like Napoleon and other great men,) he denounced the whole doctrine, and "threw out the child with the wash-water," as the German proverb says. Thus do we see in the rash dogmatism, as well as in the cautious scepticism, of the Protestants, that the main instinct of all their proceedings was a rebellion against the existence of an imperious and monopolizing priesthood.

9. Works and Merit.—This is a delicate subject; and the present writer not having studied the "Marrow of Modern Divinity," may possibly stumble into some heresy; but he will state his opinion quietly, let it go for what it is worth. The man who believes that any virtuous work, or series of virtuous works, done by a mortal man, can ground him in a title, and furnish him with a meritorious claim, to eternal life, is a presumptuous and conceited fool; and no Papist ever taught a doctrine so outrageously absurd, and so decidedly anti-Christian.† Against this, Protestantism could not protest. As little could it have entered into the brain of the great Reformer to protest against virtue, and deeds of Christian charity, viewed, not as a meritorious cause, but as an indispensable condition of salvation. One thing, however, he saw,—an evil; and a clamant one in those days. The priests, who interfered with everything, interfered with Christian works also; and those deeds which could have no moral value but as the spontaneous expressions of pure feeling and strong conviction (faith,) were prescribed and regulated in a variety of ways; and the ignorant Christian was taught, or naturally led, to believe that there was a merit in doing them, as mere external acts commanded by the Church, independently of the motive from which they might proceed. Further, as works were tangible things that could be counted and paid for, and withal exhaustless in number—whereas faith is one, invisible and indivisible—it was natural that, when the priests wished to lord it over Christians, they should find it at once more possible and more profitable to lord it over their works than over their faith. For these reasons, they magnified the importance of works, magnifying thereby, manifestly, their own power; for they alone could adjudge the reward of good deeds done, as they alone could remit the punishment imposed upon their neglect. Against this mainly (in the judgment of the present writer,) Martin Luther protested; and, as in the other cases, his protest on this head partly implied, partly expressed, a denial of the sacerdotal caste. If the honest Reformer went beyond this,—calling the Epistle of St. James, as he is reported to have done, “an epistle of straw,” and with other such homely phrases as he was accustomed to bandy, disparaging genuine deeds of Christian piety, he did what was not foolish only, but pernicious; for good works are the grand burden and boast of the gospel, and whoso speaks against them, speaks against the Lord Jesus Christ.

10. The worship of the Virgin Mary and the saints has nothing directly to do, apparently, with the privileges of the priesthood. The discarding of the Virgin and the saints necessarily followed however, as the first result of the exercise of private judgment; for St. Peter’s supremacy may be proved from Scripture (Matthew xvi. 18,) as well as from St. Cyprian (de unitate), in a fashion; but the duty, or the propriety of addressing our prayers to the Virgin Mary and the saints, is altogether without the shadow of scriptural authority. We must remark, also, that the saints were mostly, if not all, priests, and that the priests exercised the power of adding to their number indefinitely by canonization. To deny the saints, therefore, was, indirectly, to deny the priesthood in one of its grandest prerogatives.

So much for the principles of Protestantism, which, we repeat, are substantially only two—the right of private judgment and the essential laic character of the Christian Church. If we are right here, then, without doubt, the Puseyites, who deny these two principles, are Papists. But we do not say that, on this account, they are not good members of the Anglican Church; for we do not know that the Anglican Church is a Protestant Church; at least, we do not find the principles of Protestantism, as we have stated them, in the Thirty-nine Articles;* and we know that a large section of that Church has publicly disclaimed the name of Protestant. It may be, also, that the Anglican Church is both Protestant and Papist; felicitously ambiguous, that all creatures may come in, as into Noah’s ark, and be saved. If so, it is a Catholic (or universal) Church indeed; and there is no great harm done: only it is a sad and a most iniquitous thing that Papists without the Church, should be bemoaned daily with slander and falsehood, and devilry of all kinds; while Papists within the Church, being called by another name, are courted and caressed by the great of the land, keep their purses within belts well lined, and provide their sons with pleasant places. But a man forgets to stare at such things after five-and-twenty.

We shall now turn over a leaf, and compare the principles of Protestantism with the practice; and if we find contradiction upon contradiction here, we need not be surprised. As there is indwelling sin in all saints, so in all Protestantism there is indwelling Popery. Pity, perchance, for the respectability of some persons that we cannot allow it quietly to remain within; but our duty commands us to drag it out into the light of impartial criticism. We have faults, it is plain; and we may as well train our ears to hear them decently before the day comes, when we must hear them. We do right, perhaps, in the general, to hold ourselves out against the Romanists as immaculate—according to the proverb, “Put your best foot foremost;” but, after all, being once detected in a blunder—we are not gods, but men.

One great practical blunder, or natural self-deception rather, which Protestants practise upon themselves, is the imagination that, because their religion secures to them the right of private judgment, they are thereby secured in the actual exercise of it. Now, the fact of the matter is, that Protestantism, when it asserts private judgment, projects an intellectual, as Christianity, in the doctrine of regeneration, projects a moral ideal; and though it is a very common thing to hear Protestants boasting of their right of private judgment, when they wish to declaim against the Papists for a party purpose, (as we have also religious Pharisees, boasting superior holiness, who yet have nothing of Christianity but the name;) yet every observer of the religious culture of this country must know that the actual exercise of private judgment, among persons calling themselves Protestant, is in a very small proportion to the number of those who prate largely of the privilege. We, indeed, are accustomed to boast of our right of private judgment, as the Jews did of their descent from Abraham; oblivious, all the while, that a man may cry “the Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible!” lustily enough, and yet mean only the Catechism; as, for the sake of euphony, men are wont to speak of love, when they mean lust. Practically, we must know that the exercise of private judgment, in religious matters, is a very difficult thing, and a thing which belongs only to strong and independent minds, and to minds well instructed. To most men, as society has hitherto been, Christianity, whether under the Protestant or Papal form, is, and must be, more an atmosphere than a weapon; and as for practical piety (which is the main thing,) the philosophic theologian exercising bona fide the right of private judgment, and resolving this atmosphere chemically into its component parts, does not enjoy a whit better health than the rudest boor, and is, perhaps, in the present fretful state of society, more exposed to asthma. This consideration, if rightly weighed, is of infinite use towards fostering in our breasts a spirit of charity to our brethren of the Romish persuasion; for, properly speaking, private judgment, as a practical privilege, belongs only to students and thinkers, who have leisure and inclination to set themselves down seriously to a sifting of creeds, and a critical study of the Bible. Protestant Christians, like Catholic, are made so mainly by the teaching of the clergy and the Catechism. This we must admit, and we may do so without the slightest disparagement to our dear Protestantism; because it may be (and we believe it is) that Calvin’s catechism reflects reason and scripture more purely than Bellarmine’s; and because Protestantism, like Christianity, has still the grand boast of projecting an ideal, for whose realization it strives; whereas the Papacy and Puseyism give up that ideal—the idea of a perfect and ripe judgment for the individual—in despair. And we have the consolation to think that we are advancing, by slow and sure steps, sometimes, or, as at the present era, by rapid strides, to our goal. When education shall be so diffused that every man can and does think for himself (if education shall ever effect so much,) then the whole world will be substantially Protestant, though the name of Catholic may remain. Whatever opinions men may entertain, if they have gathered those opinions from an independent, impartial study of the primary sources of religious evidence, unbiassed by the intervening authority of those secondary sources on which the Papists and the Puseyites build, they are, and are entitled to call themselves, Protestants, though their creed may not agree, in many points, with any of the Confessions commonly received in the Protestant Churches. The advance of Protestantism consists not in the increased building of churches, and printing of catechisms, by this or that particular party, but in the increased, independent, bona fide study of the Bible among all parties. And here we cannot but remark, that the clergymen of all denominations are not always sufficiently careful to impress this grand truth on the minds of their hearers; on the contrary, they often speak as if Bible study were nothing but a searching the books of Scripture to fish out proofs for the doctrines of the catechism; whereas, we are told to “search the Scriptures whether these things are so.” And though catechisms and confessions are very useful and excellent things, yet that clergyman does not do his duty to his people who habitually recommends one catechism to their attention, and one only. It is better to study no catechism at all than to study only one, as such systematic cramming with favourite dogmas can only serve to fill the mind with sectarian prejudices, and prevent the free development of a grand and Catholic Protestantism in the soul. In this respect private Christians are much better off than students of theology, for these are often trained more into the curious knowledge of the Church creed, than to the act of independent thinking; whereas, Protestantism acknowledges no creed but the Bible, and regards articles and decrees of councils merely as illustrations—perhaps only as curiosities.

Another grand practical blunder of Protestantism is of a much more serious complexion. According to the pure Protestant idea, private judgment is not merely a right and privilege, but a duty; and if a duty, then it must be the most gross self-contradiction and perfect suicide to hinder, in any way, directly or indirectly, the performance of this duty. In other words, the assertion of the right of private judgment leads necessarily to the disowning of religious persecution, and to the practice of universal charity and brotherly toleration of all religious principles and practices. And this is so manifest that the Protestant Churches have always been forward to make a public boast of their religious toleration, as opposed to the persecuting principle of the Papacy. In the year 1838, for instance, the Rev. Rt. Candlish, of St. George's Church, in this city, writing, as the organ of the General Assembly, to the Dutch Church, has the following protest:—“We protest most solemnly, as our fathers often, at the utmost hazard of their lives, protested, against intolerance and persecution of every kind on account of religion; against all proceedings and plans whose object is to impose restraints, or pains and penalties, on men for conscience' sake, or in other way to coerce or constrain their sentiments concerning the truth of God.” These are noble and truly Protestant sentiments; and if sounds that tinkle in the ear as sweetly as the versicles of a pretty poetess of quality in an embellished Annual, were necessarily anything more than sound, these sentiments, expressed as they are in the most comprehensive and general terms, would prove a great deal. But unfortunately the clang of consecrated swords, and the screws and cordages of parliamentary piety tell a different tale. MAY GOD FILL YOU WITH HATRED TO THE POPE! said Martin Luther to his friends, as he left Smalcald: PERREAT DIABOLUS! as the Burschen song says; and, in the estimation of theologians in a passion, every NON-I is the devil. Martin Luther rode a fiery steed; he was in the heat of battle, and a little lack of Christian charity and Protestant toleration may well be overlooked in him; but the mere pulpit-drum beaters and theological anatomists that followed in the fierce strife of wordy denunciation, are altogether unpardonable. These men mounted a vulgar hobby-horse, and lashed it soundly; and the name of the hobby-horse was CHURCH-ORTHODOXY, and the name of the lash was the WRATH OF MAN, and the name of the rider was the OLD ADAM!

The intolerant spirit of Protestantism appears historically, not merely in the practice, but, with marvellous inconsistency, also in the principles of Protestants. Toleration, indeed, was unknown in the Christian world, Protestant, as well as Catholic, till Arminius, Grotius, and Episcopius victim of the ever-infamous synod of Dort, in Holland, and John Locke, in England, preached it; and even now in this nineteenth century, the Puseyites, with that grand consistency which characterizes them, have not hesitated to refer all the evils under which society at present groans, to the diabolical principles of toleration.* Nor is there anything wonderful here. It is hard for an old sinner to cut all his sins at once; and there being two things to be done in the sixteenth century, to cure the eye of blindness and the heart of bigotry, the latter, as the more difficult, was left undone. Perfect toleration is in fact only another word for perfect love, and perfect love is perfect Christianity. If, therefore, we see newspapers, and reviews, and magazines of all kinds, preaching intolerance in some shape or other publicly in this Protestant country, we are to look upon it with coolness, if possible, and as a thing altogether natural. Homer has sung for 8000 years, and prose still remains in the world. The intolerance of Protestantism, which the reverend divine above quoted denies to belong to the Established Church of Scotland, belongs not to that church indeed, nor to any other church particularly, but to human nature generally. It is one of the most universal manifestations of that selfishness of men, in which the self-assertion and self-protrusion necessary to energetic character is so apt to terminate. All enthusiasm and all energy, with our crank mortal resolves, naturally rushes into intolerance; which the balance-wheel of wisdom only in an elect few of God's own can check. Hence alone we explain the existence of those persecuting doctrines which the confessions of the proper Protestant churches, and the writings of the great Protestant divines set forth without a blush. The wisest philosophers have believed in astrology; the mildest magistrates have banished and burned the most pious persons for the fictitious crimes of heresy and witchcraft; and shall we account it strange if the most orthodox theologians, expounding a religion of love, have preached persecution, and fanned hatred systematically?

* See the famous article on Socialism. Quarterly Review, March, 1840, passim.

For the sake of those deluded partisans in this country, or for the sake of those whom they (God forgive them!) intentionally delude, asserting that persecution for religious opinions is a characteristic of the Papal church only, and not of the Protestant, we shall here make an extract or two from the Protestant Confessions. The Helvetic Confession (chap. xxx. de Magistratu), says:—"Yea, we assert that the care of religion is the principal and main duty of the holy Magistracy. Let them, therefore, draw the sword of God against all malefactors, seditious persons, robbers, oppressors, blasphemers, perjured persons, and against all those whom God has ordered to punish and to slay. Let them also coerce heretics who are truly heretics, being incorrigible, and not ceasing to offend the majesty of God, and to disturb the peace of the Church." And, in conformity with this doctrine of the Swiss Churches, we know that Michael Servetus was burnt, and that Sebastian Castiglione was banished, much to the satisfaction of Calvin, who played the stern Danton, and Beza, who, in his famous book, de hæreticis comburendis, seems, as it were, the fiery Mirabeau of Geneva. In the earliest Scottish Confession of Faith, which was that of the English congregation of Geneva, we find the following very violent and intolerant passage, denouncing not Papists only, but Anabaptists, who were Protestants. "As Moses, Hezekias, Josias, and other godly rulers, purged the Church of God from superstitions and idolatry, so the defence of Christ's Church, appertaineth to the Christian magistrate, against all idolaters and heretics, as Papists, Anabaptists, with such links of Antichrist, to root out all doctrines of devils and men, as the mass, purgatory, Limbus patrum;* prayers to saints, and for the dead; FREE-WILL; distinction of meats, apparel, and days; vows of single life, presence at idol service, MAN'S MERITS, with such like, which draw us from the society of Christ's Church, wherein standeth only remission of sins," &c. The Second Book of Discipline of our Church, chap. x., says, to the same purpose, with pith and humour enough:—"It is the office of the civil magistrate to see that the Kirk be not invaded or hurt by false teachers, nor the rooms thereof occupied by DUMB-DOGS, (moderate preachers!) or IDLE BELLIES, to assist and maintain the discipline of the Kirk, and to punish those that will not obey the censure of the same, without confounding always one jurisdiction with another:" this last caveat meaning, that the magistrate is not to take it upon himself to decide what heresy is; but this being first decided by the Kirk, the heretic is to be "delivered over to the secular arm," to be burnt as Servetus was, for denying the Trinity, or imprisoned for a few weeks, according to the milder practice of modern times, as Cleave was, for selling a deistical pamphlet. These quotations, so strangely in the teeth of the fair professions contained in Mr. Candlish's letter to the Dutch Church, prove not only that the Scottish Church is not tolerant, but that she considers persecution for religious opinions, by the civil magistrate, as a sacred duty; and this not only in her old Confessions, but in that of 1647, ratified by Act of Parliament in 1649, commonly called the Westminster Confession, which repeats the doctrine of the Book of Discipline, shortly as follows, (chap. xxiii., § 3.):—"The civil magistrate may not assume the administration of the word and sacraments, or the power of the keys of the kingdom of Heaven; yet he hath authority, and it is his DUTY, to take order that unity and peace be preserved, that the truth of God be kept pure and entire,—that all blasphemies and HERESIES be suppressed—all corruptions and abuses in worship and discipline prevented and reformed,—all the ordinances of God duly settled, and administered and observed. For the better effecting whereof, he hath power to call synods, to be present at them, and to provide, that whatsoever is transacted in them be according to the MIND of God." A notable passage, which, if established creeds were not unchangeable,* ought certainly to be changed; for it not only makes intolerance and persecution a duty on all those who subscribe the Confession of Faith without public qualification and exception; but it establishes a sort of secular Popedom, or universal Episcopate of the magistrate over the priest,—which stamps the seal of orthodoxy on all the late doings of the lawyers, and turns terribly

* The Limbus patrum et infantum is the outer circle of Hell, according to the doctrine of the Papists, where the souls of the patriarchs before Christ, and of infants dying without baptism, are supposed to swim and wamble in a state of stupor, which is not damnation, but is certainly very far from salvation.

* Comparatively, of course. It is difficult to change any creed once generally recognized, whether established or non-established; but it is very difficult to change an established creed. The Dissenters, however, in Scotland deserve the highest praise for having publicly purged their formula of this damnable heresy. They qualify their subscription to the Confession with the clause, "It being always understood that you are not required to approve of anything in these books which teaches, or may be supposed to teach, compulsory or persecuting principles in religion." According to the fair phraseology of Mr. Candlish, the General Assembly ought to make some qualification of the same kind. But we must imagine church creeds are crazy throughout, seeing how fearful churchmen are to touch them.

into the ludicrous the sublime Hildebrandistic attitude in which the Church now affects to stand before the banded principalities and powers of this world, eager, no doubt, to pounce upon the tithes.

These extracts from the symbolical books of the Protestant Churches, (and having these, it is quite unnecessary to point out doctrines of intolerance from the writings of their doctors,) prove not so much the inconsistency of Protestant practice with Protestant principles—which were a small offence—as the inconsistency of Protestant principles with themselves, which is a sorry sight. For the sacerdotal Christians, both Roman and Anglican, when they preach and practice persecution, are consistent in every point. They believe that the Church is a living and visible theocracy, instituted and maintained by God for teaching divine truth, and keeping the moral world in some decent sort of order; according to which doctrine the rod in the hand of the bishop is truly in the hand of God; and in this chastisement we ought to rejoice, for “whom God loveth he chasteneth.” But the Protestant Church having abolished the priesthood, and publicly declared the majority of each individual intellect, whose instincts cry for emancipation, can no longer, with any consistency, keep the world under tutors and curators. In so far, therefore, as we Protestants cherish or practise intolerance in any point, we live in habitual contradiction to ourselves, and carry about with us thus, according to Schiller,† the true and real misery, and genuine hell of a rational being. It were well, however, after all, if our self-contradiction could be confined to principles; and if, preaching doctrines of devils, we, like Epicurus, could boast to practise the precepts of angels. But our practice, though not quite so bad as our principles, on this point, is bad enough; for, though we have (not with the best grace, it must be confessed) repealed much of the practical intolerance that, to our shame, remained in the British statute-book longer than in any other calling itself Christian,‡ there still remains a remnant in respectable lusthood, as recent acts of Parliament anent jail-chaplaincies, school-inspectorships, and other small matters of that kind, sufficiently testify. Nay, we may say truly—and the more publicly it is confessed the better—that bigotry is engrained in the British constitution; (being eradicated by slow degrees, every small branch lopped off requiring a gigantic wrench, and bleeding copiously;) that oppression of our poor Romanist brother lives a hereditary guilt in our members, as the spoil of Poland stands a Cain’s-mark on the broad brow of Russia; and that the glorious 1688, good as it was in its own time and place, was, in the eye of God, only a sectarian revolution, a heresy, (dissensio in the Scripture sense,) and an accursed thing; for every revolution that celebrates in theological hatred, and stereotypes by civil penalties, the triumph of one religious faction over another, is contrary to the spirit of Christianity. This is manifest. For the great principle of Christianity, as we all know, but very few of us practise, is LOVE THINE ENEMY; and in Christ Jesus there is neither Protestant nor Papist, Episcopalian nor Presbyterian, but a new creature. And if any man say that religious tests and civil disabilities—of which not a few still remain in this land—are not persecution and intolerance, that man is a sophist. For whether you cut off my leg or shut up the road where I am walking, comes to the same thing. I cannot always choose another road. Murder, according to the gospel doctrine, is committed not only by those who kill, but by those who call their brother Raca; and they are intolerant not merely or mainly who burn heretics, but who delight to maintain an unrighteous ascendancy (call it Protestant or call it Papist) over any class of their fellow men, and deny or grudge to the poor Samaritan called a Dissenter, the free participation of the quiet waters and green pastures of God’s Catholic bounty.

Let us ask, in conclusion, what are the signs of the times in respect of Protestantism? Are we advancing or are we retrograding? for the present paper is written to no purpose unless it lead to a serious asking, and a serious answering of this question. It appears a hard task to read the present times; for many strange beasts have appeared that are not only large in bulk, but also bellow, like bulls of Bashan, like the young lion rejoicing in his strength; and such things are apt to fill the minds of men with undue terrors. On the whole, we think we may say that genuine Protestantism is

* The title of Calvin’s famous book against Servetus is enough to show his sentiments,—“Defensio Orthodoxæ Fidei de Sanctâ Trinitate contra Errores Michaelis Serveti Hispani; ubi ostenditur Hæreticos jure gladii coerendos, et nominatim de hoc tam impio justo et merito sumptum Genevæ fuisse supplendum.” Stephan, 1554, 4to. Those who wish to see how much fire and brimstone a wrathful Protestant doctor can belch, may read Beza’s famous tract mentioned in the text. Such fools do the best men make of themselves when they get into a religious passion.

† “Self-contradiction is the only wrong.”—Wallenstein.

‡ Austria, one of the most despotic countries in Europe, had religious toleration nearly perfect, sixty years ago, thanks to Joseph; with us only since 1829. We are perfectly aware that recent proceedings in the Tyrol show that Metternich is not strong enough for the priests, and that it is not in Scotland only that clerical presumption, which is a thing overtopping Lucifer’s, may dare publicly to pluck the beard of the Statute-Book; but we are aware also that Protestant Prussia, in the exercise of that episcopate, which, as we have seen, the Confession of Faith commits to the civil magistrate, practises the same kind of persecution in Silesia; and we know, further, and see with sore eyes daily, that there is a large party in this country of frantic and venomous men, who deal wholesale in the vilest vituperation and calumny against their Christian brethren of the Romish persuasion, and who have not scrupled to bind with chains, and to load with heavy burdens the backs of a whole people, for no other alleged crime than what is rather a virtue, that they conscientiously adhere to the religion of the great majority of the Christian Church. But we are now, thank God, seeing the end of these things, in a manner; ecclesiastical bigotry is dead in the intelligence of the country; and the persecuting portion of the Anglican clergy are merely raising a sublime howl that, like famous people, they may die dramatically: Allons, Danton, point de faiblesse!

* See the eloquent speech of the Rev. W. L. Alexander at the dinner lately given in Edinburgh to Adam Black, Esq.

on the increase amongst us. The increase of knowledge and the spread of genuine education insures this, excepting always such artificial education as aristocratic young men receive at Oxford, which only confirms prejudices; but Oxonians are a small part of the British people. As for Puseyism, it is nothing new, and more a magnificent toy of the clergy than a god before which the sound sense of England will ever bend. The sacerdotal creature slept for a century, and now awakes; no man, at any time, had a right to say that the Anglican Church ever was a Protestant church; and no man has now any right to be surprised if it publicly declares itself a Popish Church. We ought rather to rejoice, that such as the Anglican Church is—a sacerdotal, and therefore an intolerant church—it now shows itself, and vaunts itself. There is honesty in this; and an honest devil is little dangerous; at least it was not this sort of a devil that tempted Eve in Paradise. But the Church of England; that is to say, the clergy and the clerical interests, are one thing; the English people are another, and a very different thing. Of these latter we think we may safely say, that their grand moral instincts, their habits, the whole stamp of their character and tone of their being, are, and will remain essentially Protestant. Looking to Scotland again, and the hills of our own Covenanters (God bless their bones!) if the clergy of that part of the Church which rejoices in the stamp of the magistrate, are honest in their professed desire to reinstate the body of the brethren into their original controlling functions, as members of the Church of Christ, which is as little sacerdotal as it is secular, we see in this non-intrusion movement a grand resurrection of genuine Protestant principles, for which God be praised! Pity only that they should have blundered in the means, fighting the cause of God with the weapons of the devil,—for that independence principle of theirs again, or claim of exemption from the laws of the land, is Popery worse than Hildebrand's,—a compound of impudence and folly truly deplorable. But they will get over this some way or other, by God's blessing, if they are honest; as the Apostle Paul was pardoned for worse sins, having committed them in ignorance. Let them have a care, however, what they do in other matters; especially in that affair of the Rev. Thomas Wright of Borthwick, who stands before them at present accused of HERESY. The public eye is upon them here; and if it turns out that this man, being a good Christian, and a philosophical thinker, and in both capacities an honour to any Christian church, is cast out of the communion of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland for small matters of real or imagined disagreement with the Westminster Confession; then there will remain no doubt whatever about a very lamentable matter, viz., that the indwelling Popery of Presbyterian Protestantism is yet very strong. It will be declared publicly before men, that there is no right of private judgment within the Church of Scotland, at least not to the clergy.* It will be declared that the ministers of the word are mere parrots and blind transmitters, upon whose creed you can count in all points as upon a calculating machine by Babbage; or it will be declared that the Church is founded on hypocrisy and humbug, and that a Presbyterian clergyman may think what he pleases on matters of faith within the range of the Bible, only let him not speak out. It will be declared that we are Papists, swearing, not by one, but by many Popes; that we hold the Bible as in itself worthless, only a sort of commentary on the shorter Catechism; and that, whereas the Papists worship an idol with a beast's head, our idol has the head of a man, but is an idol still. But there is faith to be put in the Church of Scotland, notwithstanding many offences. Hold on gallantly, tough old ship, for thou art dear to the gods! Hold on, not by the tithes only or mainly, (for therein thy life certainly consisteth not,) but by honourable principle, and by a good conscience! And if thou hast been playing fantastic tricks latterly, before high Heaven, beg God's forgiveness to day, if thou wilt, and be wise to-morrow, if thou canst.

* The Bishop of London, in fact, declared this some time ago in Parliament, with regard to the sacerdotal Church of England,—one of the strongest reasons why our Assembly, with regard to the democratic Church of Scotland, should declare the contrary.

THE DEPARTURE OF CHILDHOOD.

SONG TO A ROSE,

My beautiful rose! a song for thee
This shiny month of June:
Thy red buds brighten every tree,
And so my heart in tune
Would carol thy beauty, Star of the Wildwood,
Image and joy of careless childhood.

I strive to sing, but mine eyes grow dim;
I fray thy leaves away;
And the music sinks to a funeral hymn
For thy declining day.
How shall I sing thee, Star of the Wildwood,
Trembling and sad like advancing childhood

Slower the music and slacker the string,
Thy heart of hearts is torn;
And the delicate hues of thine innermost ring
Are stripped, and stained, and gone.
How shall I mourn thee, Star of the Wildwood,
Ravished away like the joys of childhood!

Silent the minstrel and broken the string;
Thy light is fled for ever.
Never more may the shower fresh fragrant bring,
But the spirit would break to say NEVER.
Sadly I weep thee, Star of the Wildwood,
Utterly lost like the joys of childhood,

FLOWERS OF HEMP; or, THE NEWGATE GARLAND.

BY BON GAULTIER.

I HAD finished my tenth tumbler,—it might be, my eleventh, though I rather think not; I should not, however, wish to be positive, as one is apt to be not over exact in his arithmetic upon these occasions,—the sugar had been dropped into the requisite quantity of Glenlivet, for what Sternhold and Hopkins call “another of the same,” and I was upon the point of giving the lemon a farewell squeeze, when my digits were arrested by a furious ring at the door-bell. “The devil!” I mentally ejaculated, to adopt the slang phrase of Bentley’s three-volume men, “who calls so loud and late? That dissipated dog, Jack Slammer, I suppose, reeling, in a state of transcendental mystification, from the Rainbow, and rampant for devilled kidneys and brandy-and-water: or Master Quick-fidget, bursting with some new theory of Greek metres, and come to drench me with anapaests, catalectic trimeters, dochmiacs, and Cretic endings. Arceades ambo, bores both! This,” I continued, pouring the steaming water from the capacious kettle into my tumbler, “This it is to be known for a home-keeping sober fellow! You are sure to have your peace invaded at the very time when you want to be left to tranquil meditation.” Here I cut short my “mental ejaculations,” and waited the entrance of my hand-maiden, whom I now heard clattering up the staircase, after opening the street-door.

She entered and handed to me a card, on which I read with considerable difficulty, owing to a weakness of the optic nerves, to which gentlemen of my habits are subject at an advanced hour in the evening, the name “MR. JOHN DALGLEISH, F.L.E., STEELE’S BATTERY.” The gentleman to whom the card belonged, she stated, was below, and wished particularly to see me. Now, who Mr. John Dalgleish was, or what peculiar attribute of his moral nature might be indicated by the hieroglyphical F.L.E. appended to his name, I was at loss to divine. Steele’s Battery! I had heard the name before, and it seemed to carry with it not the most fashionable reputation. Indeed, after refreshing my memory with a glass of my last brewage, I recollected that it was a venerable pile which frowned upon the Canongate, and which was celebrated in the municipal records as a favourite retreat of those ladies and gentlemen for whose especial superintendence society has been at the expense of providing an efficient constabulary force. I trembled for a new umbrella and cloak, which I knew were in the lobby down stairs; as it seemed more than probable that the owner of the card might by this time have put himself in *rappor*t with these articles during the servant’s absence, and have been suddenly called away without having an opportunity of destroying the magnetic relation. Such things had happened. It seemed, however, that I did him wrong; for upon desiring my Dinah to show the stranger up stairs,—not, however, till I had locked up certain little articles of silver plate which were upon the table,—I heard a heavy step upon the stair, and immediately after my visitor presented himself to my view.

If I were to say that his appearance was engaging, I doubt whether I could reconcile the statement with that regard to truth, which is the primary characteristic of a gentleman. His features were certainly not classical. They were neither Grecian nor Roman, but of a composite order peculiar to themselves. Were I to express myself in the lucid phraseology of the Coleridgean philosophy, I should say that “his facial structure was idiosyncratically homogeneous.” A low forehead, traversed by dusty furrows, shaggy eye-brows that beetled over a pair of eyes in which low cunning was the prominent expression; an expression which was agreeably set off by a squint, as if each optic were keeping up a perpetual espionage on the other, for fear its neighbour should play it a trick; a nose, to which some moving accident had given what heralds term “a bend sinister;” and a large sensual mouth, resting upon a jaw of corresponding character, were the beauties which suggested themselves upon a first introduction. His hair was in a state of nature, unpolluted by comb or brush; and, to judge by his complexion, soap was an article of commerce in which he had at no period of his life felt a peculiar interest. He had on, what, by a poetical license, might be called a white neck-cloth, which hung in limp and crumpled folds over a shirt, that at a remote epoch of its history may be presumed to have been white; while his lank ungainly figure was arrayed in a suit of faded black, which had obviously not been made for him, but appeared to be an ingenious selection from the wardrobes of three individuals of very various dimensions. All this a glance revealed to my admiring eyes, and perplexed me in a corresponding degree to account for the appearance of this extraordinary visitor. I had seen the face before, but where I knew not.

Mr. John Dalgleish introduced himself with an apology for the unseasonable hour which he had selected for his visit, stating, that from motives which I should respect and appreciate, did I know them, but which he should not trouble me with at present, he deemed it expedient not to mix too much with society by day-light. Unreasonable prejudices still darkened the intellects of the 19th century. Not that he cared for himself, not he! He might say, that, as a general principle, he didn’t give a — for the world; but to have been seen paying a gentleman of my respectability a forenoon visit, might have in some measure compromised his own as well as my reputation. oog

I professed my obligations, remarking, at the same time, that I should be glad to know the reason of my being favoured with a visit at all.

"Why, sir, that's just what I was coming to. All in good time! You, that are a scholar, and a member of the legal profession,

Fortia verbosi natus ad arma fori, as I may say, know that everything in the oratorical way has got three divisions,—beginning, middle, and end; and, of course, in addressing your honour on the present occasion, you can't expect me to come to the peroration, before I get my feet well into the exordium. But, ask pardon, sir; perhaps you'd order me up a drop o' summat. It has rained elderly females all the way along, and I'd like to be wet within as well as without, rather as not, just for uniformity's sake, if you've no objections."

A queer customer, and seems to have some fun in him. Sink your gentility, Bob my boy, and let him have a tumbler of your Glenlivet. Princes dine with beggars in the East; kings have messed with gaberlanxies,—love of liquor, according to Socrates, levels all distinctions. Muttering these and such like excuses, to reconcile myself to the semi-social hob and nobbery of such a raff, I provided him with a tumbler, and handed him "the materials." His dexterous infusion of these, and chuckles of anticipation, as he "kersened them with skreeching water," proclaimed his intimate practical acquaintance with the drinking usages of that part of Great Britain called Scotland.

"Ha, the real thing! The genuine peat-reek, et nullus error! Your health, sir, by your leave,—no offence, I hope?" he continued, seeing me draw myself up with a recoil from his offensive familiarity, with very much of a "Paws off, Pompey!" air. I reminded him that he had not yet explained why he had waited on me.

"Well, to come to the point, you see, sir, this is the way of it. Perhaps you may remember a youngster called Jack Fireblood, whom you were in the habit of associating with, some six years and a half ago, at Heidelberg?"

"Fireblood! Heidelberg! How the deuce do you come to know that I was ever at Heidelberg; and Fireblood,—what do you know of him?"

"Why, not much, certainly,—only this, that he died last Wednesday morning of a vegetable breakfast, that did not altogether agree with his digestive system."

"A vegetable breakfast! what do you mean?"

"Mean! well now, the like of that! And so you do not perceive, that this is what Dr. Lardner calls a delicate form of expression for 'a hearty choke with caper sauce.'"

"As we live we learn, sir; I am much beholden to you for the information," I replied, hardly able to repress my disgust at the brutal jocularity of the wretch.

"Don't mention it, I beg of you. But I think you said you knew Fireblood?"

"I certainly do remember a person of that name, whom I occasionally encountered in Heidelberg, at the roistering meetings of our fellow-students, where he always figured among the most uproarious,— drank the most beer, swore the deepest oaths, sang the noisiest songs, and fought the most duels. He was a thorough-paced renower, the terror of Philistines, the pride of raffish Burschen. A sad scamp! Know him, indeed? One does not soon forget those of his friends, who honour him by levying such liberal contributions on his purse, as he did on mine. The rascal, he walked off, too, at last, with some of my best books and manuscripts. There was a MS. of mine, I would not have given it for fifty pounds,—'Gedänke ueber Dieberey, sein Werden und Wesen.' 'The Art and Mystery of Conveyancing in all its departments, philosophically considered.' He robbed me of that; and Europe is to this day without a psychological analysis of the fundamental principles upon which the transmission of property by simple manual appropriation proceeds. If it is this Fireblood you mean, I certainly did know him."

"Sir, you have described the very man. 'I knew him, Horatio; a fellow of infinite jest!' The fact is, I had the honour of attending the gentleman in his last moments. I gave him my professional assistance; at the pressing solicitation of the judicial authorities—adjusted in fact the cravat he died in. These are trying moments, sir, to a man of benevolent sensibilities, but public duty——" His emotion and the conclusion of the sentence were swamped in a glass of toddy. "That fatal morning," he resumed, "he put a packet of papers into my hands, and urged, as the request of a dying man, that I should wait upon you and deliver them into your own hands. Tell him, said he, that I name him my literary executor. The nomination, he will say, for he is a scrupulous lawyer, is null as being merely nuncupative; but there is no one likely to question it in his case. Excellent Bob Short! He can appreciate the principles upon which my little works have been constructed. I have strack into a new path. A remorseless executive has thought fit to transport me beyond the seas of time, for slicing the waist of a paltry haberdasher, who chose to make a racket whilst I was illustrating practically my ideas upon the possession and use of property. But although my career of glory is thus stopped in transitu, as it was soaring towards its meridian, I have one comfort; for, as Lord Falkland says,

How many be there, when they die, die all!

I am not one of those!

No, my verses will live after me, and proclaim to the delighted world, that poetry and priggery are henceforth married in immortal union. I give Bob Short the preference as the medium of ushering my little poemettes to the world; because, of all my old chums, I borrowed most money from him, besides that I am indebted to an unpublished work of his, which I helped myself to the loan of, for what I may call a liberal education in the profession which I have lately pursued with credit, and, save in one instance, with success. He taught me 'the humanities' of my art. Give him these papers, and you may rest assured that he will requite you with—not less than half a sovereign."

With this Mr. John Dalgleish drew forth and handed to me a bundle of soiled and crumpled papers, which, upon glancing at them, I saw contained a quantity of verses of various kinds, interspersed with a few funereal fragments of my long-lost Treatise.

I made various inquiries at Fireblood's messenger regarding that gentleman's career; from which I learned, that after his expulsion from Heidelberg, he had returned to London, where he speedily got rid of the remnants of the small fortune which had been left him by an uncle. As, however, like the man in Farquhar's play, "he had been bred a gentleman, and had no estate, but must have his 'leman' and his bottle, through the prejudice of education," he had, in order to raise the supplies, betaken himself to such resources as a nimble wit presented to a not over-scrupulous conscience.

The dice was too much with him, late and soon,
Getting and spending he laid waste his time.

But having been detected in false play, he was kicked out of one hell after another, till, finding them all too hot to hold him, he had applied his energies to the noble science of bank robbery,—a severe pursuit, from which he unbended occasionally to a little light fancy work, in the way of simple burglarious entries. In one of these skirmishes, during a professional visit to Glasgow, he had been found upon the premises by the proprietor, a bull-headed haberdasher of the name of Hoskins, who had offered resistance of such a determined character, that Fireblood felt himself called upon to cut the carotid of the measurer of tapes with that unfortunate individual's own carving-knife. He was apprehended, tried, condemned, and hung. Thus, in the bloom of youth and blackguardism, perished Fireblood.

He was one
Of many thousand such, that die betimes,
Whose story is a fragment known to few.

As my uncouth visitor had now to all appearance brought his visit to what Milton calls "a full and perfect close," I took the earliest opportunity of placing in his itching palm the promised guerdon of half a sovereign, and marshalling him to the door; which I did in person, being by no means satisfied that his bump of acquisitiveness was so feebly developed as to reduce the probability of his not using his "pickers and stealers" to a moral certainty.

Returning to my room, which I found impregnated with the damp and musty atmosphere which Mr. John Dalgleish, F.L.E., habitually carried about with him, I seated myself to the perusal of the manuscripts of the umquihle Jack Fireblood. The first thing which caught my eye was a fly-leaf, obviously destined for the title-page, on which were inscribed these words,—

FLOWERS OF HEMP;

NEWGATE GARLAND.

BY ONE OF THE FAMILY.

Woods of glorious feature!—WORDSWORTH.

This was followed by a dedication, in these terms:—

TO THE AUTHORS

OF

Eugene Aram, Paul Clifford, Rookwood, Jack Sheppard, Oliver Twist, &c., whom the author has made it his study to emulate, in twining a few poetical garlands for that noble monument of learning and science which they have raised,

IN

MERRY ENGLAND.

On the back of a Sonnet, to "— Greenacre, Esquire, the unfortunate author of the Edgeware Road Tragedy," conceived in a spirit of glowing enthusiasm, tempered with the pathos of a sublime tenderness, were a few jottings apparently destined to have been wrought up into a preface.

"To rescue," said one of these passages, "to rescue from oblivion the martyrs of independence, to throw around the mighty names that flash upon us from the squalor of the Chronicles of Newgate the radiance of a storied imagination, to clothe the gibbet and the hulks in 'golden exhalations of the dawn,' and secure for the boozing ken and the gin palace that hold upon the general sympathies which has been too long monopolized by the cottage and the drawing-room, has been the aim and the achievement of many recent authors of distinction. How they have succeeded, let the populous state of the public jails attest. The office of 'dubsman' has ceased to be a sinecure, and the public and Mr. Joseph Hume have the satisfaction of knowing that these useful functionaries have now got something to do for their salaries. The number of their pupils has increased, is increasing, and is not likely to be diminished. But much remains to be done. Many an untenanted cell still echoes only to the sighs of its own loneliness. New jails are rising around us, which require to be filled. The Penitentiary presently erecting at Perth is of the most commodious description.

"In this state of things, I have bethought myself of throwing, in the words of Goethe, 'my corn into the great seed-field of time,' in hopes that it may blossom to purposes of great public utility. The aid of poetry has hitherto been but partially employed in the spread of a taste for Conveyancing, especially in its higher branches. Or where the muse has shown herself, it has been but in the evanescent glimpses of a song. She has plumed her wings for no sustained flight. * * *

"The power of poetry over the heart and impulses of man has been recognised by all writers, from Aristotle down to Serjeant Talfourd. In dexterous hands, it has been known to subvert a severe chastity by the insinuations of a holy flame to clothe impurity in vestments

Bright,
With something of an angel light;

to exalt spleen into elevation of soul, and selfishness into a noble scorn of the world; to confound the limits of right and wrong, and, with the lofty cadences of an enthusiastic style, to ennoble the vulgar and to sanctify the low. How much may be done, with an engine of such power, in increasing the numbers of 'The Family,'* may readily be conceived. The muse of Faking, fair daughter of the herald Mercury, claims her place among the 'Mystic Nine.' Her language, erewhile slumbering all amort in the pages of the flash dictionary, now lives upon the lips of all, even in the most fashionable circles. Ladies ask familiarly, in china-shops, for chamber utensils by the name of 'stone jugs,' and accost crossing-sweepers as 'dubs-men;' whist-players are generally spoken of, in gambling families, as 'dummy-hunters;' children, in their nursery sports, are accustomed to 'nix their dolls;' and the all but universal summons to exertion of every description is 'Fake away!'

"Words are things," says Appollonius of Tyanæ. We cannot be long familiar with a symbol, without becoming intimate with that which it expresses. Let the public mind, then, be in the habit of associating these and similar expressions with passages of poetical power,—let the ideas they import be imbedded in their hearts and glorified in their imaginations, and the fairest results may, with confidence, be anticipated."

I have not room to give further specimens of this Torso of a preface; but the reader must, by this time, have seen that it embodied principles of high import, in language of no ordinary power. Let us now turn to those productions with which the afflatus of the Muse of Faking had inspired the author. Take the following sonnet on Modern Degeneracy, which Mr. Fireblood had prefaced, by a note, to this effect:—

"The reader may possibly have heard a sonnet similar to this before. This the author cannot help. His originality is indisputable; but, however interesting the prosecution of such a theme might be, he would humbly suggest that it is not Words-worth."

Great men have been among us,—names that lend

A lustre to our calling; better none:

Maclaine, Duval, Dick Turpin, Barrington,
Blueskin, and others, who called Sheppard friend.

These were the lads could act and comprehend:

They knew how genuine darkies were put on;
Taught us how rightfully a cracksman shone
In splendour; what prigs were, who met their end
With airy exaltation. Now, 'tis strange,

We never see such souls as we had then:

Perpetual larcenies, and such small change!

No single scampman paramount, no code,

No master-spirit that will take the road,

But equal dearth of pluck and highwaymen!

Of a spirit akin to this, is the following invocation to the hero of "Rookwood."

Turpin! thou shouldst be living at this hour!

England hath need of thee: common and fen,

Hounslow and Bagshot, tavern, boozing ken,

The triple tree, and stone jug's lonely bower,

Have forfeited their ancient English dower

Of dashing Tobygloaks. We are sneaks, not men.

Oh! raise us up, return to us again,

And give us will to take a purse and power!

Thy soul from vulgar filchers dwelt apart:

Thou hadst a steed, whose hoofs devoured the lea;
Under the midnight heavens, majestic, free,
Thou tookst the air on the King's common way,
Whistling serenely, and, with regal art,
The lieges under tribute oft didst lay.

Crackskull Common, 1839.

Charles Lamb's "Essay on the Inconveniences of being Hanged" has, I suppose, satisfied the scruples of most people who might previously have entertained any doubts upon the subject; and although a sonnet of Fireblood's, On the Advantages of Vertebral Suspension, puts the question in a new light, giving it something of an elevated turn, yet as, while it might have made people suspend their judgments, it is not quite so clear that it would have made them suspend themselves, I shall suppress it as superfluous. But the splendour which the laureate of Tobygloaks has given to "The Last Day of a Condemned," in the following poem, will demonstrate with what power of language he could dignify a situation which is not generally considered the most ennobling. It carries us back to the days when a lady of irreproachable purity and refined education, the accomplished daughter of the venerable Peachum, painted the closing pageant of her lover's career in these glowing terms:—

"Methinks I see him already in the cart, sweeter and more lovely than the nosegay in his hand! I hear the crowd extolling his resolution and intrepidity! What volleys of sighs are sent from the windows of Holborn, that so comely a youth should be brought to disgrace! I see him at the tree!—the whole circle are in tears!—even butchers weep!"

How poor a thing to this is a modern ex—
I cannot write the hateful word. A drizzly morning, the Under-Sheriff, and the Patent Drop. What a contrast to the pomp and circumstance that attended on

THE DEATH OF DUVAL.

A living sea of eager human faces,

A thousand bosoms, throbbing all as one,

Walls, windows, balconies, all sorts of places,

Holding their crowds of gazers to the sun:

Through the hush'd groups low buzzing murmurs run,

And on the air, with still returning swell,

Comes the dull swinging boom of old Sepulchre's bell.

Oh, joy in London now! In festive measure

Be spent the evening of this festive day!

For thee is ripening now a high-strung pleasure;

Now, even now, in yonder press-yard, they Strike from his limbs the fetters loose away!

A little while, and he, the brave Duval,

Will issue forth, serene, to glad and greet you all.

"Why comes he not, say, wherefore doth he tarry?"

Starts the inquiry forth from every tongue.

"Surely," they cry, "that tedious Ordinary

His tedious palms must long ere this have sung,

Tedious to him that's waiting to be hung!"

But, hark! old Newgate's doors fly wide apart,

"He comes, he comes!" A thrill shoots through each gazer's heart.

Joined in the stunning cry ten thousand voices,

All Smithfield answered to the loud acclaim.

"He comes, he comes!" and every breast rejoices,

As down Snowhill the shout tumultuous came,

Bearing to Holborn's crowds the welcome fame.

"He comes, he comes!" and each holds back his breath;
Some ribs are broke, and some few scores are crushed to death.

* The generic name for thieves, pickpockets, gamblers, housebreakers, & hoc genus omne.

With step majestic to the cart advances
 The dauntless Claude, and springs into his seat.
 He feels that on him now are fixed the glances
 Of many a Briton bold and maiden sweet,
 Whose hearts responsive to his glories beat.
 In him the honour of "The Road" is centred,
 And all the hero's fire into his bosom entered.
 His was the transport, his the exultation
 Of Rome's great generals, when, from afar,
 Up to the capitol, in the Ovation,
 They bore with them, in the triumphal car,*
 Rich gold and gems, the spoils of foreign war.
To triumph! They forgot their clay.
 E'en so Duval, who rode in glory on his way.
 His laced cravat, his kids of purest yellow,
 The many-tinted nosegay in his hand,
 His large black eyes, so fiery, yet so mellow,
 Like the old vintages of Spanish land;
 Locks clustering o'er a brow of high command,
 Subdue all hearts, and as, up Holborn's steep,
 Tolls the slow car of death, e'en cruel butchers weep.
 He saw it, but he heeded not; his story,
 He knew, was graven on the page of Time.
 Tyburn to him was as the field of glory,
 Where he must stoop to death his head sublime,
 Hymn'd in full many an elegiac rhyme.
 He left his deeds behind him, and his name,
 For he, like Cæsar, had lived long enough for fame.
 He quailed not, save when, as he raised the chalice,
 St. Giles's bowl, filled with the mildest ale,
 To pledge the crowd, on one—his beauteous Alice—
 His eye alighted, and his cheek grew pale:
 She, whose sweet breath was like the spicy gale,
 She whom he fondly deemed his own dear girl,
 Stood with a tall dragon, drinking long draughts of purrl.
 He bit his lip—it quivered but a moment—
 Then passed his hand across his flushing brows.
 He could have spared so forcible a comment
 Upon the constancy of woman's vows,
 And the strange whims that in her bosom house;
 But in the bowl he drowned the stinging pain,
 And on his pilgrimage went calmly forth again.
 A princely group of England's noble daughters
 Stood in a balcony, suffused with grief,
 Breathing rich fragrance round them—of strong waters,
 And waving many a snowy handkerchief,
 As passed the prince of highwaymen and thief.
 His soul was touched with a seraphic gleam:
 That woman could be false was but a mocking dream!
 And now, his bright career of triumph ended,
 His chariot stood beneath the triple tree.
 The law's grim finisher to its boughs ascended,
 And fixed the hempen bandages, while he
 Bowed to the throng, then bade the car go free.
 The car rolled on, and left him dangling there,
 Like famed Mohammed's tomb, uphung midway in air.
 As droops the cup of the surcharged lily,
 Beneath the surly buffets of the storm,
 Or the soft petals of the daffodilly,
 When Sirius is uncomfortably warm,
 So droop'd his head upon his manly form,
 While floated in the breeze his tresses brown.
 He hung the stated time, and then they cut him down.
 With soft and tender care the trainbands bore him,
 Just as they found him, nightcap, rope, and all,

* Mr. Fireblood stumbles a little in his classicality here, as the triumphal car was not used in the ovation, which was a very subordinate affair to the triumph; the victor either making his peregrinations to the capitol on foot or horseback, crowned with a plain wreath of "the soft myrtle," instead of the regal laurel. Dio. lib. viii. Pim. xv. 29, § 38. Livy, passim. Probably Fireblood knew this, but had a reason for the inaccuracy in his rhyme.

And placed this neat, though plain inscription o'er him,
 Among the otomies in Surgeons' Hall,
 "THESE ARE THE BONES OF THE RENOWNED DUVAL!"
 There still they tell us, from their glassy case,
 He was the last, the best, of all that noble race.

The perusal of a poem like this is admirably fitted to produce the results contemplated by the author, in his prefatory notices already quoted. It gives the "Harmanbeck" such a lofty and agreeable aspect,

That kings by such a death might wish to die;
 and restless and ambitious spirits have the strongest inducements held out to them to struggle for this glorious consummation.

Fireblood has, I suspect, been stealing from the immortal interview between Jonathan Wild and the ordinary, in the incidents of the following lyric. But for larcenies like this he cannot be blamed. "'Tis my vocation, Hal!" Besides, as "one touch of nature makes the whole world" of thieves "kin," such occurrences as "faking the parson's cly," in the condemned cell, must be frequent; and Fireblood may plead with Puff, that "all that can be said is, that two people happened to hit on the same thought, and Fielding made the first use of it; that's all." Ordinaries, it is to be hoped, take extra-ordinary care of their pockets when they come to

THE CONFESSION.

"Oh, speak not thus!" the felon cried,
 As, turning in his narrow cell,
 He nudged the parson by his side,
 And prigg'd the watch he loved so well.

"Oh, speak not of temptation so,
 Or of the flowery paths of sin,
 For wretchedness is all I owe
 To faking, father, and to gin.

"A bird's-eye fogle hath no charms,
 When ta'en by subtle theft, I ween;
 And, even in my blownen arms,
 I've dreamt of what I once have been.

"I never dipped into a cly,
 Nor cleared a fancy flashman's fob,
 But in my uncle's sober eye,
 The swag appeared not worth a bob.

"I never took a tlicker yet,
 However beautiful its make,
 But was, when brought to the reset,
 A pinchbeck mean, and no mistake.

"Oft have I shed the bitter tear,
 And pondered o'er my wicked ways;
 For, holy father, much I fear
 My lot has fallen on evil days.

"It was not so when Turpin rode Sole monarch of the heath and hill;
 Not so when Sheppard roamed abroad,
 And sacked the snoring merchant's till;

"Not so when Barrington the just Shared lordly ransom with his pal;
 Not so when that time-honoured dust
 Beneath the gibbet was Duval!

"They sleep in honour's laurelled bed,
 And good men drop the tear for them;
 But no such tribute will be shed
 Upon the grave of Shirking Jem!"

[Here the Air, which has hitherto been one of the Hebrew Melodies, changes to "O'Connor's Child."]

"I lay within my lofty room,
It was the highest in the alley;
And by my side, in beauty's bloom,
Reposed my witching, smitching Sally.

"The night was dark, the rain came down,
It trickled through the crazy garret;
It fell upon my tresses brown,
And damped my blowen's locks of carrot.

"I heard a footstep's heavy tread
Upon the stair at dawn so early;
'Oh, do not wake, my love!' she said,
'Tis but the bawling of the Charley.'

"She clasped me in her ivory arms,
I felt her bosom throbbing quicker,
And yielded to her glowing charms,
'Cos I was summat gone in liquor.

"The beaks rushed in with eager yell,
And by the naked arms they grabbed me;
Oh, wasn't that a horrid sell!
No rescue near! and so they nabbed me.

"I turned to take a last farewell,
I would have clasped my Sal, and kissed her,
When, 'Now,' she cried, 'you've cotched the swell,
So fork me out the rhino, mister!'"

Allegro.

"More brandy, old codger, I don't care a —,
In a week it will all be the same;
I'll go to the crap, like a trump as I am,
And die, like my forefathers, game!

"Your preachings and psalms I don't value a rush;
D'ye think I will snivel or sob?
So, if you won't order no more of this lush,
You may take yourself off, you old Snob!"

The good man in horror retired from the cell,
And left the lost wretch to debauch;
But little he thought, as he took his farewell,
That his fogle had followed his watch.

The reader must feel the graphic beauty of this picture of the inflections of a felon's mind, under very painful circumstances, the more valuable as sketched by "one of themselves." Nor can the beauty of the metrical arrangements have escaped his notice, corresponding as they do to the shifting impulses of his agitated spirit, where light alternates with shadow, repentance with obdurate habit, and incarnate sensuality with incipient devotion.

In the same masterly style Fireblood has drawn the picture of one of a class of females, whom the French, for some reason or other, call "Femmes sans nom." He has given, in a triad of verses, a sort of Progress of

THE NUTTY BLOWEN.

AIR—She wore a Wreath of Roses.

She wore a rouge like roses, the night when first we met,
Her lovely mug was smiling o'er mugs of heavy wet;
Her red lips had the fullness, her voice the husky tone,
That told her drink was of a kind where water is unknown.
I saw her but a moment, yet methinks I see her now,
With the bloom of borrowed flowers upon her cheek and brow.

A pair of iron darbies, when next we met, she wore,
The expression of her features was more thoughtful than before;

And, standing by her side, was one, who strove, with might and main,
To soothe her leaving that dear land she ne'er might see again.

I saw her but a moment, yet methinks I see her now,
As she dropped the judge a curtsy, and he made her a bow.

And once again I see that brow, no idle rouge i thère,
The dubsman's ruthless hand has cropped her once luxuriant hair,
She teases hemp in solitude, and there is no one near,
To press her hand within his own, and call for ginger beer.

I saw her but a moment, yet methinks I see her now,
With the card and heckle in her hand a-teasing of that tow.

Coldbath Fields.

This is deeply touching—a condensed epic of the lives of an interesting class of females—interesting as being "unfortunate," the victims of a too ardent sensibility—the Poll Maggots and Edgeworth Besses of the Quadrant and the Strand. To some tastes, however, the metaphysico-poetical cast of the following Dithyrambic may be more acceptable. I can vouch for the authenticity of the occurrence which gave birth to it, having been myself smitten, the other day, with uncontrollable laughter, as I was sauntering up the High Street of Edinburgh,

ON HEARING "NIX MY DOLLY PALS, FAKE AWAY!"
PLAYED BY THE BELLS OF ST. GILES'S CATHEDRAL, 14TH MAY, 1840.

Those joyful sounds! As each gay accent meets
My ear, I feel I am a child once more,
Playing, with face unwashed, about the streets,
At knuckledown, or top, or alley tor;
A chubby child, so gleesome in its play,
Still singing "Nix my doll!" still singing "Fake away!"

The sunny hours of childhood, light as dreams,
That float on love-straught maidens' rosy lids,
Hours winged with sugar-plums, and golden gleams
Of cakes and gingerbread for gladsome "kida."
No care, no nothing, clouds the smiling day,
But all is "Nix my doll!" all, all is "Fake away!"

Mysterious exclamations, that express
That quenchless force of spirit, which can rise
Through dangers, desolation, dearth, distress,
And face the gibbet's self with daring eyes;
The more than sage's calm, that 'midst the bray
Of crashing worlds serenely "Fakes away."

Lightly ye came upon my infant years
One night when, mingling with some other raff,
I had invested at The Fife and Shears,
Three halfpence on a pint of half-and-half:
'Twas then I heard you first; but, from that day,
It passed not from my soul, that glorious "Fake away!"

I grew apace, and with my years there grew
The love of liberty, the taste refined,
For catching winged pleasures as they flew,
Without the toils of an o'erburdened mind.
The world was one vast pocket, tempting prey:
My forks were light and fly, and lightly "Faked away."

Freely I lived on love, and gin, and swipes:
My togs were rigged in very spiey style;
No fob could stay my penetrating snipes;
The prince of butzgloaks I, the knowing file!
Fawnies, or fogles, tickers, onions gay,
All were the same to me—at all I "Faked away."

I read of Sheppard, Jack, the marvellous boy,
The Dubsman's foe that perished in his pride;
And him that eret, in glory and in joy,
On coal-black Bess o'er Hounslow wont to ride.
I burned to start on the High Toby lay:
"Nix, nix, my pals!" I cried; "Nix, nix!" and "Faked away."

Who would not law's unnatural bonds escape,
To scour the breezy common uncontrolled;
To take the air, with veil of murky crape,
Secured from recognition and the cold!
With joy, almost like pain, your pulses play;
You whistle "Nix my doll," and whistling, "Fake away!"

And should some meagre money-getting drudge
Come riding by, to strike his soul with awe,
And, if he quits his shiners with a grudge,
To teach that MIGHT IS RIGHT—primeval law;
Noble vocation! High at once and gay!
Who would not "Nix his doll!" who would not "Fake away!"

I find I grow Pindaric, and my verse
Expanding to a biographic sketch;
But that I leave some other to rehearse—
Some sympathetic literary Ketch.
'Tis now my hint to chant that witching lay,
That mystic "Nix my doll," that wondrous "Fake away!"

All hearts, all voices, own its thrilling power,
Rapt as were those in old Abdera, when Her moon-struck citizens sang, hour on hour,
"O Cupid, Cupid, prince of gods and men!"
By day, by night, in every public way,
Men mutter "Nix my doll!" men carol "Fake away!"

The infant, mumbling sticks of lollypop;
The child, careering in its kindred mud;
The smart handmaiden, with her pail and mop;
The spark curvetting on his bit of blood;
The foreign counts who on street-organs play;—
All dote on "Nix my doll," rejoice in "Fake away!"

The butcher whistles as he poets along;
The baker's boy has music in his soul;
The dummyhunter chants his favourite song;
And cads and cabmen cadences can troll;
Peers, prigs, and princesses approve the lay:
And still 'tis "Nix my doll!" and still 'tis "Fake away!"

Time was, all raved of far Kentucky's son—
The whirling Derveesh, gyrating Jim Crow—
And thousands chanted, singing every one,
That willows green all round their hats did grow:
That time is passed, and now, with peerless sway,
Rules the bright star of him who first bade "Fake away!"

Cathedral steeples, pointing to the skies,
Shake their old sides to the prevailing mirth,
And bear aloft the strains that daily rise
From the full bosom of the joy-struck earth.
No more cold, penitential hymns they play,
But spire to steeple winks, and chuckles "Fake away!"

Hail to the fairest omen man e'er saw,
Bright harbinger of that still brighter spring,
Shall chase the wintry reign of virtue, law,
Honour, decorum, and that sort of thing!
When at its own sweet will mankind shall stray,
And all be endless bliss, perennial "Fake away!"

There are few who have not, within the last few months, either asked, or been asked the meaning of that mysterious adjuration, "Nix my dolly pals, fake away!" or who ever got or gave a satisfactory answer to the inquiry. It has been the inexplicable Abracadabra of "the mumping crew," understood only by the illuminati—a worse than Babylonian hieroglyph to the mass of society. But here we have the philosophy of the phrase expounded, its esoteric principle laid bare to "the light of common day;" nor, if we are to credit the statements of the metaphysical Fireblood, did any of the Golden Sentences of Pythagoras produce stronger or more direct effects in the formation of character or direction of conduct. His draughts of mental vigour upon the respectable banking firm of Nicks, Medoll, Palls, Fakaway, & Co., were sure to be honoured on all occasions. From them he dates that devil-may-carism, that recklessness of the world and the world's law, which is the triumph of philosophy, that free fearless spirit which bated not one jot of heart or hope in all his critical career. This happy feeling of Poccouranteism irradiates all his verses. They have the free respiration of the breezes of Blackheath and Hampstead. The only instance where this airy hopefulness seems to have forsaken him was in contemplating the works of an artisan, who may be said to be the great antagonist of Fireblood's craft, the celebrated Chubb. In justice to an amiable man and accomplished artist, I give the following sonnet, the structure of which the poetical reader will see has been feebly imitated by Shelley in his "Ozymandias":—

I met a cracksmen coming down the Strand,
Who said, "A huge cathedral, piled of stone,
Stands in a churchyard, near Martin-le-Grand,
Where keeps St. Paul his sacerdotal throne.
A street runs by it on the northward. There,
For cab and 'bus, is writ 'No Thoroughfare':
The mayor and councilmen do so command;
And in that street a shop, with many a box,
Upon whose sign these fateful words I scanned:—
'My name is Chubb, that makes the Patent Locks;
Look on my works, ye burglars, and despair.'
Here made he pause, like one who sees a blight
Crush all his hopes, and sighed, with drooping air,
"Our game is up, my covey, blow me tight!"

Nothing is more dispiriting than the melancholy of a naturally mirthful man, such as Fireblood was; and the reader will not be sorry, therefore, to turn from the affecting pathos of these lines to the following song, which is in the proper Mercurial vein:—

THE FAKER'S NEW TOAST.

BY NIMMING NED.

Come, all ye jolly covies, vot faking do admire,
And pledge them British authors who to our line aspire;
Who, if they vere not gemmen born, like us had kicked at trade,
And every von had turned him out a genuine fancy blade,
And a trump.

'Tis them's the boys as knows the world, 'tis them as knows mankind,
And vould have picked his pocket too, if Fortune (vot is blind,)
Had not, to spite their genius, stuck them in a false position,
Vere they can only write about, not execute their mission,
Like a trump.

If they goes on as they've begun, things soon vill come about,
And ve shall be the upper class, and turn the others out;
Their laws ve'll execute ourselves, and raise their delectation;
That's tit for tat, for they'd make that the only recreation
Of a trump.

But ketch us! Only wait a bit, and ve shall be their betterers;
For vich our varnest thanks is due unto the men of letters,
Who, good uns all, have showed us up in our own proper light,
And proved ve prigs for glory, and all becos it's right
In a trump.

'Tis ve as sets the fashion now: Jack Sheppard is the go,
And every word of "Nix my dolls" the finest ladies know;

And ven a man his fortin 'd make, vy, vot d'ye think 's his vay !—
He does vot ve vere used to do—he goes to Botany Bay,
Like a trump.

Then fill your glasses, dolly pals, vy should they be neglected,
As does their best to helewate the line as ve 's selected !
To them as makes the cracksman's life the subject of their story,—
To Ainsworth, and to Bullvig, and to Reynolds be the glory, Jolly trumps !

Sung with the proper accompaniments—the intelligent reader will perceive what I mean—this spirited ballad could not fail of being effective ; and should any enterprising composer think of setting it to music, for sale among the flash circles, I have no doubt Mr. Tait will transact with him for the copyright upon the most liberal terms.

The following lyric, in the style of Dr. Watts, might be introduced with great propriety into the next edition of the well-known popular work, "Hanging made Easy ; or, The Child's Handbook to the Gallows." The person must be dead to all the domestic affections, to all the best sympathies of our somewhat imperfect nature, who can read without emotion these lines to

MY MOTHER.

Who, when a baby, lank and thin,
I called for pap and made a din,
Lulled me with draughts of British gin !—
My mother.

When I've been out upon the spree,
And not come home till two or three,
Who was it then would wallop me !—
My mother.

Who, when she met a heavy swell,
Would ease him of his wive so well,
And kiss me not to go and tell !—
My mother.

Who took me from my infant play,
And taught me how to fake away,
And put me up to the time of day !—
My mother.

Who'd watch me sleeping in my chair,
And silly to my fob repair,
And leave me not a mopus there !—
My mother.

Who, as beneath her care I grew,
Taught my young mind a thing or two,
Especially the flats to do !—
My mother.

I'm bless'd if ever I did see,
So regular a trump as she :
I owe my virtues all to thee,—
My mother !

So hand, my pals, the drink about :
My story and my glass are out.
A bumper, boys, and with me shout—
My mother !

Gladly would I have lingered among these blossomings of the hempen muse ; but I fear their fragrance, like that of highly-spiced dishes to a squeamish stomach, may be too powerful for the sensitive reader, who may not have completed the curriculum of his studies in the thieves' literature. I must, therefore, draw my selections into a noose ; nor can I more fitly close the series than with Fireblood's penultimate lucubrations in

THE CONDEMNED CELL.

Deep in the purlieus of remote Saint Giles,
A kid forlorn of sorrow and of sin,
My eyes first opened on a mother's smiles,
First from her lips inhaled our native gin ;
And still to still my infant feeble moans,
She carolled in my ears a gentle lay :
Methinks even now I hear the thrilling tones,
That murmured, "Nix, my doll pals, fake away !"

My lady mother—who my father was
She never told me, for—she never knew—
At the suggestion of her country's laws,
To Sydney's distant Cove one morn withdrew.
In that dark hour, a child of not quite six,
Thrown like a weed on life's rude shore away,
On one consoling thought I tried to fix,
It was, to "Nix my doll, and fake away !"

The world was all before me, free to choose.
A noble resolution fired my soul ;
And from that hour I shook my spirit loose
From the base fetters of the law's control.
Into the pockets of my fellow-men
My digits all unconsciously would stray ;
I thought of my old lullaby, and then
Snatched the contents, and deftly "Faked away !"

Oh, the strong joy, the bliss beyond compare,
Of him who skilfully has faked a cly,
And left his spoil beneath the tender care
Of a fond uncle for a time to lie !
Fearless he meets the eye of the police,
That watch his nimble movements day by day ;
He heeds not these disturbers of his peace,
But whistles "Nix, my doll pals, fake away !"

A merry time it was, how swift it flew !
The time when I was studying for the bar ;
All branches of conveyancing I knew,
Than all the legal pundits better far.
And, when the business of the day was o'er,
My head in Sal or Susan's lap I'd lay,
And down my fevered throat cool bumpers pour,
Still singing, "Nix, my doll pals, fake away !"

Those gentle girls ! Susan, so full of sport,
A full-blown Hebe ! Sal, so lively too ;
Only her temper, like her nose, was short,
And sometimes turned my eyes from black to blue.
Oh, they were beautiful ! Their bosoms—no !
I dare not all their blushing charms portray.
Ah, false ones, was it kind to use me so !
No matter !—"Nix, my doll pals, fake away !"

That fatal night ! O Hoskins, hadst thou slept,
I should not have been ruminating here,
Nor had thy young and buxom widow wept
Thy weasand slivered with a Courvoisier !
But if a man will start, and make a brawl,
There's but one course his clamour to allay,
You must not mince the matter then at all,
But cut his throat at once and "Fake away."

To this high creed have I a martyr been.
Ha, midnight ! It is time, methinks, to stop.
At eight I quit this sublunary scene,
Making my exit through the patent drop.
They'll find me game, as pheasants, at the last.
They give us brandy, then, I have heard them say.
I wonder, will they ! Psha ! 'twill soon be past ;—
Huzzah, then, "Nix, my doll pals, fake away !"

* The old complaint, from the days of Catiline downwards, never better exemplified than in an affecting incident in the Beggar's Opera :—

JENNY DIVER.—I must and will have a kiss to give my wine a zest. [Takes MACHEATH about the neck, and makes signs to PRACHUM and Constables, who rush in upon him.]

MACHEATH.—Was this well done, Jenny ? Women are decoy ducks ; who can trust them ? Beasts, jades, &c. &c.

† The fashionable name for a carving knife.

There is something inexpressibly touching in the dignified serenity which pervades these lines. Socrates himself did not contemplate his "jump from this bank and shoal of time into the life to come," with a calmer eye than does Fireblood. His retrospect of life is tranquil and unclouded as a summer sunset. It has been to him a scene of much exquisite enjoyment and intellectual triumph; his exploits in thievery and love fall like dew upon his soul, and he dies for the great final principle of gentlemen cut-throats (that "DEAD MEN TELL NO TALES") without the quiver of a muscle. At the very foot of the "scragging post," he fakes away.

I had imagined this was the latest record of my old fellow-student's sentiments, and was about to throw down the MS. in a fit of pensive sadness, when on the back of the poem I observed the following "More Last Words," with this mark, "Condemned Cell, ½ past 7, A. M." He met with his accident at eight.

THE FAKING BOY.

AIR—The Minstrel Boy.

The faking boy to the crap is gone,
At the nubbling chit you'll find him;
The hempen cord they have girded on,
And his elbows pinned behind him.
"Smash my glim!" cries the reg'lar card,
"Though the girl you love betrays you,
Don't split, but die both game and hard,
And grateful pals shall praise you!"
The bolt it fell—a jerk, a strain!
The sheriffs fled asunder;
The faking boy ne'er spoke again,
For they pulled his legs from under.
And there he dangles on the tree,
That soul of love and bravery!
Oh, that such men should victims be
Of law, and law's vile knavery!

With this passionate aspiration, I close my selections. When such men as Fireblood perish thus, who can resist exclaiming, in the words of Lamennais, (Livre du Peuple) "Toutes choses ne sont pas en ce monde comme elles devraient être!"

I might have remained to this hour in ignorance of the professional avocations of Mr. John Dalgleish, to whom, as the reader is aware, I was indebted for these disjecta membra poetæ, as well as of the meaning of the letters which followed his name, but for an accidental visit of my young friend, Hugh K. Walker, the other forenoon. Happening to lift Mr. Dalgleish's card, which, with a multitude of others, was littering the mantle-piece of my study, he asked me with a voice of some surprise, how I came to be possessed of this bit of pasteboard. I explained.

"And you really allowed the fellow to toss off a tumbler of punch in your most sweet society," he exclaimed, laughing in a manner so violent and spasmodic, that I anticipated his winding up his guffaw with a fit of apoplexy.

"Yes," I replied, "I did. But who the deuce is he?"

"Why, don't you know John Dalgleish?—He is—he is—brace your nerves, my boy!"

"Psha! out with it at once, who is he?"

"Why, he is the Hangman; and 'F.L.E.' is, I presume, the hieroglyph for 'Finisher of the Law, Edinburgh.'"

I now remembered where I had seen the gentleman's face before. The reader may guess where, when I state that I am—an amateur of executions.

EDINBURGH,
St. Nicholas' Eve, 1841.

A VISIT TO THE MONASTERY OF LA TRAPPE, IN 1839.

(Concluded from our March No.)

SUCH is the history of the monks of La Trappe du Perche. Since their return from Switzerland, they have been permitted to exist unmolested; and, availing themselves of this privilege, they have not been unmindful to improve the occasion by assiduously working at the restoration of their buildings, and in subduing the stubborn soil which surrounds them. Much, however, still remains to bring back the monastery to its former beauty; but the fraternity, consisting now of about sixty-five members, are too poor to proceed rapidly in effecting the designs, which will, doubtlessly, be ultimately accomplished. A great portion of the forest immediately surrounding the building has been cleared, by the industry of the brotherhood; and the soil, which is here naturally sterile, presents now the appearance of a well managed farm. The operation of tilling is accomplished by spade labour; and surely nothing can equal the beauty and carefulness which the long furrowed level here and there presents. A short road, about half a mile in length, has also been cut from the monastery gate to an outhouse, belonging to the establishment, and planted on each side with a neat quick-set hedge.

The ponds, likewise, which formerly occasioned so many malarious diseases in this locality, have been drained; and their sites are now covered with rich pasturage. The orchards boast the choicest fruit-trees. Even the surrounding woods manifest not only the industry but the good taste of the inhabitants of the valley. Long vistas, terminating or concentrating in spherical glades, afford picturesque and refreshing walks to the stranger, who may be visiting the monastery, and to whom the many names of females, such as Clarissa, Victorine, &c., carved here and there upon the trees, may furnish subjects for surmise.

These woods were the favourite resort of the renowned funeral orator, Bossuet, from whom a small circular glade is still called "Bossuet's Walk." The famous Duc de Saint Simon, likewise, who made frequent visits to the monastery, James II. of England, and his anti-type Charles X. of France, availed themselves of the delightful seclusion which the leafy avenues of the forest affords, during their temporary sojourn amongst the brotherhood.

The area, enclosed by the monastery walls, forms a perfect square, and is entered beneath a gr gate, over which is placed an image of the Virgin, with an inscription beneath, Refugia Peccatorum, (a refuge for sins;) and also on the architrave of the gate is the inscription, Domus Dei: beati qui habitant in ea (The house of God: happy are they who dwell in it.) The hôtellerie, where visitors are lodged, forms the right-hand side of the outer court-yard on entering; and on this side there is also a small chapel for the use of females, who may desire to attend mass, but who are on no account allowed to pass beyond the inner gates of the monastery. On the left side are the hospital, the kitchen to the visitors' refectory, the bookbinding and weaving rooms, and many other workshops belonging to the fraternity. Within the inner gates are stables and granaries, situated in a kind of farm-yard, beyond which, at the extremity of a large garden, are the mansion, the church, and a water-mill, fitted up with superior machinery to prepare the flour of the establishment. The church, the spire of which forms a picturesque object from every part of the valley, attracts admiration by the simplicity and novelty of its architecture. It resembles, as near as possible, the old church, and shows, in the form of its roof, the resemblance of a ship's hull reversed, to commemorate the circumstance which occasioned the erection of the original structure. The interior is lighted by arched windows, placed near the ceiling, and is divided by a kind of screen into two parts, which are respectively occupied, during the hours of service, by the two classes of brothers,—the frères de chœur occupying the division which contains the great altar, and the frères convers the other hindmost division. The interior is destitute of ornament, save a figure of the Virgin in a niche behind the high altar, and three large rosettes, which are placed in a line along the middle of the ceiling. Besides the grand altar in the choir, there are two smaller altars in the division, which is set apart for the frères convers. There are also four small chapels annexed to the church, where masses are daily said by each of the brothers, who has been ordained as a priest. Gold, silver (except for the sacred vessels,) marble, and silk, are prohibited by the rules; but the vestments of the priests, and the drapery used in performing the necessary rites, are made of wool or cotton, trimmed sparingly with silk galloon. The rule also forbids the use of an organ, or any other kind of instrumental music; so that the soul-stealing strains, which are generally a feature in the service of the Romish church, and the deep-drawn notes with which the pealing organ adds a solemnity to the various ceremonies, are never heard beneath the roof of the humble chapel of La Trappe. The recitation of the prayers, however, cannot but be in some degree imposing, as the gruff voices of the monks are, in every respect, suited to this performance; but in singing their daily laudations, or canticles, the melody of the choir is illustrative of all that can be conjured up to interpret the word discord, and in nowise betokens the otherwise general harmony in which the brotherhood exists. The far-famed hymn to the Virgin, commencing Salve Regina, &c., which is sung every evening by the whole body of the community, although a composition of great beauty, is nevertheless so mutilated by the reverend choristers, that he who hears it for the first time at La Trappe will not be inclined to form any very favourable opinion of the composer's ability. If alternate cadences of screech and growl are preferable to the—the choir of La Trappe stands unrivalled as a college of melodists; but to those who have not this refinement, but prefer—the Trappist band will be found inefficient to administer to their faculty of tune.

The mansion, raised from the debris of the former building, has not anything of that peculiar sombreness, or character of architecture, which renders a locality interesting to the antiquary. The exterior, when viewed from the entrance, presents the appearance of a respectable farmhouse; and furnishes a very incorrect idea of the size and arrangement of the interior. Upon the walls of the corridors, and of the apartments, are inscribed passages of scripture, from the Latin texts applicable to the peculiar tenets of the establishment. Formerly each brother had his separate cell for sleeping; but since the return from Switzerland, a large dormitory has been constructed, wherein all the members of the fraternity repose at night. The arrangement for sleeping consists of a wooden gallery, occupying nearly the whole area of the apartment, so as to leave only a small passage for the admission of light, and the convenience of passing to and fro. This gallery is partitioned into a number of small avenues; each containing a truckle bed with a straw mattress, and furnished with a small black crucifix with a leaden figure of our Saviour; an engraving from Raphael's picture of the Virgin and Child; and a short prayer in French, pasted on the partition at the side of the bed. Each compartment is distinguished by the name of its occupier placed over the entrance; and is furnished with a curtain, which is looped up throughout the day, in order that the chamber may be freely aired, and scrupulously lowered every evening when retiring to rest. The only words which are at any time permitted to be uttered in the dormitory, are those of the penitential psalm called "The Miserere," which is recited every Friday morning by all "the religious," standing at the entrances of their respective sleeping compartments, with their shoulders bare, and repeating, after the abbot—who, on all occasions, acts as fugleman—in mournful recitative, accompanied by the necessary flagellation, which each is enforced to administer to himself, with a small whip formed of three knotted thongs of whipcord. The hôteleur, Père Basile, from whose information the several regulations and particulars mentioned in this memoir are chiefly derived, assured us, that it would be deemed a most heinous sin of omission in the penitent not to strike with the whip when the abbot strikes; and as serious a sin of commission, not to administer the blow with all the muscular force which the individual possesses.

The refectory, where the community assemble to repast, is a spacious apartment, containing portraits of several of the abbots; and, also, a portrait of James II. of England, representing this monarch, in company with his almoner the Marshal de Bellefont, and the Duke of Berwick, at the table of the superior. Around the walls are inscribed appropriate passages of scripture, relating to frugality in diet, and general temperance in living; with, here and there, the well-known embellishment of a skull and cross-bones, painted in rough fresco. The tables are arranged along three sides of the apartment; and at the upper end, backed by a large crucifix, is a kind of dais, with a cross-bench set apart for the abbot and priors. The places at table are assigned to the religious according to the priority of their admission into the fraternity; and are distinguished by a small label of wood, bearing the name of their respective occupiers; and are furnished with a wooden platter, a wooden spoon, a pewter tankard, a small coarse napkin, and a wooden salt-cellar. Twelve ounces only of bread are allowed as the daily portion of each individual; of which, eight ounces are generally eaten at dinner, and the remaining four ounces reserved for supper. Eggs and butter, as well as fish and meat, are never seen at the tables of the religious: nor is seasoning of any kind, except a little salt, permitted in cooking or consuming the dish prepared for the repast. The only beverage allowed is spring water: milk sometimes is served; but it then supplies the place of vegetables, or cheese. The dinner, which is served at half-two o'clock in the afternoon, consists, generally, of a dish of boiled vegetables, and some apples or pears for dessert. The supper is served at six o'clock in the evening, and consists, always, of salad, or cold boiled vegetables. During Lent, and the season of Advent, and also on Friday, one meal only in the day is served; and that even more frugally than at other times. No member is allowed to seat himself at the table, unless he have first offered up a prayer in the church, washed his hands, and exchanged his working dress for the proper habit of the society. To sit at the table with the head uncovered; to rest even a finger upon the table; to manifest any signs of relish for the food which is provided; or to pick the teeth, is deemed a gross fault, and visited with its appropriate penalty. During the meal, one of the religious, stationed in a reading-desk, reads the lecture for the day; and, at intervals, a signal is made by the abbot with a little bell, when the reader is immediately silent, and the brothers cease from repasting, and instantaneously become motionless, with their hands clasped and eyes abased, until another signal authorizes them to resume their meal. To these interruptions, which are very frequent, the religious scrupulously attend; deeming it reasonable and necessary thus to be reminded of their ruling motto, "Eat to live, rather than live to eat." Strangers are sometimes permitted to dine or sup in the refectory; but it is only on particular occasions that this privilege can, consistently with the rules, be accorded. The chapter is a spacious apartment adorned with portraits of several abbots, and furnished with benches for the convenience of the fraternity, who assemble here every morning to review the conduct of each member; and, also, to transact the business of the establishment. The places of the respective members are apportioned by small elbows resembling the divisions of cathedral stalls; and beneath the seat, the few religious books and papers belonging to each member, are deposited. There is a small library belonging to the community, containing manuscripts and records relating to the affairs of the institution.

The cloisters, running round a small garden of respectable culture, form an agreeable promenade; of which, however, the brothers are not allowed to avail themselves, but are permitted to use them as a retirement only for private reflection, during the intervals which occur between the hours of prayer or labour.

But the most interesting feature of this establishment is the burial ground; which, if it be less picturesque than the far-famed Parisian cemetery of Père la Chaise, or the grave-yards generally of France, presents a simplicity in strict accordance with all the arrangements of La Trappe, and cannot fail to awaken somewhat of the poetry of soul, and claim "the passing tribute of a sigh" when the stranger is wandering amongst the frail memorials which in humble array it exhibits, to mark the lowly resting places of the departed brothers. Here is no towering cenotaph or gaudy mausoleum, displaying its neatly chiselled hexameter or gilded verse of sorrow; the only structure which appears is a small chapel, erected over the tomb of the celebrated reformer of La Trappe, the Abbé Rancé, upon the façade of which are the lines,—

Rancé fit fleurir la règle dans ces lieux :
Ses cendres sont ici, son âme est en lieux.*

The graves are ranged side by side, and are severally distinguished by a low grass mound, at the head of which is placed a small black cross, bearing the monastic name, and dates of the birth and death of the deceased. The words "Tubam expectant" (they await the last trump) painted on the wall near which the graves are situated, supply the place of grave-stone eulogy, and are the general epitaph for the brothers who are "gone before;" over the entrance-gate of the cemetery appears likewise the consolatory assurance, "Seminatur in corruptione, surget in incorruptione." (It is sown in corruption, it will rise in incorruption,—2 Cor. chap. xiv.) A grave half dug is always prepared for the reception of the next deceased; and it is not unusual for some one or other of the fraternity, but by no means customary, or in pursuance of a regulation, as is asserted, to repair to this destined receptacle for mortality, and indulge the fond musings which the surrounding scene inspires. The last sad rites which attend the dead Trappist to his tomb, are in strict keeping with the regulations of his life. The frock in which he dies, with the cowl drawn back so as to bare the face, forms his only shroud and coffin; he is borne in the arms of those with whom he has lived in friendship; laid in his narrow bed "to sleep the long sleep," with joyful canticles; and left to his repose without one sorrowing tear or the gentlest breathed sigh for his return. The funeral of a Trappist has been rapturously apostrophised by Chateaubriand in his "Genie du Christianisme," with all the flowery enthusiasm of language which characterizes his always pleasing productions. This distinguished writer has also, upon more than one occasion, held up the disregard which the Trappist entertains of death, as a singular example of philosophy worthy of imitation. But the nation and religion to which he belongs are generally the leading illustrations of his discourses, and are seldom adduced by him unaccompanied by a partiality which excludes the introduction of other examples. The conduct of the Trappist in contemplating death is not so admirable as this writer, or any other person, would induce us to believe. It is true the recluse does not fear death, but on the contrary desires it; yet this desire will be found, when analyzed, to spring from a morbid unholy selfishness; and the ademption of fear which it produces, and which is so braggartly adduced as philosophical, to be a natural consequent of its indulgence; and, therefore, of the same nature with the originating cause. Considering himself as a creature born only to indulge the belief of an immortality, to manifest signs of that belief, and to enjoy hereafter the subject of his belief as the reward of his manifestation; earth is to him but a prison wherein he is condemned to pine, until death as the welcome angel leads him out from bondage. But is not this denying the ends for which he has been placed in a temporary existence of mortality? Does not this bemoaning a terrestrial sojourn, obliquely impugn the great wisdom and benevolence, which manifest the production and preservation of life? The good man in the world fears death no more than the secluded brother without the world; but there is this difference: the one desires life, yet is content to die; the other is discontented to live, and, therefore, desires death: this, having hid his talent in the earth, relies solely upon the manifestation of his faith, in cloying repetitions, as the title to a future beatitude; that, improves the little span of his existence, by employing the abilities with which he has not uselessly been gifted; knowing that as life is the appointed end in the creation of humanity, the proper employment of his talent during life is a co-operation with the designs of the Great Giver of life; and, manifesting his faith in his works, he awaits death as an accident of his condition, bringing with it not only the cessation of his labours, but a sure reward for the "work which was given him to do."

It remains now to describe concisely some of the peculiar habitudes which characterize the recluses of La Trappe. The government of the institution resides solely in the abbot, assisted by a prior and sub-prior. The most servile deference is paid by the community to their superior, who alone assigns to each member his respective occupation, from which the individual is liable to be removed at discretion. He alone also regulates the sub-administration of the monastery; and, according to the established rule, such administration is changed every year, a short time before the Feast of the Purification, when its officers resign their respective appointments to the disposition of the abbot, who may likewise at any time remove and replace. Without the permission of his superior, no member can place himself under a particular penance, or inflict any severer rigourousness than that which the rule of his order, or the will of his chief, imposes. Written communications, to or from friends in the world, must in all cases be perused by the abbot, previously to their reception or transmission by the religious.

The members of this community are separated into two classes, distinguished by the appellations of frères de chœur, (brothers of the choir,) and frères convers, (converted brothers.) The frères de chœur—so called from the division of the church in which they are stationed during the religious services, and from their being specially appointed to chant the religious offices of the day—are generally men who have received an education in the world superior to that of their humble brothers; yet in every other respect, such as diet and labour, they are on a level with the other members of the community. The frères convers are such as have moved in a more humble class of life, and have received a less degree of education than those of the choir. They are more especially the workmen and artificers of the community; yet they have their appointed hours for devotion, and are, in every other respect, upon a perfect equality with their brothers of superior education. The distinction of superior and inferior, although really existing between the two classes of brothers, is nevertheless only noticed in the religious services, and in the colour of their costume. The dress of the frères de chœur consists of a long gown of coarse white cloth, bound round the waist with a leathern girdle. Over this gown they place, when labouring in the fields, or occupied at any manual employment, a black scapulary, which is scrupulously removed before sitting down to meals or attending the religious services, when both this and the gown are exchanged for a kind of long flowing tunic. The frères convers are habited in a brown dress, beneath which is worn a cope of the same colour, but are never permitted to use the black scapulary or head-piece. Both classes of the fraternity wear next to the skin a shirt of coarse serge, which so far from being a garb of penitence, as may at first be supposed, is a special preservative of health, against the transitions from heat and cold to which the religious are exposed by the successive alternations of labour and prayer, that make up the days and nights of their existence.

Besides these two classes of professed religious, there are at La Trappe frères familiers, (brothers of the family,) aspirants and novices.

The frères familiers are such as are not bound by vows or any religious profession, but who engage themselves in the service of the monastery: becoming as it were members of the family. They do not adopt the religious habit, nor are they in any way under the discipline of the order, being free to remain or depart at pleasure.

The aspirant is one who, desiring to enter the community, submits to a period of probation, by attending the religious exercises, and conforming to the regulations of the establishment. During this time, he is lodged as a visitor in the hôtellerie, and attends regularly the services and ceremonies of the religious. When the period of his probation is expired, he appears, some morning after matins, in the chapter of the fraternity, assembled to receive him, and prostrates himself upon the ground before the superior, who demands "Quid petis?" (what seek you?) to which the suppliant responds, "Misericordiam Dei et vestram," (God's mercy and yours.) After this reception, he assumes the habit of a novice, and continues in a further state of probation for one year; during which period he is instructed in the several rules of the order, and disciplined in the various religious exercises of the establishment. At the expiration of every three months, he solemnly renews his petition to be admitted before the brothers assembled in full chapter. Upon each of these occasions, and especially the last, he is warned by the superior of the rigorous change to which he is about to submit, and earnestly entreated to review his determination, whilst he can yet conscientiously decline a profession which, if once avowed, is irrevocable. Thus it appears that the Trappists cannot be charged with the gross iniquity of inveigling proselytes into their order; they do not seek an addition to their fraternity; but, on the contrary, must be sought by the individual aspiring to their fellowship, which cannot be granted without a due preparation. No rash oath is wrung from the aspirant, in a moment of religious enthusiasm or sorrowful despair, but ample time is accorded to reflect upon the condition which he desires to exchange, to inquire into the rigours of the order into which he is anxious to enter; to ponder between the delights of social society ere he renounce the world, wherein

— as an unguided man

He has walked up and down, to find his weariness, for the less irksome, yet morbid existence of the cloister.

The business of the day commences amongst the Trappists about one o'clock, A.M., at which hour the bell for matins is sounded, and the whole fraternity rise from their beds and proceed at once, (the operation of the toilet being only the work of a moment,) in due order, to the church, where they are employed in reciting or chanting the office of the day until four o'clock. This nocturnal service, however, varies according to the solemnities and distinctions of particular days, and not unfrequently commences at midnight.

Few scenes are more imposing or heart-stealing, yet less easily to be described than the matins at La Trappe. The deep-toned summons of the church bell booming upon the dark stillness of the surrounding valley, and echoed in swelling cadences of the morning breeze; the hoarse mournful recitative of the monks, arranged on each side of the chapel; the daybreak peering through the windows, and gradually stealing over the pale visages and white robes of the brothers; each a feature in the scene, which is too solemn to be romantic, and not of sufficient rationality to inspire religion.

The service of the morning is followed by an interval set apart for the celebration of particular masses at the several altars belonging to the church, and for various other religious exercises, which are generally concluded by half five o'clock, when the whole community assemble in the chapter. Here a religious lecture is read, and some instruction or exhortation relating to monastic discipline is rehearsed. At this meeting also every individual is allowed to speak, but only to accuse himself or his brother of some fault which he has committed since the holding of an anterior chapter. To have wiped the sweat from the brow, rested against a wall, leaned with the elbows upon the knees, wished for a change of weather or of health, are each considered a heinous peccancy, of which, as well as of any other grosser delinquency, the individual who remembers himself to have been guilty, standing in the midst of his brothers, openly proclaims his transgression. This self-accusation finished, the delinquent prostrates himself abjectly before the superior who prescribes the condign penance for his offence, or at once absolves him from its imputability. If the self-accuser have omitted any circumstance in his confession, he who may have witnessed the unnoticed dereliction rises and accuses his brother; who is not permitted to excuse himself, either by oral reply or significant gesticulation, whether he be innocent or not; and if the accused should, in any way, manifest a denial of the accusation, the whole assembly instantaneously prostrate themselves upon the ground, to repair, by a general humiliation, the pride of him who could not submit to be accused or thought guilty of transgression. At this daily meeting also, if the superior have received intelligence of the death of any relative of a religious, he announces the calamity to the chapter, without referring to the names of the parties, but by simply saying—"Let us pray for the repose of the soul of the father, &c. &c., of one of our religious." The business of the chapter is generally concluded at seven o'clock; and at half eight grand mass is performed, and continues until nine o'clock, at which the labour, properly so called, of the day is commenced.

Idleness is a word not to be found in the nomenclature of the Trappist. To work, and by the sweat of the brow, to procure the sustenance of life, is a leading rule in the order of St Benedict to which he belongs. Accordingly, at La Trappe, the hours which are not set apart for nightly slumber or the offices of devotion are passed in various labours for the benefit of the community, and to furnish the few necessities of the establishment. Devotion and labour are the chief ends of existence at La Trappe; and the natural slumbers of the night, which conclude the labours of to-day, are considered as necessary only to recruit physical strength for the labours of the coming morrow.

When the grand mass for the day is ended, every individual save the abbot, priors, and the cellier and hôtelier, for the time being, repairs to the place where the habits and utensils of work are deposited to put on the appropriate labouring dress, consisting of a white frock, with a black scapulary for the frères de chœur, and a brown cope for the frères convers. Here, likewise, the prior assigns to each the particular kind of labour which he is to perform during the day, and distributes the necessary implements. The brothers then set forth to their respective places of labour, in formal procession, headed by a superintendent, who, when they arrive at their destination, gives whatever directions may be necessary for the prosecution of their labours, which it is forbidden to commence until a proper signal to that effect has been given. If, during the work, a brother, by any casualty, injure himself, or damage the instrument with which he may be employed, he repairs immediately to the superintendent, and placing himself upon his knees, explains, by proper gesticulation, the accident which has befallen him; and for which afterwards a suitable penance is awarded to him. It appears somewhat hard, nay absurd, that an individual should submit to be punished for an accident, in which possibly he was entirely passive; but the rules of the order suppose that every such casualty is more or less the result of neglect or inattention, and is not to be considered so much an injury to the individual as to the community at large of which he is a member.

The frères de chœur leave their labour at stated intervals in order to repair to the church for the performance of the religious service, which they are specially deputed to discharge. But the frères convers, or others, who do not take any part in administering the duties of religion, repeat their prayers, or whatever may be considered necessary, upon the spot where they are engaged; and, for this purpose, are frequently interrupted in their labour by a well-known signal from the superintendent. In returning from the place of labour the same formal procession is observed as in proceeding thither. The labourers then deposit the various implements which they have used in their appointed places, and, having exchanged their working apparel for the proper monastic dress, and laved their hands, repair to the church, whence, after a short prayer, they proceed, in due order, to dine in the refectory. After dinner, a short time is allowed for reflection in the cloisters, and reading religious books: at the expiration of which period, the brothers proceed again processional to labour; at which they continue until the time appointed for supper. Those who are engaged at work are not always expected to attend the vespers, which are recited at half-past four o'clock; but at the Compline, or evening service, which terminates the general devotion of the day, the whole fraternity, and even visitors, who may be residing in the monastery, are expected to be present. The far-famed "Salve Regina," of which so much is partially spoken by the enthusiasts of the Romish Church, is sung, at the conclusion of the evening service, by all the religious, assembled in the great choir of the chapel, and standing with their faces towards the image of the Virgin, which is but scarcely discernible by the light of a solitary lamp, suspended from the roof of the building. With the last echoing notes of the hymn, the great bell is sounded in three times three solemn tones, and the whole assembly are reverently bowed down, with their faces altar-wise; whilst the most perfect silence pervades the interior of the chapel. After continuing thus about five minutes, a signal is given by the abbot, with his hammer, when the bell is tolled in rapid and violent oscillations. The assembly then rise, and, after the superior has repeated the parting prayer of the evening, repair, in their respective order, to the chapter. There, at a signal from the abbot, all the religious, as if struck by lightning, fall prostrate, with their cowls drawn over their heads; and in this attitude, without the slightest movement, each repeats to himself the penitential psalm called "The Miserere." At a second signal, the members suddenly and simultaneously rise, as if roused to their resurrection by the last trump. This performance concludes the services and labours of the day. The abbot then proceeds to the door of the church, and stations himself beside the benefier, from which he gives to each member, as he passes, with a profound reverence to the dormitory, one or two drops of the holy water.

Arrived in the dormitory, each places himself upon his knees at the entrance of the little alcove, which contains his humble bed, until a signal is given by the abbot, when the religious rises, and, having unlooped the curtain which depends at the entrance of his compartment, ungirds his waist, and lays himself down to the repose of sleep.

Such is the daily routine of a Trappist's life, varied, of course, on particular days, and at the seasons which the founders of his religious faith have appointed to be observed with appropriate forms.

Once in every year, also, every member of the order is enforced, by a special regulation of the establishment, to seek what is called "the annual retreat." This is a retirement from his brothers for a period of ten days, during which he devotes himself to spiritual reflection and the study of the scriptures, or other religious works. The great aim of the recluse, when performing this regulation, is to appear even more abstracted from the world than at the other seasons of his retired existence; and to manifest, by severe abstinence and the closest bodily imprisonment, his disregard even of his one small enjoyment on earth—the fellowship of his brother monks.

The religious processions, which are necessary to be performed in the service of the Romish Church, are here divested of all the pomp and circumstance which distinguish them in the cathedral, and amongst the secular clergy. Upon the several fête-days, the appropriate processions take place in the little cloisters of the monastery; and the banners or draperies, necessary to be used, are made of cotton or worsted only, without any embellishment of gold, silver, or silk.

But the most interesting, and, at the same time, peculiar ceremony, which has place amongst the fraternity of La Trappe, is the "Mandatum,"* or Washing the Feet. This takes place every Saturday evening, previously to the Compline, or evening service. Two religious are appointed, in turn, to perform this ceremony, at which strangers are permitted to be present, and, if they desire it, to assist. One of the religious appointed commences, by laving with his hand the feet of the abbot, or first superior present, and passes successively to each of the fraternity, who are seated round the chamber; whilst the other religious follows, and effects the operation of wiping and drying, with a large towel depending from his waist. During the ceremony, which lasts about a quarter of an hour, the assembly chant the particular passages from the evangelists, relating to the memorable incident of Christ washing the feet of his disciples. The whole performance is one, perhaps, amongst the few, which is calculated to affect the stranger. The lesson of humiliation which it exhibits, is less connected with the grossly debased servility which characterises the general deportment and other religious ceremonies of the Trappists, but is rendered impressive from its association with the exemplary humility and earthly career of Him, whose touching condescension is the precedent for its institution.

Amongst the many erroneous notions respecting the habitudes of the Trappist, those, perhaps, are not the least which relate to their treatment and consideration of their invalids. It is asserted that they disregard all kinds of sickness, and are careless to preserve the life of the brother, who may be sinking under the attacks of disease. Neither health nor life is, it is true, desired by the Trappist, but, on the contrary, the desire of death is his ruling passion; yet, whilst the former can, in any way, be preserved or prolonged, the accomplishment of the latter is never, however welcome, hastened by wilful neglect, or otherwise. The fraternity now receives medical advice from one of the most famous physicians in France, the Père Robert, formerly Mr. Debreyne,† under whose direction the pharmacy of La Trappe administers relief, not only to the sick brothers of the monastery, but also to the inhabitants of the surrounding country far and near. Sickness and disease are not considered by the Trappist positive evils, but merely negative casualties, which prevent him from contributing his share of labour for the benefit of the community. Even when suffering under these inflictions, he scrupulously performs the religious exercises of the day, and partakes of the usual simple diet, to which the rules of his order restrict him. Meat, however, is allowed to the sick brother in certain cases, and also honey, sugar, or other sweets, whenever it is necessary; but the bare desire of the invalid is never to be gratified: it is only when these luxuries are indispensable to save life that they are permitted to be used. The strictest surveillance is kept by the infirmier, or individual appointed to superintend the sick, lest they should yield to any unnecessary laxity of discipline, for which sickness is considered in nowise an extenuation. It is the duty also of the infirmier to observe the behaviour of an individual, when the necessary medicines are administered; and if such an one manifest any signs of repugnance, to accuse him as a transgressor at the chapter. It is his mournful office, likewise, when sickness has been triumphant, and death approaches, to strew the couch of his dying friend with ashes; whilst the whole fraternity stand round the expiring brother, and speed, with due dirges, the fleeting spirit to its home.

Such are the details which, from personal observation, have been corrected or gleaned relative to the community of Trappists. Many particulars, which are not of any interest to the stranger, have, of course, been purposely omitted; and, whenever it has been deemed necessary, some short explanation of the apparently ridiculous forms referred to has been furnished. It is a difficult conquest to triumph over prejudice, or, at any rate, to accord a due value of good opinion to that which is contemned; and, therefore, by those who, with some reason, despise whatever claims affinity with Romanism, any meed of praise accorded to such an institution as La Trappe may at first be suspected. Institutions of this nature are justly to be deprecated, in this or any other country, where true religion is established and promulgated, as nurseries tending not only to foster error and encourage sloth, under the garb of sanctity, but also to enervate the intellect, and to debase the mind from the nobler designs for which it has been created. But in countries where the infatuated doctrines of the Romish church are prevalent, institutions of this nature may, perhaps, be justified in the words of Napoleon, when discussing the propriety of suffering La Trappe to exist—"That it is necessary there should be an asylum for great sinners, and a refuge for religious enthusiasts." Nor, whatever our judgment, should we in charity impute insincerity of motive to those from whom we differ, when we see an adherence to their tenets is characterized by a consistency of action; and surely no one, be he the most stanch champion of religion "pure and undefiled," that has familiarised himself with the community of La Trappe, but must own that the profession of its members is fully illustrated by their practice. Setting aside, however, the religious creed upon which this institution is founded, the order of La Trappe claims pre-eminently all that may be yielded or assumed in relation to monastic polity. The curse of christendom, during the middle ages, was the intrigue of busy meddling monks: the reduction of a kingdom, the dethronement of a monarch, or the removal of a powerful vassal, furnished topics of discussion in the chapters of the monastery; and the rich spoil reaped by the enterprise, furnished forth the banquets of the

* Mandatum, a command; so called from the command of our Saviour, which is implied in 14th chapter of John, 14th and 15th verses:—"If I, then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye ought also to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you."

refectory, or swelled the people-awing pageant of superstition. Such proceedings have characterized, and ever will characterize, establishments, where the monks, without abjuring entirely the world, embrace a mode of existence, which divides their life and its actions between the cloister and society. The humiliating deference, and debased servility, which they are accustomed to receive from those to whom they may be called to administer consolation or advice, are too grateful an offering to the love of power, and the desire of rule naturally implanted, more or less, in the heart of man. The bustle of the world, then, for a time, banishes whatever resolutions have been formed in the seclusion of the cloister; and thus alternating their mode of existence, they live neither as good citizens, nor, in accordance with their vows, as strictly religious.* But no such evils or abhorrent practices can possibly have place in a community, whose bond of existence is a vow of silence—amongst whom, the utterance of an unnecessary syllable is deemed akin to impiety: where the crust and the cruse—the only luxuries of a frugal board—must be furnished by the sweat of the brow; and where the spare diet of the morning is indulged only to support the toils of a day of labour. Into such a community, the crafty politician, or scheming factionary, in vain looks for admission; there is no conclave to whom he may divulge the machinations of his cunning, or with whom he may contrive the gratification of his ambition. Here are no hearts beating in his cause; no hand willing to his purpose; nor any coffers yawning to gluttonize the plunder of his success. Such a community has La Trappe ever been: those who become its members, cease altogether to meddle with the world. No matter what their previous career of life; be they criminals fleeing from the retributive justice of their fellows, or men desirous of closing a life of iniquity with an old age of sorrowing amendment; if the lives which they here lead—

—express

The holy doctrines they profess—an establishment, which offers to such an asylum for true repentance, which is erected as the great "refugia peccatorum," may not be altogether decried as a baneful institution, or as a comfortable penitentiary, where guilt is sheltered beneath the sanctity of religion.

La Trappe claims to stand, and to be judged alone; and with some reason to be excepted from the general abhorrence in which the lovers of true religion and rectitude of principle justly hold all monastic establishments that have disgraced the age which permitted their existence. Its members, at all times, although in the world, are not of the world. They are never eminent upon the record of history; nor famous in the mouths of men. Avoiding to tread alike the mazes of political and theological controversy, the flowery paths of science, or the fertile expanse of nature—a strict performance of the vows, which they have taken, is the engrossing pursuit of their terrestrial sojourn, and "a paradise to come" the sole desire of their existence.

J. W. W.

* The revolutionists of 1793 (no friends to monachism,) seem to have made some reflections in the spirit of these observations. In the report on La Trappe, made by the administration of the Department of L'Orme, there is the following remark: "Il y a long temps qu'on a observé, que les religieux les plus attachés à la vie claustrale étaient précisément ceux dont la règle était la plus austère."

THE COST OF A REPUTATION.

A PARABLE.

"No, no, the postchaise is at the door;—it is too late," cried I to my mother and sisters,—I will not say how many years ago,—when about to set out for Sedan, bearing urgent letters of recommendation to the Duc de C., who was enjoying his ministerial holidays at a country-seat in that neighbourhood. "You cannot surely have expected, my dear mother, that, at twenty years of age, I should sit down tamely contented with——"

"Twenty thousand livres per annum,—a cheerful happy home, with the best hunting, shooting, fishing, and prettiest sisters in the provinces," interrupted the youngest of the girls. "Bernard! Bernard!—think twice before you sacrifice the happiness of such a destiny to idle dreams of vain ambition."

"Think of your poor cousin Henrietta, who loves you so dearly," remonstrated another of my sisters.

"Think of the example shown you by the best of fathers," added my mother in a graver voice,

"My dear mother,—my dear girls," cried I, respectfully kissing the hand of the former, as I prepared to take my leave,—
"You should have spoken thus earnestly two months ago, before I addressed my first letter of solicitation to the Duc de C. Great men and great ministers are not to be trifled with. My visit has been announced, and I must go. Some day or other you will rejoice that I had courage to tear myself from among you, and create for the honour of the family a reputation destined to ennoble the obscure patronymic of my fathers. In youth we owe ourselves to the world, in order that, in later years, the world may repay the loan with its esteem. The public distinctions, essential to my happiness, once achieved, I will return straight to the chateau, marry my cousin Henrietta, and remain happy and contented among you for the remainder of my days."

"But why not be happy and contented now?" still pleaded the three girls.

"In inglorious obscurity!—never! You will be twice as proud of me, my dear little girls when, four years hence, I return with epaulettes on my shoulders,—a gay colonel from Versailles !”

“But if you should be killed in battle in the interim, my good brother ?” pleaded my little favourite Ann.

I muttered something about “glory,”—“renown,”—“fame,”—the usual claptraps of the occasion,—kissed them hastily all round ; and, to avoid further importunity, jumped into the carriage. There was no arguing with their shrewd good sense and strong affection.

A day or two afterwards I was at Sedan, a garrison town, where I was not sorry to obtain some insight into the pleasures and habits of a military life, previous to taking the first step in my career. Already I foresaw a tremendous crown of laurels impending over my head. The exigencies of war were just then direfully active. In half a dozen years I might be a general officer,—in a dozen more, perhaps, a field marshal ! So, at least, I assured myself, every time my servant touched his hat, addressing me by the ignominious title of “Monsieur le Chevalier.” Even Henrietta almost ceased to occupy a place in my memory, so warmly were my hopes engrossed by my brilliant prospects.

The fortifications of Sedan, the roll of its drums, the martial air of its very citizens, who cock their hats in the street, as much as to say to strangers visiting the town, “We are the countrymen of Turenne !”—did not tend to refrigerate my military ardour. I hated to find myself nothing in the eyes of the garrison. “Some day or other,” said I to myself, “these people shall become familiar with my name.” To be famous was the height of my ambition.

I supped that night with the mess of a regiment of cuirassiers quartered at Sedan, with one of the young officers of which I had a family connexion. Among young fellows of one age it soon transpired that I was on my road to the chateau of the Duc de C. ; that I was forthwith to accompany him to Versailles, where he was to present me to the king, and take care of my promotion ; and so unanimous were my companions in congratulating me upon my great good fortune, and predicting that, in a few years, I should be at the head of a regiment, that I felt prouder than ever of having found courage to extricate myself from the peaceful ignominy of a country life, and the arms of my pretty cousin Henrietta.

I ventured to inquire the road to the residence of the Duc de C., for which I was to set out early in the morning.

“Any one will show you the way,” cried one of the officers,—“It is the famous chateau where Field-marshal Fabert breathed his last ; and one of the finest places in the neighbourhood.”

“Fine as it is, however,” added another, “I know plenty of provincials hereabouts who would not set foot in it to command the interest at Court of the Duc de C. !”

“Or even the good fortune of Marshal Fabert !” added another. Then finding me insufficiently versed in the feats and triumphs of the said marshal, they proceeded to relate the eventful history of one, who, from a printer’s boy, had risen to the highest military rank in Europe ;—eventually refusing, from the hands of Louis XIV., letters-patent of nobility, and the insignia of the order of the Holy Ghost.

“In Fabert’s life-time,” observed one of the officers, “his rapid rise, and unexampled successes, gave grounds to a popular belief, that he was indebted to magic for his unvarying good fortune.”

“Nay, to this day,” added another, “the peasants expressly point out the tower in which the general held his colloquies with the Evil One.”

“Colloquies ?” retorted a third ; “did you never hear the story of the general’s death-bed ? The demon to whom he had pledged his soul is said to have made his appearance at the chateau during the last moments of Fabert, disappearing at the very instant of his decease.”

“Carrying off, of course, in his Satanic pouch,” added his comrade, with a hearty laugh, “the forfeited soul of the brave soldier who had outlived so many battles !”

“Laugh, and welcome, my dear fellow,” remonstrated one of the younger officers ; “but I can tell you that scarcely a farmer in the district of Sedan but firmly believes that every month of May, about the anniversary of Fabert’s decease, the general’s black man, (as they familiarly denominate his Satanic Majesty,) reappears at the chateau !”

“I congratulate you, my dear sir,” rejoined the more sceptical of the set. “If you remain long enough the inmate of the Duc de C., you may hope to enjoy the excitement of an adventure.”

A thousand idle jests resulted from this sportive hint ; but though I joined heartily in the merriment of the mess-table, I confess it was not without a certain uneasy sensation that, through the misty rain of a spring morning, I descried the turrets of the chateau of the Duc de C. the following day. I tried to make myself believe that awe at approaching the presence of a man so honoured with the friendship of His Majesty, was the sole cause of my nervous tremour. But in spite of my better reason, the idea of Marshal Fabert’s Black Man was not without its influence. The chateau was surrounded with vast forests, while a cheerless looking lake extended its dingy mirror in the foreground. Nothing inviting in its aspect ! My mind was, however, too full of castles in the air, to admit of dwelling long upon the ominous features of the place.

On presenting myself at the gates of the old Gothic manor-house, I was courteously welcomed ; but the groom of the chambers informed me, it might be some hours before I received an audience of the Duke, who had slept the preceding night at a neighbouring country-seat. Refreshments were offered me ; and I was installed in a sort of old armoury on the ground floor, on the walls of which a few curious military trophies were interspersed with boars’ heads, stags’ heads, and all the modern attributes of the chase. There were also certain old family portraits, which, at the close of a couple of hours, I began to think remarkably disagreeable companions, Google

Scarcely had I come to this conclusion, when a pannel of the wainscot slid gently aside, and a human head suddenly intruded into the room; of which, independent of its singular mode of apparition, the aspect was sufficiently appalling,—the features being wasted, the complexion cadaverous, and the coal-black hair wild and shaggy. Still there was something so strikingly intellectual in the face, that it was impossible not to feel interested, rather than terrified.

"What are you doing here?" inquired a deep, but tremulous voice, issuing from the almost livid lips of the intruder.

"Waiting for the Duc de C.," replied I, with as much self-possession as I could manage to assume.

"And do you fancy that you are the only person waiting for him?" rejoined the stranger. "But the hour will come!—his, and thine, and mine! The fatal hour will come. Behold! the watcher watcheth for evermore! The forests of the earth are green, and the skies of heaven are blue; but there is a worm that never dies, and a fire that is never quenched. The fatal hour is at hand! This very night, and I shall have ceased to exist!"

God forgive me!—but there was something in this announcement not altogether disagreeable. I was far from sorry to hear my singular visitor avow himself to be a mere mortal, subject to the penalty of vulgar clay. And as he had now passed the threshold, and entered the armoury, I perceived that, though wild in aspect, he was, after all, a well-dressed young man, about thirty years of age, apparently labouring under the consequences of severe indisposition or severe affliction.

"If you are waiting for the Duc de C., come into my room, where you will be better accommodated than here," said he, probably discerning in my countenance tokens of sympathy in his condition; and I accordingly followed him through the secret door, which he closed carefully after us, into a small secluded suite of rooms, of which he did the honours with the ease and politeness of a man of the world. Having taken a seat by my side, and struggled for some minutes with his emotions, as if striving to recover strength and coherency for further explanations, he thanked me for my frank confidence in his good intentions.

"You are entitled," said he, "to a full explanation of the strange circumstances under which we have met. Grant me your patience a while. By the time I have related my dreadful history, the Duke will probably be at liberty to receive you.

"I was born, sir, an inmate of this chateau—the youngest of three brothers; to the eldest of whom were apportioned the wealth and honours of the House of C. Nothing remained for me but the wretched insignificance of churchmanship. I was destined to become an Abbé, dependent for preferment upon ministerial patronage. But with the blood and name of my heroic ancestors, I inherited their lofty ambitions! Glory was my idol. Earnest purposes of shining in the world already fermented in my bosom. I was resolved to make myself heard of, or to be heard of no more. So absorbed was my soul by this overpowering yearning after distinction, that the pleasures of life became indifferent. I lived only in the future. The present was comparatively of small account.

"Yet such was the clash and brilliancy of contemporaneous celebrities,—such an influx of literary and military glory diffused its radiance on every side,—that I attained my thirtieth year without accomplishing my end. I was still the obscure denizen of our family estates,—totally eclipsed by the poets, statesmen, and warriors of the day. I was in despair. At certain moments of profound despondency, suicide presented itself as my sole refuge from my bitter consciousness of insignificance. The purport of my life seemed frustrated. To what end an existence so obscure, so colourless as mine?"

"I was alone in my family.—My elder brothers were already distinguished in the world. My only confident at home was an old negro, attached from time immemorial to the house of C. I say from time immemorial, advisedly; for so little was recollected of his first connexion with the family, that many people pretended he had been originally seen in this chateau at the moment of the decease of Field-marshal Fabert."

I could not altogether repress a start of surprise at this announcement. My companion inquired what was the matter; but it was not for me to refer to the singular intelligence I had received the preceding evening from my friends the cuirassiers.

"One day," resumed he, "when more than usually overpowered by the dispiriting sense of my own nothingness, I exclaimed aloud, 'I would sacrifice ten years of my life to accomplish a first-rate literary reputation!'

"'Ten years is a large amount to pay for such a trifle!' observed Iago, who happened to be in attendance upon me,—smiling as he spoke, till his two glaring rows of white teeth became frightfully apparent.

"'Large,—but not more than it is worth,' I persisted. 'I say again, that I would thankfully give ten years to become a popular author.'

"'Done!' replied the negro, with his wonted sang froid—(for he was the coolest fellow I ever beheld.) 'I accept your ten years. In return, know that your wish is already half accomplished.'

"You may conjecture my astonishment at hearing him propose this singular engagement. But conceive my surprise when, a few days afterwards, I learned by the post, that a work of mine transmitted to Paris the preceding year for publication, had actually been crowned by the Academy! My pledge was scarcely given, and I was already a person of note!

"I flew to the capital,—and was received on all sides with open arms. The most distinguished men of the day were proud to make my acquaintance. Their praises, their examples, their counsels, encouraged my enthusiasm, as well as perfected my taste. Every successive work that emanated from my pen, was pronounced to be a chef d'œuvre. I had assumed a supposititious name, in order to distinguish myself from my brothers; and scarcely a newspaper in which it was not twenty times repeated! My works were translated into every European language. My books were in every hand. It was only yesterday, sir, that you yourself—but no matter.”

My feelings were, by this time, painfully excited. Into whose presence had I thus singularly intruded? Who was this mysterious stranger? Was it Diderot?—Marmontel?—D'Alembert?—Voltaire? I began to regard my companion with a degree of respect, exceeding even my previous compassion.

“To a spirit so ardently constituted as mine,” resumed he, after a heavy sigh, “even this excess of literary honour soon became insufficient for happiness. I said to myself after all,—what is there either manly, what is there ennobling in all this waste of pens and ink! The occupations of the demigods, ere earth was peopled with mere mortals, was conquest. Military renown is the only glory worth achieving. To be a great general, to become the leader of an army, were well worth the sacrifice of ten years of one's existence.”

“You continue to bid high,” cried Iago, who was still in my service. “But once more I accept your terms. Ten years and you shall become a hero!”

My countenance, I conclude, now began to evince tokens of incredulity; for the stranger suddenly exclaimed, “You do not believe me? Would that I too could be incredulous! For I swear to you by all that is holiest in the universe, from the moment when, on the faith of this mysterious compact, I entered the army, I had only to plan expeditions, to have them crowned with success beyond my most sanguine expectations. History is at hand to confirm my asseverations. My name was again an assumed one; but there was no illusion in the provinces it was my fate to attach to the sovereignty of France;—in the fortresses which ceded to my besiegement,—in the redoubts which I carried,—in the banners which I brought back to the feet of my king. These, at least, were real; and these still survive to attest all I have been!”

The stranger was now pacing the room with impetuous footsteps; and as I contemplated his movements, I could not forbear exclaiming to myself, “Who on earth have I before me? Is it Coigny?—is it Richelieu?—or can it be Marshal Saxe in propria persona?”

After striding backwards and forwards in silence for some moments, he suddenly threw himself anew into the seat by my side.

“Iago assured me, during the intoxication of my military triumphs,” he resumed, “that I should soon become disgusted with the fickle breath of popular applause. ‘Sooner or later,’ pleaded the negro, ‘you will begin to understand that nothing is really important that has not a real value. The positive,—the tangible, is the one thing needful.’ And he was so far justified in his prognostications, that I actually made him a tender of five additional years, on condition of obtaining the command over enormous riches.”

“And he fulfilled his part of the compact?” cried I, with a scarcely repressed smile of incredulity.

“With gold,—jewels,—houses,—lands,—all,—all that passes with mankind under the name of wealth, did he endow me,” cried my companion, clasping his hands with frantic emotion. “Nay, when I rose this very morning, all these were still my own. I was rich,—I was great,—I was powerful! I said now to my soul, take thine ease! I was happy,—I had no fears—no anxieties. If you doubt my word, inquire of Iago. Iago will be here presently, and confirm all I have related.”

I shuddered at these wild assertions, for there was something terribly real in the air of horror with which he rushed to a time-piece on the chimney-piece, and anxiously ascertained the hour.

“This morning, when I opened my eyes,” he resumed, addressing me in a portentous whisper, “I found myself so weak and dispirited, that I hastily summoned my valet de chambre to my assistance. Merciful Powers!—It was Iago who appeared in his place! My soul sank within me as he accosted me.”

“Yet his appearance, you say, was ever the precursor of triumph and good fortune,” said I, desirous to tranquillize the agitation of the invalid.

“I asked him the cause of my sudden illness,” continued he,—“I told him that only last night I retired to rest in perfect health!

“It is not sickness,—it is death!” replied the negro, with his usual frightful grin, “Surely you are prepared?”

“For death?—at my age?” cried I, gasping for breath.

“It is not my fault if you have been too much absorbed in your personal vanities to take heed of the lapse of time,” replied the negro, with a bitter sneer. “Providence accorded you, as the term of your natural life, exactly threescore years. You were thirty when we first entered into our engagements.”

“Iago,” cried I, anticipating the horrible announcement that was to follow.

“And during the five ensuing years,” he continued, with his usual facetious insolence, “you expended in speculations an extra allowance of five and twenty. You have consequently lived out your sixty years. You will find me tolerably correct in my arithmetic; for know, that every moment subtracted from your life, is added to my own; and I, at least, recognise the value of human existence!”

“Such, then, was the motive of your pretended zeal!” cried I with indignation.

“‘Greater men than yourself have shown themselves more grateful,’ coolly rejoined the negro: ‘Fabert, for instance, who was one of my protégés, paid me a somewhat higher price for his reputation.’

“Iniquitous monster!” cried I, “You have deceived me,—defrauded me.”

“Nay, nay,—you have only cheated yourself!” replied Iago. “Count upon your fingers, and you will find me exact in my balance. Thirty-five years of real existence, and twenty-five expended in procuring the means of distinction;—total of the whole, sixty! Admit that you have lived your day. Prepare for immediate dissolution.”

"He was about to leave the room, when I rushed towards him, and clung to his garments.

"Only one more day!" cried I; "only, only one!"

"Not half a one," he coolly replied. "Reflect, that I am the loser of every minute's grace you obtain! Your time is over."

"An hour—a single hour!" I persisted—feeling the powers of life weakening and weakening as I spoke.

"Hark ye!" cried the negro, pretending to be softened by my earnestness—"You have hitherto negotiated with me like a gentleman; and liberal treatment is due to you in return. What will you give for two hours of the life you now appear to value so highly?"

"Anything—everything!" I exclaimed; for already I felt my blood stagnating in my veins, and the dews of death rising on my forehead. "Willingly will I sacrifice all the fame I have achieved. Take my gold—my lands. Life—life!—only ask for the breath of life!"

"You only ask for that of which you have been so prodigal!" cried the negro, with a horrible chuckle. "But see how tender-hearted I am growing. I accept your offer. Live till evening! But remember you have nothing further here or hereafter to offer as a bribe. At sunset, therefore, be prepared for the worst!"

"So saying, he left me!" continued the stranger, wildly. "He left me—and when we meet again, I must resign myself to death—must cease to enjoy the breath of spring—the harmonies of nature—the joys of life and love! Behold!" he continued, dragging me to the window, and pointing to a group of ragged peasants traversing the parks—"to-morrow, yonder people will be inhaling the pure breezes—will be sunned under the glowing orb of Heaven—while, for me, all will be at an end! And to have sacrificed five and twenty years of such blessings—such pure and delicious enjoyments—for the vain acquirement of an uncertain renown; to be praised by those I know not, those whom I care not to know! Oh! what a price have I paid for that which is in itself valueless! What prodigality!—what waste! But why lose the few moments allotted me in idle murmurs! Let me rather enjoy, for the last time, the glorious spectacle of triumphant nature!"

So saying, he threw open the windows opening towards the park, and rushing forth, took his way towards the plantations. While watching his precipitate departure, I found myself touched upon the shoulder; and, on turning round, found a grave middle-aged man, wearing the insignia of the St. Esprit, standing beside me. I had no difficulty in recognising the Duc de C.

"I have a thousand apologies to offer you, Monsieur le Chevalier," said he, "for the inadvertence of my servants in leaving you exposed to an interview with my unfortunate brother; whose mental infirmities are the cause of his seclusion in this retired chateau, and of my annual visit to the place. It was to consult a physician, celebrated for his skilful treatment of lunatics, who is on a visit in this neighbourhood, that I last night absented myself from home. I have now, however, the satisfaction of bidding you welcome; and to-morrow we will take our departure for Versailles. All that my friendship or recommendations can ensure, towards forwarding your advancement in life, depend upon! The enthusiastic ambition of military distinction expressed in the letters I have had the pleasure of receiving from you, excites my earnest interest in your behalf. To such views the times are highly favourable. Rapid advancement awaits you. In the course of ten years, or so —"

"Ten years, Monsieur le Duc?" was my involuntary ejaculation; "ten years subtracted from the sum total of life! Pardon me!—Within these walls I have received a lesson more valuable than even the patronage you thus generously promise. To-morrow, instead of proceeding to Versailles, I retrace my steps homewards! Accept my grateful thanks—my humble apologies. Fame has lost its charm in my estimation; since I have learned to recognise the value of human life, and the costs of ambition!"

"This is my brother's doing!" cried the Duke, but more in sorrow than in anger. "The singular delusions of his monomania, have already more than once sufficed to deter young aspirants of my acquaintance from embracing a public career. But is it possible that you will allow the hallucinations of a lunatic to influence you in a step so momentous?"

"Wisdom is a thing of too precious a quality, Monsieur le Duc," replied I, "to admit of our being over-fastidious in examining its origin. All we have to do is, to accept such lessons, and be thankful."

The Duc de C. was perhaps not sorry to be thus easily rid of one of the numerous candidates for his interest at court: for, after a night's hospitality, he suffered me to return home without further remonstrance.

Happy journey—auspicious return! I felt that I could not travel too rapidly; for I was returning to the bosom of my family—the arms of Henrietta.

The following May, I had nothing to dread from the apparition of the black man. Already I was a contented country gentleman: a happy husband and father! The price of fame had inspired me with a due appreciation of the value of human life.

THE SWORD.

For the slave-creating brand
Wielded by the despot's hand,
We curse thee, Sword !
For expiring Freedom's moan,
For the world's indignant groan
Crush'd beneath oppression's throne,
We curse thee, Sword !

For the widow's oft-shed tear,
For the orphan's cry of fear,
We curse thee, Sword !
For the poor man's grievous wrong,
For the injustice of the strong
Repeated oft, enduring long,
We curse thee, Sword !

For thy many deeds of shame
Done in God's blasphemed name,
We curse thee, Sword !
For the aid that thou hast lent
To wicked priests with black intent,
On soul-enthralment ever bent,
We curse thee, Sword !

For the Wallace glaive of might,
For the Bruce's blade so bright,
We bless thee, Sword !
For the tyrant's overthrow,
For the right-asserting blow
Struck with Freedom's holy glow,
We bless thee, Sword !

When at length the olive wreath
Binds thee for ever in thy sheath,
We'll bless thee, Sword !
When slavery's hated course is run,
When every tyrant's race is done,
When Freedom's latest battle 's won,
We'll bless thee, Sword !

When chang'd at length, the plough's sharp blade
By peaceful man, thou shalt be made,
We'll bless thee, Sword !
When future youths, with doubting ear,
From aged men shall only hear
Thine ancient deeds of blood and fear,
We'll bless thee, Sword !

MISS ROBERTS' NOTES OF AN OVERLAND JOURNEY THROUGH FRANCE AND EGYPT TO BOMBAY: WITH A MEMOIR.

THIS is an imperfect, and posthumous volume. Some seven or more years ago, Miss Emma Roberts acquired considerable reputation by those lively and truthful sketches of Anglo-Indian life, which she published under the title of Scenes and Characteristics of Hindostan, and which were written in India. She subsequently returned to England, and devoted herself to literature as a profession. She possessed the pen of a ready and versatile writer, and contributed constantly to Annals, the Asiatic Journal and other periodical works.

Miss Roberts was, as her name imports, of Welsh descent. Her father was a captain in the British army, which he entered after having been in the Russian service. He appears to have died while his children, two daughters—of whom Emma was the second—were still young. They resided, after his death, with their mother, “a lady of some literary pretensions,” at Bath. There Miss Roberts undertook her first literary work—Memoirs of the Rival Houses of York and Lancaster, which was published in 1827, in two volumes. She was born about 1794. In the following year, her mother being now dead, she accompanied her sister, who married an officer in the Bengal army, to India. A dismal picture she gives, if we remember rightly, of the life of that detrop personage, a wife's or husband's sister in the small household of an Indian officer quartered in a remote station. The wife's sister, however, in this instance, possessed both opportunity and power of observation, and made good use of her time.

In 1831, Miss Roberts' sister, Mrs. McNaughten, died, and she returned from the upper provinces to Calcutta, where her pen was in constant requisition; as, besides editing the Oriental Observer, she wrote for the Annals, and such like works. Her health suffered under these exertions, and in the following year she returned to England, “looking forward to a less confined theatre for the display of her talents and acquisitions.” Her health was re-established by the voyage, and she was well received in the literary circles of the metropolis, the field of her labours for the next eight years.

In 1839, Miss Roberts formed the desire—or, as likely it was, a literary project—to return to India, selecting a new field for observation, and engaging to transmit, on the route, a regular series of papers for the Asiatic Journal. The same number of the Journal which contained the last of her papers, describing her adventures on the Overland route, contained the announcement of her death. She left England in September 1839, and was kindly received by the most influential people in Bombay. There she undertook to edit a new weekly paper; but her health soon failed, and she died rather suddenly, within a year of the time she had quitted England, and before her literary plans were fully accomplished. Her remains were deposited near those of Mrs. Fletcher (Miss Jewsbury,) at Poonah, in which city she died.

The anonymous author of the Memoir speaks most warmly of the goodness of heart, and amiability of disposition, which distinguished this accomplished lady; who is represented as quite exempt from the pedantry or blucism which are alleged to characterize literary ladies in general. In particular, indeed, we can recall no instance later than Squire Western's sister, Narcissa's aunt, or Mrs. Malaprop. Hannah More, Mrs. Hamilton, Miss Edgeworth, Joanna Baillie, were, with their sisters of lesser note, so far as their friends or the world yet knew, wonderfully like other quiet, unpretending, good-natured gentlewomen; so it is about time that literary ladies ceased to be complimented upon not being very outré in their head-dresses, and conceited or pedantic in their manners. —From the Memoir we pass to Miss Roberts' Fragmentary Work. She went from London to Paris by steam, and hers is the first voyage of the sort which we have seen in print. From the Tower Stairs to Havre is but every-day work; from thence to Rouen, still by steam, is rather more novel; but we shall at once pass through the city of Rouen, which is now tolerably familiar to the English public by means of engravings, panoramas, or actual inspection of this picturesque and historical place. Miss Roberts and her friends, by the by, bestowed a good deal of superfluous pity upon the inmates of the high piles in the Square of Rouen—the inhabitants of those suites of rooms, rising tier above tier, "which it must be absolutely impossible to keep free of vermin of every description;" as if vermin had a greater predilection for houses running far up into the heavens, than for those not so high, which are continued in long lines. The steamer in which they ascended the Seine from Rouen to Meulan (from whence they went next morning by the railroad to Paris,) was elegantly fitted up, and had on board a first-rate restaurant. This little voyage is picturesque and interesting. At Elbeuf, La Roquette, and other places, they halted to pick up passengers, and had leisure to look at the farm-houses and chateaux on the banks of the river.

The banks of the Seine present a succession of pictures, all well worthy of the pencil, and those who are fond of the picturesque, and who have time at their disposal, will find the voyage up the river replete with the most interesting materials.

The first sight of the vineyards, which began to spread themselves up the steep sides of the hills, delighted us all; and our prospects now began to be diversified with rock, which in a thousand fantastic forms showed itself along the heights. The country seemed thickly spread with villages, many at the edge of the water, others receding into winding valleys, and all boasting some peculiar beauty. Whether upon a nearer approach they would have been equally pleasing, it is not possible to say; but, from our position, we saw nothing to offend the eye, either in the cottages or the people; some of the very humblest of the dwellings boasted their little gardens, now gay with sun-flowers and dahlias, while the better sort, with their bright panes of glass, and clean muslin window-curtains, looked as if they would afford very desirable homes.

A present of a bottle of wine made our boatmen very happy. They produced one of those huge masses of bread, which seems the principal food of the lower classes, and sat down to their meal with great content.

The next place of interest to which we came was Rosny, a village famous in the pages of history as the residence of the great and good, the friend and minister of Henry IV., the virtuous Sully. Our boatmen, who were not great antiquaries, said nothing about the early occupants of the chateau, exerting all their eloquence in praise of a later resident—the Duchesse de Berri. This lady rendered herself extremely popular in the vicinity, living in a style of princely splendour, and devoting her time to acts of munificence. Every year she portioned off a bride, giving a dowry to some respectable young lady of the neighbourhood, while to the poor she was a liberal and untiring benefactress. The boatmen blessed her as they passed, for to all she sent wine; and, upon fête-days gave banquets to the rural population, to whom her remembrance will be ever dear.

This chateau has since been purchased by an English banker, but was then untenanted. Miss Roberts speaks rapturously of the river scenery. The journey to Paris is usually made in a day, by the river and the railroad; but the steamer by which Miss Roberts went, was a slow sailer against the stream.

Miss Roberts saw little of Paris; and September, in which she reached that city, was, besides, the very heart of the dull season. She proceeded by the diligence to Lyons; and though the foliage of the vines had faded, she saw no reason to complain of the scenery, though missing the luxuriant trees and rich verdure of England. The inns on the road were found tolerable, and Lyons a splendid city, with an air of antique grandeur. In the steamer by which she and her female friend proceeded down the Rhone to Marseilles, they met with a good many English, and what was better, or at least more rare, with beautiful and varied river scenery. It is impossible to tell how often the baggage of the fair travellers was overhauled between Havre and Marseilles; gens-d'armes coming swoop upon them at every corner. It would really be desirable that English travellers of known respectability, especially ladies, obtained a special firman from Louis Philippe, before visiting his dominions. The gallantry of Mehemet Ali shines in the comparison. There is no detention, no custom-house or gen-d'arme annoyance, in his territory. The captain of the steamer carrying the mail from Marseilles to Malta (on its way to India through Egypt) was named Goldsmith, and was a descendant of the poet. Could any one of that sweet blood fail in cordial kindness, and good-nature, or be left without regret! But his vessel went no farther than Malta. Of this island and its sights, as of the other places at which she touched, Miss Roberts gives a minute description.

At Malta, the ladies embarked in the Volcano steamer, in which they were to go to Alexandria, and soon had deeper reason to renew their regret for the loss of Captain Goldsmith.

It is thus English ladies travelling alone were treated in a government vessel, and we make a point to give such facts all the publicity in our power, were it but "to shame the rogues."

Upon getting alongside of the Volcano, our baggage was placed in this boat; Miss E. and myself were then handed in, and cast adrift, to my great astonishment; for not having had any previous intimation of the method to be pursued, I was not at all prepared to hold on, as I believe it is called, without assistance. Miss E., however, who was more observant, hooked her parasol into one of the ropes, which she subsequently caught. We were now to be taught a new lesson—the extreme nonchalance with which the officers of a government steamer treat the passengers who have the misfortune to choose these boats instead of making the voyage on board merchant vessels. Some minutes elapsed before any notice was taken of us, or any assistance afforded in getting up our baggage; our own people being obliged to look on and do nothing, since, had they touched the ship, they would have been obliged to perform eighteen days of quarantine.

Upon reaching the deck, we requested that our baggage might be taken down into the ladies' cabin, in order that we might get our small dormitories put to rights before the rest of the passengers came on board; but, though it could have made no earthly difference to the people employed, we met with a refusal, and the whole was deposited in the grand saloon, already encumbered with luggage, every quarter of an hour adding to the heap and the confusion, and the difficulty of each person recognizing the identical carpet-bag or portmanteau that he might claim as his property.*

The remarks ought not to have been suppressed; unless there has been enough said to enforce redress of similar grievances.

One of Miss Roberts' fellow-passengers in the steamer was a young man returning from England, where Al had maintained him for ten years, for the general purposes of education, and to acquire a knowledge of ship-building. He had become strongly attached to European customs, but felt uneasy lest his change of dress and appearance should shock the feelings of his friends, and particularly those of his mother, before whom he resolved not to appear until he had re-assumed his Egyptian habit. Of Alexandria, travellers have spoken so disparagingly, that Miss Roberts was agreeably disappointed in its exterior appearance. At the hotel (Rey's) she found every comfort she could desire; and from Mr. and Mrs. Waghorn, and the Consul-general, Colonel Campbell, she and her fellow-passengers, four solitary ladies and a baby, with one or two attendants, experienced the greatest kindness. They were visited at their hotel by their Egyptian fellow-traveller, who brought along with him another intelligent countryman, a staff-officer in the service of the Pasha, but who had been educated in England, and who spoke well, and in good English, on every subject broached.

In a wretched boat, these poor ladies went by the canal to Atfee, on their route to Cairo. Even by Miss Roberts' description those rat-infested boats which sailed on the Ganges a dozen years since, were paradisiacal to this. The slow rate at which they proceeded, enabled them to see a good deal of the country and the people. But the night voyage! It is horrible!

We regretted much the absence of moonlight, since, the moment the day closed, all our amusement was at an end. Cockroaches, as large as the top of a wine-glass, made their appearance; we heard the rats squeaking around, and found the mosquitoes more desperate in their attacks than ever. The flies with one accord went to sleep, settling in such immense numbers on the ceiling immediately over my head, that I felt tempted to look for a lucifer-match, and put them all to death. The expectation, however, of leaving the boat early the next morning, deterred me from this wholesale slaughter; but I had no mercy on the mosquitoes, as, attracted by the light, they settled on the glasses of the lanthorn.

Atfee, the small town or village at the end of the canal, is in keeping with the rest. The party were now upon the banks of the Nile. The Pasha happened to be in this place at the time, and of him they obtained a passing glimpse.

The pasha had taken up his quarters at a very mean-looking house, and he soon afterwards made his appearance in front of it. Those who had not become acquainted with his person by portraits, or other descriptions, were disappointed at seeing a common-looking man, short in stature, and very plainly clad, having formed a very different idea of the sovereign of Egypt. Not having any proper introductions, and knowing that the pasha makes a great favour of granting an audience to European ladies, we made no attempt to address him; thus sacrificing our curiosity to our sense of decorum. There was of course a great crowd round the pasha, and we embarked for the purpose of surveying it to greater advantage.

Our boat was moored in front of a narrow strip of ground between the river and a large dilapidated mansion, having, however, glass windows in it, which bore the ostentatious title of Hôtel du Mahmoudie. This circumscribed space was crowded with camels and their drivers; great men and their retainers passing to and fro; market people endeavouring to sell their various commodities, together with a multitudinous collection of men, dogs, and donkeys. I observed that all the people surveyed the baby as she was carried through them, in her native servant's arms, with peculiar benignity. She was certainly a beautiful specimen of an English infant; and in her pretty white frock, lace cap, and drawn pink silk bonnet, would have attracted attention anywhere; such an apparition the people now assembled at Atfee had probably never seen before, and they were evidently delighted to look at her. She was equally pleased, crowing and spreading out her little arms to all who approached her.

The smallness of the boat rendered it necessary that I should open one of my portmanteaus, and take out a supply of clothes before it was sent away. While thus occupied, I found myself overlooked by two or three respectably-clad women, who were in a boat, with several men, alongside. I did not, of course, understand what they said, but by their gestures guessed that they were asking for some of the strange things which they saw. I had nothing that I could well spare, or that I thought would be useful to them, excepting a paper of needles, which I put into one of their hands, through the window of the cabin. The envelope being flourished over with gold, they at first thought that there was nothing more to be seen, but being directed by signs to open it, they were in ecstasy at the sight of the needles, which they proceeded forthwith to divide.

The voyage from Atfee to Cairo was more comfortable; and the ladies enjoyed the protection of a clerk of Mr. Waghorn's, who had charge of expediting that enterprising man's private mails. The following passage is pleasing and graphic:—

We were much pleased with the alacrity and good humour of our boatmen, and the untiring manner in which they performed their laborious duties. When a favouring breeze allowed them to rest, they seldom indulged in sleep, but, sitting round in a ring upon the narrow deck, either told stories, or were amused by the dancing of one of the group, who, without changing his place, contrived to shift his feet very vigorously to the music of his own voice, and that of two sticks struck together to keep the time. They frequently used their oars in parts of the river where they could not find a towing-path, and when rowing, invariably accompanied their labours with a song, which, though rude, was not unpleasant. The breeze, which had hitherto favoured us, dying away, the poor fellows were obliged to work harder than ever, dragging the boat up against the stream: upon these occasions, however, we enjoyed a very agreeable degree of quietude, and were, moreover, enabled to take a more accurate survey of the river's banks. Living objects were not numerous, excepting in the immediate vicinity of the villages. I was delighted when I caught sight of an ibis, but was surprised at the comparatively small number of birds; having been accustomed to the immense flocks which congregate on the banks of Indian rivers.

* The author followed up these remarks with others, still more severe, upon the treatment which she and her fellow-travellers experienced on board this vessel; but as these remarks seemed to have caused pain, and as Miss Roberts, without retracting one particle of her statements, regretted that she had published them, it has been deemed right to omit them in this work.—Original Note.

Our arrival at a village alone relieved the monotony of the landscape. Some of these places were prettily situated under groves of dates and wild fig-trees, and they occasionally boasted houses of a decent description; the majority were, however, most wretched, and we were often surprised to see persons respectably dressed, and mounted upon good-looking donkeys, emerge from streets and lanes leading to the most squalid and poverty-stricken dwellings imaginable. The arrival of a boat caused all the beggars to hasten down to the river side; these chiefly consisted of very old or blind persons. We had provided ourselves with paras, a small copper coin, for the purpose of giving alms to the miserable beings who solicited our charity, and the poor creatures always went away well satisfied with the trifling gift bestowed upon them.

Every morning, the janissary and the Arab captain of the boat came to the door of the cabin to pay their respects; with the latter we could not hold much communication, as he did not speak a word of English; we were, nevertheless, excellent friends. He was very good-humoured, and we were always laughing, so that a bond of union was established between us. He had once or twice come into such close contact with some of our crockery-ware, as to put me in a fright; and the comic look, with which he showed that he was aware of the mischief he had nearly done, amused me excessively. He was evidently a wag; and from the moment in which he discovered the congeniality of our feelings, when any dull incident occurred, he was sure to look at us and laugh.

The janissary spoke very tolerable English, and after sunset, when we seated ourselves outside the cabin-door, he came forward and entered into conversation. He told us that a quarrel having taken place between the boatmen of a small vessel and the people of a village, the former came on board in great numbers in the night, and murdered six of the boatmen; and that on the affair being represented to the pasha, he sent three hundred soldiers to the village, and razed it to the ground. He said that he had been in the service of several English gentlemen, and had once an opportunity of going to England with a captain in the navy, but that his mother was alive at that time, and when he mentioned his wishes to her, she cried, and therefore he could not go. The captain had told him that he would always repent not having taken his offer; but though he wished to see England, he was glad he had not grieved his mother. He had been at Malta, but had taken a dislike to the Maltese, in consequence of a wrong he had received, as a stranger, upon his landing.

Amongst the noblemen and gentlemen whom he had served, he mentioned the Marquess of Waterford. We asked him what sort of a person he was, and he immediately replied, "A young devil."

We inquired of Mohammed concerning the magician, whose exploits Mr. Lane and other authors have recorded. At first, he did not understand what we meant; but, upon further explanation, told us that he thought the whole an imposture. He said, that when a boy, about the age of the Arab captain's son, who was on board, he was in the service of a lady who wished to witness the exhibition, and who selected him as the medium of communication, because she said that she knew he would tell her the truth. The ceremonies, therefore, commenced; but though anxiously looking into the magic mirror, he declared that he saw nothing; afterwards, he continued, "A boy was called out of the bazaar, who saw all that the man told him." But while Mohammed expressed his entire disbelief in the power of this celebrated person, he was not devoid of the superstition of his creed and country, for he told us that he knew of another who really did wonderful things. He then asked us what we had called the Mughreebee whom we had described to him: we replied, a magician; and he and the janissary repeated the word over many times, in order to make themselves thoroughly acquainted with it. In all cases, they were delighted with the acquisition of a new word, and were very thankful to me when I corrected their pronunciation. Thus, when the janissary showed me what he called Awdergo, growing in the fields, and explained that it made a blue dye, and I told him that we called it indigo, he never rested until he had learned the word, which he repeated to Mohammed, and Mohammed to him. I never met with two more intelligent men in their rank of life, or persons who would do greater credit to their teachers; and brief as has been my intercourse with the Egyptians, I feel persuaded, that a good method of imparting knowledge is all that is wanting to raise them in the scale of nations.

During our progress up the river, I had been schooling myself, and endeavouring to keep down my expectations, lest I should be disappointed at the sight of the Pyramids. We were told that we should see them at the distance of five-and-thirty miles; and when informed that they were in view, my heart beat audibly as I threw open the cabin-door and beheld them gleaming in the sun, pure and bright as the silvery clouds above them.

Miss Roberts was not disappointed. But we have had enough of the Pyramids of late; and shall only notice this picturesque circumstance, which imparts a novel charm to her description—

We had a magnificent thunder-storm just as it was growing dark, and the red lightning lit up the pyramids, which came out, as it were, from the black masses of clouds behind them, while the broad waters of the Nile assumed a dark and troubled aspect. The scene was sublime, but of short duration; for the tempest speedily rolled off down the river.

The reader is to understand that two-thirds of the volume is occupied with the overland journey. At Boulak there was a fair, through which Miss Roberts and her companion rode on donkeys, to the great amusement of the spectators, and at some risk, it may be presumed, of annoyance or insult, though they were attended by Mohammed and the donkeymen. Next day they entered Cairo, where Miss Roberts made good use of her short time. Among other objects of curiosity, she saw the interior of Mehemet Ali's palace, and early next morning, from her window, a more characteristic oriental sight; a man dashing on the ground and flogging a woman unmercifully, and the spectators offering no interference; and afterwards—

A drunken Englishman, an officer of the Indian army, I am sorry to say, beat several natives of Cairo, with whom he happened to come in contact in the crowd, in the most brutal and unprovoked manner; and yet no notice was taken, and no complaint made. It was certainly something very unexpected to me to see a Frank Christian maltreating the Moslem inhabitants of a Moslem city in which he was a stranger; and I regretted exceedingly that the perpetrator of acts, which brought disgrace upon his character and country, should have been an Englishman, or should have escaped punishment. No sooner have we been permitted to traverse a country in which formerly it was dangerous to appear openly as a Christian, than we abuse the privilege thus granted, by outrages on its most peaceable inhabitants. I regret to be obliged to add, that it is but too commonly the habit of Englishmen to beat the boatmen, donkeymen, and others of the poorer class, whom they may engage in their service. They justify this cowardly practice—cowardly, because the poor creatures can gain no redress—by declaring that there is no possibility of getting them to stir excepting by means of the whip; but, in most cases, all that I witnessed, they were not at the trouble of trying fairer methods—at once enforcing their commands by blows. The comments made by the janissary and our own servant upon those who were guilty of such wanton brutality showed the feeling which it elicited; and when upon one occasion Miss E. and myself interposed, declaring that we would not allow any person in our service to be beaten, they told us not to be alarmed, for that the rais (captain of the boat,) who was an Arab, would not put up with ill-treatment, but had threatened to go on shore at the next village with all his men.

We quote this passage, upon the same principle as that detailing the unhandsome conduct of the officers of the Volcano, to unprotected female passengers. It is, however, much more important. An English gentleman, who acted as volunteer coachman to the ladies, in a drive to the Tombs, showed the same reckless disregard of the feelings of the people; dashing straight-forward in spite of their remonstrances.

In vain did we scream and implore; he declared that it was the fault of the people, who would not remove themselves out of danger; but as we had no accont-courier to clear the road before us, and our carriage came very suddenly upon many persons, I did not see how they could have managed to escape. At length, we drove over an unfortunate donkey, which was pulled down by a piece of iron sticking from the carriage, and thus becoming entangled in the load he bore. I fear that the animal was injured, for the poor boy who drove him cried bitterly; and though we (that is, the ladies of the party) would gladly have remunerated him for the damage he might have sustained, neither time nor opportunity was permitted for this act of justice. On we drove, every moment expecting to be flung out against the walls, as the carriage turned round the corners of streets placed at right angles to each other. At length, we succeeded in our wish to have the grooms at the horses' heads; and without further accident, though rendered as nervous as possible, passed through the gate of the city.

Were the Pasha, or some of the subordinate local authorities, to order a taste of the favourite punishment of the country, the bastinado, to such charioteers, he would only do what Christians at home ought to approve. After this mad drive, they found the donkeychairs—one for each lady—in which they were to commence the journey across the desert, waiting for them at the city of Tombs.

Nothing could be more comfortable than these vehicles; a common arm-chair was fastened into a sort of wooden tray, which projected in front about a foot, thereby enabling the passenger to carry a small basket or other package; the chairs were then slung by the arms to long bamboos, one upon either side, and these, by means of ropes or straps placed across, were fastened upon the backs of donkeys, one in front, the other behind. Five long and narrow vehicles of this kind, running across the desert, made a sufficiently droll and singular appearance, and we did nothing but admire each other as we went along. The movement was delightfully easy, and the donkeys, though not travelling at a quick pace, got on very well.

In first striking into the desert, we all enjoyed a most delightful feeling of repose; everything around appeared to be so calm and tranquil, that, especially after encountering the noises and multitudes of a large and crowded city, it was soothing to the mind thus to emerge from the haunts of men and wander through the vast solitudes that spread their wastes before us. To me there was nothing dismal in the aspect of the desert, nor was the view so boundless as I had expected.

In these wide plains, the fall of a few inches is sufficient to diversify the prospect; there is always some gentle acclivity to be surmounted, which cheats the sense with the expectation of finding a novel scene beyond: the sand-hills in the distance also range themselves in wild and fantastic forms; many appearing like promontories jutting out into some noble harbour, to which the traveller seems to be approaching. Nor were there wanting living objects to animate the scene; our own little kafila was sufficiently large and cheerful to banish every idea of dreariness, and we encountered others much more picturesque.

Soon after losing sight of the tombs, we came upon a party who had bivouac'd for the night.

At the end of the first day's stage, they reached the Rest-house, or Travellers' Bungalow, about night-fall. The building was not completed; and it seems very ill-planned, and was then filthily kept. This willeasly be remedied. The ladies carried their own beds with them; and ham, cold fowls, hard-boiled eggs, fruit; which with tea, made them very comfortable in the desert. Next day, the kafila, the proper name, we presume, for a donkey or camel caravan, proceeded across the isthmus with less inconvenience, than is sustained on an English turnpike road in dusty weather. A kafila, belonging to the native governor of Jiddah, passed them; and they frequently saw small parties of Bedouins, their bold, fierce countenances, and flashing eyes, glaring from beneath their turbans. Miss Roberts pays Ali Pasha the usual compliment, accorded by all English travellers, on the security with which the journey across the desert may now be accomplished, and upon his attention to the convenience of travellers. Such brief notices as the following, are still of interest, though this route will soon be as familiar as the Bath road:—

During this day's journey, we met several parties, passengers of the steamer, coming from Suez. One lady passed us in a donkeychair, with her daughter riding a donkey by the side; another group, consisting of two ladies and several gentlemen, were all mounted upon camels, and having large umbrellas over their heads, made an exceedingly odd appearance, the peculiar gait of the camel causing them to rise and fall in a very singular manner. At a distance, their round moving summits looked like the umbrageous tops of trees, and we might fancy as they approached, the lower portion being hidden by ridges of sand, that "Birnam Wood was coming to Dunsinane."

There is opposition on this road as on more frequented ones; Mr. Hill's people being jealous of those of Mr. Waghorn, at whose hotel, or the hotel at Suez, in his interest, Miss Roberts and her friends found excellent accommodation, though the exterior was unpromising. The guests eat at a table d'hôte. There they were joined by the Portuguese governor of Goa, and his staff. An American, who had crossed the desert, merely to look at the Red Sea, and a young Scotsman, who was on his way to Abyssinia, were at the rival hotel—Hill's. Suez was reached by the interesting route we have traced, before the traveller had been a month from London. The accommodations of the Bombay steamer, the Berenice, were inferior to those of the Volcano, and the attention to the comfort of the passengers not a whit more. The attendance was as bad as possible; and upon the whole matter, Miss Roberts thus enters her protest.

The more I have seen of government ships, the more certain I feel that they are not adapted to carry passengers. The authorities appear to think that people ought to be too thankful to pay an enormous price for the worst species of accommodation. The commandants have not been accustomed to attend to the minutiae which can alone secure the comfort of those who sail with them; while the officers, generally speaking, endeavour to show their contempt of the service in which they are sent, against their inclination, by neglect and even rudeness towards the passengers.

Every day added to the heat and the dirt, and in the evening, when going upon deck to inhale the odours of the hen-coops, the smell was insufferable. When to this annoyance coal-dust, half an inch deep, is added, my preference of my own cabin will not be a subject of surprise. With what degree of truth, I cannot pretend to say, all the disagreeable circumstances sustained on board the Berenice were attributed to the alterations made on the decks. Previously to these changes, we were told, the furnaces were supplied with coal by a method which obviated the necessity of having it upon deck, whence the dust was now carried all over the ship upon the feet of the persons who were continually passing to and fro.

But complaints of steam-packets appear to be general in India. They are comparatively new; and there is, as yet, little field for competition. If every Red Sea steamer were found like the Berenice, passengers would be driven to prefer the long sailing-vessel voyage to India; and the other steamers, the Zenobia and the Hugh Lindsay, were said to be much worse. In the Berenice, there were no beds—no water, or water in no proper quantity—and no comfort of any sort. They took in water and coals at Aden; a place which steam-navigation must soon raise into importance, and which is at present in a singular condition, exhibiting a strangely mingled population of Arabs, Jews, Banians, Soomalees, &c. They had left Suez on the 12th October, and on the 19th, touched at Aden, where they remained for a day; and on the 22d, at Makallah; reaching Bombay on the evening of the 29th: so that the voyage, including stoppages, had been made in less than eighteen days; an immense gain, had the accommodations of the Red Sea steamer been nearly in correspondence with its powers of sailing, and the high rate of passage-money. But all this admits of redress.

The remainder of the volume is occupied by a description of Bombay and its singular population, written in the same manner as the account of Calcutta, in Miss Roberts' former work; and is, like it, limited in general merely to what meets the eye, and to details, and a description of surfaces, which are yet picturesque and strikingly oriental. Miss Roberts appears to have retained a warm recollection of the Bengal Presidency, and is continually comparing Calcutta with Bombay to the disadvantage of the latter, even when labouring to be impartial in her estimate of the rival Presidencies. The disadvantages, indeed, are not such as a philosopher or statistic will much regard, as they are generally confined to dress, attendance, and the appointments of the table; and to the shops, which are all inferior to Tulloch's in Calcutta. An immense drawback upon Bombay, now become the rendezvous of steamers, is the total want of hotels and boarding-houses, where strangers may at once find comfortable accommodation. There is also a total want of public amusements; but that is of less consequence, though felt by those having no introductions, nor local connexions.

Miss Roberts, in noticing obvious inconveniences, also suggests many useful small reforms or improvements. The powers of steam have now marked Bombay as the rising Presidency, and as likely to become the seat of the Supreme Government if India is to remain a British colony. Miss Roberts concludes, that nothing short of a rail-road between the two Presidencies can avert this catastrophe; but to this there are many obstacles. Bengal, which went to taunt Bombay as "a fishing village," and her inhabitants as "the benighted," because European intelligence was so late of reaching that place, is now, in her turn, by the agency of steam, thrown into the shade, and become "the benighted." The Anglo-Indians of Bombay may, in these pages, read a useful lesson. Detraction—ill-tongues, the proverbial vice of English society, is said to flourish among them, as may be expected in all limited communities of men and women promiscuously collected from every quarter of the native kingdoms, at an age when the moral education is necessarily still imperfect. Bad servants—the special grievance of the English everywhere—is also felt here, and with dreadful aggravations. Miss Roberts speaks most rationally upon this head, and lays down an excellent rule.

Anglo-Indians, however, seem to be more tormented by these domestic plagues than any other set of people. The instant a stranger lands upon Asiatic ground, we hear of nothing else. It is considered to be polite conversation in the drawing-room, and delicate-looking women will listen with the greatest complacency to the most brutal threats uttered by their male associates against the wretched people whom hard fate has placed about their persons. By some mischance, those very individuals are equally ill-served at home; the greater number who return to England being either rendered miserable there, or driven back to India in consequence of the impossibility of managing their servants. As far as my own experience goes, I have always found it easy, both at home and abroad, to obtain good servants, at least quite as good as people, conscious of the infirmities of humanity in their own persons, have a right to expect. My simple rule has been, never to keep a person who did not suit me, and to treat those who did with kindness and indulgence. The system has always answered.

The rule is excellent; but it must be borne in mind that Miss Roberts, as a single lady requiring little help, has probably not been much tried or afflicted by the national evil.

The most pleasing feature of Bombay, is the importance of the natives, who form a large portion of the wealth and intelligence of the settlement. Most of them speak excellent English, and many are well educated. Miss Roberts is afraid that the amusements of Anglo-Indian society—the eternal quadrilles, waltzes, and gallopes, which they are invited to witness—must appear not a little frivolous and derogatory in the eyes of Parsee, Mohammedan, or Hindoo gentlemen. Many of these rich native merchants now send their sons to Elphinstone college. The best houses in Bombay belong to them, many of which are richly furnished and fitted up with infinite taste and elegance, in a style which seems to combine whatever is best in oriental splendour, with the most refined European convenience.

As the last relic of its accomplished author, we have perhaps attached more literary importance to this volume than, critically speaking, it may deserve; and yet we are confident that no one reader will think these parting words too much.

MR. COMBE'S NOTES ON THE UNITED STATES, DURING A PHRENOLOGICAL VISIT IN 1839-40.*

We have for several years paid so much attention to every work of Travels in the United States, that a tolerably fair idea of that great country might be formed from Tait's Magazine alone. With Mr. James Stuart we started nine years since; we do not expect to conclude with Mr. George Combe: the vast field is but opening.

The present delicate and critical state of our relations with America, would have made us turn with eagerness and anxiety to the report of the latest traveller in the States, although he had not been gifted with the same powers of observation and reflection as Mr. Combe. The chief objects of his tour were, of course, Phrenological. He went to America to teach and spread the doctrines of the sect, of which he is at once the head and the most efficient arm. And had this been his only object, we certainly should not have intruded a subject upon our readers which has its own appropriate organs, and which we do not consider greatly for edification, even if the public had not had a surfeit of that new and complex mechanism of a material mind, which is sometimes, by its disciples, named science, and sometimes a philosophy. Laying aside the bumps, craniology, and organology, frankly and at once, and keeping as clear as possible of the snares and pitfalls, which at every page they place to entrap the unwary reader, we shall, in the following brief remarks, consider Mr. Combe's work as that of a shrewd, practical, well-informed man, directing his faculties to the solution of some of the great social and political problems which deeply interest the New and the Old world. Religion, government, education, and manners, are the leading topics of his speculations; and however much we may differ about the means to be employed—the grand engine which he proposes for effecting all physical and moral improvement—phrenology to wit—we must, in a great majority of cases, approve and admire the aims and ends of its apostle.

As was to have been expected, every incident and fact bearing on phrenology, of which we hear, tends strongly to confirm its doctrines; nor does Mr. Combe evince much more candour or toleration for unbelievers than do those unchristian divines of Britain and America, whom he so often, and so deservedly, stigmatizes. There are but two causes of disbelief which he recognises. The one is ignorance, or rather stupidity—that is, a deficiency of the bump of causality; the other deficiency in an organ on the top of the skull, christened conscientiousness, and marked number 16. All doubters and disbelievers are freely placed in one of the two categories—either among the stupid and impenetrable, or the dishonest. This remark applies even more to other works than to the Notes on America. To which class Lord Brougham may belong, we do not presume to guess; nor yet exactly what can have tempted Mr. Combe to travel so frequently and so invidiously out of his way to attack, and, so far as he has the power, to wound one of the most distinguished men of his age;—the friend, and, for a long life, the champion of civil and religious freedom, in the widest sense; of science—of education—of peace—of mankind, black or white—of America as well as England—of every object which Mr. Combe professes to admire and love,—save and except phrenology. As we are unbelievers in bumpology altogether, we shall not suggest, that, if there be organs at all, there must be many more than are hitherto recognised, and, among others, such an organ as that of vindictiveness. There is certainly such a disposition of the mind. If any one travelling in Scotland, had, on his return to America, hastened to publish the uncharitable and unhandsome things which certain anonymous individuals in Edinburgh had said of Mr. Combe—and of which plenty may at all times be heard of him, and of every public man who has made himself obnoxious to a party—such conduct would justly have been pronounced unfair and ungenerous. But Mr. Combe's reports of the sayings of Lord Brougham's anonymous detractors, is precisely the same thing, and worthy of the condemnation which it must receive. Strange, too, that Mr. Combe never appears to have heard a single disrespectful word of any one public man, Whig or Tory, so far as we learn, save only Lord Brougham. Wellington, Peel, O'Connell, Russell,—all are passed over, and no error or blemish seems to have been found in any one of the order save the friend of the people; the champion of the slave; the educator; the founder of mechanics' institutions; the benefactor and ornament of his kind; who, in treating philosophically of the mind, and soul, and destinies of man, has not even incidentally noticed the existence and complicated evolutions, the checks, counter-checks, and balances of the organs, in the newly-discovered mechanism of mind. To this protest, in the case of Lord Brougham, we are tempted to add a few words, condemning a less significant, but equally indefensible attack, on the memory of Hazlitt; whose strong and original character, and peculiar powers, we take leave to think, Mr. Combe does not comprehend; whether the defect arises from want of sympathy, of enthusiasm, or from the deficiency of some material organ which we do not pretend to name. It is, besides, unlike Mr. Combe's usual cautiousness, to marshal the way of Dr. Channing in Great Britain, by stirring up just resentment in the honest admirers of Lord Brougham and William Hazlitt, because, upon no sufficient evidence, he is pleased to believe that they were the authors of reviews of Channing's works, in which he does not, nor do we, entirely concur. Nor does Mr. Combe appear acquainted with the history of Channing's public life up to so recent a period as 1834, since which he has come manfully forward for the abolition of slavery and for freedom; not, indeed, as did Hazlitt, in defiance of calumny, scurrility, and moral persecution, such as few of the advocates of truth have endured in our age; but still in a manner honourable to himself, and beneficial to mankind, though the hottest of the Abolition battle had been fought and gained in New England before Channing joined the ranks. Has Mr. Combe ever read Abdy's* Tour in 1833-4? He must, at all events, know something of the Garrisons and Childs, tried and distinguished soldiers of the cause, long before Dr. Channing had seen it his duty to make open profession of the faith that might have been in him, but of which few fruits were then visible. But Hazlitt is described as wanting, in the phrenological jargon, in the bump of conscientiousness,—because, we presume, during his whole life he had been the open and vehement enemy of all kinds of tyranny, and the chosen aim of the most envenomed arrows of the most scurrilous of the Tory partisan writers. "He," Hazlitt, "laboured under the affliction of disappointed ambition, envy, ill-nature, and distrust of his kind!" says Mr. Combe. Dr. Channing's conversion, or open profession, was tardy; while Brougham and Hazlitt—but it is needless to pursue the case. Dr. Channing has long been a phrenologist; and his imagined reviewers, though two among the boldest, as well as ablest, advocates of truth in Great Britain, were not phrenologists; and therefore want conscientiousness!

Let us pass to matters more congenial, which we find in abundance in these well-filled and well-written, though somewhat hasty and cursory volumes. In them Mr. Combe has either glanced at, or fully discussed many important points, and advanced many opinions in which every calm lover of human improvement must agree, because they are common alike to the phrenologer and the anti-phrenologer; indeed we may at once say of his opinions on physical education, early training, government, punishment, and other topics, as we have more than once done, in the analagous instance of the treatment of the insane—that, provided the phrenological doctors employ the same curative remedies, and moral influences, with other able and enlightened physicians, which we believe they do, we shall not quarrel with their superadded mere talk on bumpology.

There is, as might be predicated of a country in the circumstances of the United States, a much more numerous and active sect of phrenologers there than in Edinburgh, though it is the head-quarters of the doctrine; but where, somehow, it has never yet taken root nor thriven. Mr. Combe says that the opposition originated with the men of science; though the bigotry of the orthodox clergy, and those whom they ride, has also been instrumental in opposing the new revelation. Spurzheim said that Scotland is the most priest-ridden country he ever visited. This, however, is not easily reconcileable with the fact that some of the ultra-orthodox divines, and even Dr. Welsh, the professor of Church History, are stated to be avowed believers. However this may be,—and we imagine the clergy were, at the outset, much more readily captivated than the philosophers and men of science,—it seems certain, that the sect has thriven better on the other side of the Atlantic than at home; and ever since the premature death of Dr. Spurzheim, in 1827, who went among the citizens of the United States, with the enthusiasm and zeal of a primitive apostle, taking no thought for tomorrow, carrying neither purse nor scrip, and bending every faculty to the one object of propagating the faith of the organs, invitations have been coming from time to time to his most distinguished successor, Mr. George Combe, to come over and continue the good work so hopefully begun. In the autumn of 1838 he obeyed the summons, and went to America, accompanied by Mrs. Combe. After a rather unpleasant passage, in a young raw steamer, they landed at New York; and Mr. Combe arranged to deliver lectures on phrenology,—not in the purely apostolic—or strike-but-hear-me! spirit of the enthusiastic German, but very like a calm, sensible, self-respecting Scot, content to speak if an audience could be obtained willing to be instructed.

Having made the necessary preliminary arrangements for lecturing in the winter, Mr. Combe and his lady proceeded on a tour up the Hudson to Albany, and looked on the fine scenery and the spitting passengers with the feelings usual to English people in such circumstances. Newness, and, what is worse, incompleteness, are often forced on the mind of the observer by numerous objects in America; and for this unfinished state of things Mr. Combe very rationally accounts, not by ascribing it to want of discernment and taste, but to want of capital, and to the high price of labour. There is fallacy in his calculations, however. An American who sacrifices £1400 a-year in a mansion-house and grounds, sacrifices no more than an Englishman who expends £700 on the same objects, if the latter get but 3½ per cent for his capital, while the other obtains 7 per cent; but the American, unquestionably, sacrifices to a much greater extent the opportunity of accumulation.

In the principal cities of America, as New York, Philadelphia, and Albany, pigs are seen roaming at large in the principal streets and most elegant squares! This would seem odd enough in Belgrave Square or Charlotte Square; but if an Irishman, instantly on landing, is a free citizen of the State, it is to be expected that he will make his pig equally free with himself.

Mr. Combe seems to have made a point of going to all sorts of churches on most Sundays while in America. His first attendance was at Albany, and on the Baptist minister, a Dr. —. The church was large and handsome; the congregation numerous and well-dressed, as, indeed, was everybody in America, according to their station, save a few drunken and degraded emigrants. But the sermon—

The discourse was sternly Calvinistic, and the preacher sent Heathens, Mahometans, Catholics, Deists, and Atheists to eternal perdition, with as much zest and self-assurance as could have been exhibited by the most orthodox divine in Scotland.

Many, or nearly all, the churches in the Atlantic towns are handsome structures, and well fitted up;—indeed, the personal accommodation as much resembles that of an opera-house as a church; pews like opera-boxes, have cushions covered with damask, and every other appliance of luxurious devotion. The Sabbath is very strictly kept in New England; yet, even there, it is considered over at sunset, after which social parties are arranged, visits are made, and the piano-forte may be heard even in Boston, and over all the hallowed land of the Pilgrim Fathers. Sabbath-evening social, family and friendly unions, were the old custom of godly Scotland; but we have become a great deal too ascetic for such harmless and praiseworthy intercourse, save under the rose, or in defiance of “the folk;” by which appellation Mr. Combe distinguishes that awful, Gorgon-headed Mrs. Grundy, of the modern Presbyterian world, who will not let us have fresh milk to drink on Sunday, nor eat fresh bread on Monday morning; nor yet open a new newspaper, to see if it be peace or war; nor solemnly, and in the devout spirit suited to, and arising from, the rite, “bury our dead out of our sight” on the first day of the week.

We knew a shrewd old Scotchman, who used to say, that none would ever play whist well until they played “for a bodie siller.” Another of the same, an emigrant long settled in America as a farmer and proprietor, remarked to Mr. Combe, (and the same thing holds of many nations,) that “the only way to know the Americans thoroughly was to come siller with them.” He accordingly got his first practical lesson in arranging with the carriage-hirers of Albany, where the owner of the best carriage finally agreed to make the journey for fifty-six dollars, while the others had demanded seventy for carrying him to Worcester by a leisurely five-days’ journey. Now the same thing happens to travellers in every country of the world. How do the phrenologists account for coach-hirers, jockeys, porters, fishwomen, and cabmen being universally, more or less, deficient in No. 16., and doubly endowed with No. 8.?

The travellers went to Worcester by New Lebanon, a village most beautifully situated, and making, indeed, a beautiful picture even in words.

This village lies in a paradise of beauty, on the side of a hill, sloping to the south, and looks down on a basin completely shut in by rising grounds, and embosomed in wood. The foliage now wears the deep, rich-toned variegated livery of autumn, to convey an adequate idea of which surpasses the powers equally of the pencil and the pen. The houses are chiefly of wood, painted pure white; they are unpretending, yet not inelegant in architecture, and well kept. This village is also a watering place, and there are several stupendous hotels to receive the visitors in summer.

They passed through Pittsfield, and arrived at Peru, on the summit of the Peru mountains;—why not the Andes? The Americans beat all the world, save French milliners, for high-sounding names. The roads were occasionally found heavy; and Mr. Combe assigns the cause of their bad condition to reasons as universally present as the cupidity of persons having horses and carriages to hire out. The farmers find their own purposes served well enough by the corduroy roads, and, like their Scotch brother in the Cottars of Glendurnie, they grumble at “biggin’ a brig to serve a’ the folk o’ the glen.” On the way between Chesterfield and Northampton, though the country has long been closely settled, it is not yet nearly cleared, which, indeed, holds of many portions of New England; and we have this other pretty and Transatlantic rural picture; though that of animated life which follows, is very unlike what we usually fancy of the roaring, tearing, boisterous people of America. But this was sober, strait-laced New England. In New York, or the West, matters assume a different aspect.

We passed several portions of the forest only recently cleared; many fine old trees were lying rotting in the sun, while some were standing, huge, tall, and gaunt, bearing the marks of fire which had been applied in vain to consume their stubborn strength. Apple-trees everywhere abound, and are loaded with that superior fruit which is imported into England, excelling in the richness of flavour the best produce of the British orchards. It is so abundant, and grows so completely exposed on the road side, that the way-faring traveller may supply himself at this season without purchase, and with scarcely an infraction of justice, as it seems, by its situation, to be presented to his use.

Mr. Combe afterwards attempts to explain the causes of the reserve and taciturnity at public tables, by the master-key of the bumps—but unsuccessfully, as we think. Though artificial rank abounds in England, it is not fixed, immutable, as in Germany. The daughter of the rich pork-butcher in England marries a banker, and the well-dowered daughter of the banker, in turn, marries a noble, and becomes a baroness or a countess. Wealth waxes omnipotent; and fashion, supported by wealth, predominates over jealous and exclusive rank, and becomes in its turn exclusive. All persons below the highest aristocracy are fighting to get upward here—exactly as in America;—and it is from the very same causes that they jostle their competitors in the race, and push aside all they fancy below them.

In conversation to-day, the following statements were made to us. As they interested us at the time, I present them to the reader. “One cause,” we were told, “of the taciturnity which we have remarked at the public tables in New England, is the fear of inferior people intruding themselves and fixing an acquaintanceship on persons of superior condition and attainments. All persons are pushing upwards in this country, and as there is no artificial rank, every one guards his own station with extraordinary jealousy.”

The absence of artificial rank does not satisfactorily explain these peculiarities. In England artificial rank abounds, and yet the same jealousy of intrusion is there equally conspicuous. In Germany there is also artificial rank, while the intercourse between the different classes of society is much more cordial and unrestrained. The real cause seems to me to lie in the cerebral organisation of the people.

There was much more ease and freedom of manners among the different classes of society in England, sixty or a hundred years ago, than there is now, and, indeed, a close resemblance to the present manners of Germany; but the English brain has not, we apprehend, undergone any great change since that time, though the increase of population and wealth among the middle classes has greatly changed manners. People who travel much, like the English and Americans, naturally become more fastidious as to their associates than German fixtured. Few to make watering-place friends, because they must often find it necessary to drop them, and from good causes.

In the State Lunatic Hospital, at Worcester, Mr. Combe saw an apparatus for ventilation and heating, which we recommend to the attention of every one interested in these important elements of health and comfort. The details are too long for us, though we cannot resist taking the phrenological beau idéal of the superintending physician of a Lunatic Asylum:—

Dr. Woodward, physically and mentally, is admirably adapted for his situation. He is in the prime of life, and has large limbs, a large abdomen, large lungs, and a large head. His temperament is sanguine nervous-bilious, with a little of the lymphatic. The organs of the propensities are well developed, but those of the moral sentiments and intellect decidedly predominate. This combination produces a powerful and commanding person, characterized at once by vivacity, energy, and softness; and a mind in which intellectual power is chastened by the most kind and cheerful moral dispositions. I regard these qualities as of great importance in the superintendence of a Lunatic Asylum.

Mr. Combe was now in the manufacturing districts. He went by the railroad from Worcester to Boston. In church was this sight:—

Mrs. Trollope and Mrs. Butler have both adverted to the American custom of gentlemen sitting with their feet elevated. In the pew before us in church to-day, a gentleman sat with his feet on the top of the board which holds the psalm-books.

In Chesterfield's time an awkward fellow was always at a loss how to manage his sword: the gentlemen of America are in a similar predicament with their legs.—We find here a hint, which we copy for the benefit of Mr. Baring, Chancellor of the Exchequer. The State of Massachusetts imposes a tax of one per cent. on bank capital; and the banks of this State, either from excess of caution, or the energy of speculation necessary in order to pay this tax, are found the most stable in the Union. Bancroft, the author of the well-known History of the United States, is the Collector of the Customs at Boston. Mr. Combe found him not more intelligent, than civil and obliging, in the discharge of his duties.

A small government grant has, we think, lately been made for printing books for the use of the blind. Dr. Howe, who presides over the institution for the blind in Boston, made a remark worthy the attention of those who shall apply that grant:—

Experience has shown that a variety of type is as easily mastered by the finger as by the eye. Persons who see, soon learn to read with equal facility printed works in roman, italic, and capital letters; even the German type presents few difficulties, after the first three lessons, to foreigners who study that language. The same faculties of the mind which take cognizance of the forms of the letters through the eye, recognise them through the medium of touch. The chief difference between the two senses is, that the eye receives an impression through the medium of light, without contact with the object, while this is indispensable to the operation of the other sense. This fact supercedes much of the importance which persons who see have attached to the invention of peculiar forms of letters for the use of the blind.

We recommend the whole details to the attention of persons connected with institutions for the blind. The methods spoken of greatly simplify and extend the art of printing for this most interesting class of sufferers. The State of Massachusetts, which, like some other small States, appears to interfere quite as much as is necessary in the affairs of its subjects, among other things lately directed the formation of school libraries:—an excellent idea such libraries—but then the State Board were to decide upon every book, direct about the printing, paper, binding, &c.; in short, do everything but pay. We mention all this to show that, after the Board had been formed, the matter devolved to private persons, publishers—and the ablest and best men of all parties and sects were appointed to improve the existing books, or, which may be more questionable, to prepare new ones themselves. Their prospectus states, that

“The most eminent literary men have been, or now are, engaged in the execution of the plan. The names of Washington Irving, Dr. Wayland, the two Everetts, Greenwood, Bigelow, Rantoul, Silliman, Judge Story, Professors Leiber, Potter, Stowe, Edwards, Olmsted, Alden, Tucker, Judge Porter, &c., &c., are a pledge to the public, that nothing has been omitted, which can give the value of adaptation and fitness to the series.”

That the books explaining the great doctrines of Christianity might be kept free of sectarianism, the clergy of different persuasions are employed to watch over each other: the Unitarian over the Trinitarian, the Universalist over the Calvinist. We do not see how the thing will work. In like manner, as regards sublunary concerns, Governor Everett and Mr. Rantoul are to protect the children from having their minds poisoned by false doctrines on “sub-treasures and banks.” It was proposed to augment the salaries of teachers in the State, which are at present lower than those of day-labourers; but that, it seems, could not be afforded.

When it was maintained as a reason against augmenting the salaries of the teachers, that the State could not afford any increase of its annual appropriations for schools, the question was put, in derision, “Whether something more than one-six-hundredth part of its welfare might not come from the enlightenment of its intellect and the soundness of its morals?”

An individual offered a considerable sum to the Legislature of Massachusetts for the establishment of Normal Schools, provided the public gave as much; and this has been carried, and three Normal Schools are now in operation.

We leave our readers to form their own idea of the refinement of many of the inhabitants of Boston, from the horrid boring which they inflicted on poor Mr. Combe, who lays half the death of Dr. Spurzheim to their account.

From the first day that my arrival in Boston was announced in the newspapers, I was waited upon at every hour between 8 A. M. and 10 P. M. by a succession of visitors, many of whom called without introductions, and kept me in a state of constant and fatiguing cerebral excitement; and this continued for day after day. Many of these visits were most gratifying to me, but some of them were made by individuals impelled chiefly by curiosity, who put a succession of common-place questions, received equally common-place answers, and retired, leaving scarcely an interval between their departure and the renewal of the interrogatories by a succeeding visitor. I seriously thought of getting the questions and answers printed and posted up in some conspicuous part of the room, where they might be read, while I might sit quietly and be looked at.

A phrenologist excites the American love of the marvellous—he seems to be regarded as a sort of Katerfelto. One person afterwards inquired of Mr. Combe what he had done with the giant and the dwarf he had in company when he lectured at Syracuse!—where he had never been in his life, though a counterfeit, assuming a name very like his, had been there, lecturing upon phrenology, with the above showy companions. We have said that the government of Massachusetts seems to have a rage for legislation. No laissez aller—no let us alone with them. When the Temperance Movement was in vogue, the legislature ordained that no person should purchase spirituous liquors in less quantities than fifteen gallons, under a heavy fine for each offence; but apothecaries and physicians were, at the same time, licensed to sell what rum and brandy they saw fit.

The Puseyites, the priests of the Anglican church, are contending anew for the power of the Keys of Heaven; but some of the tee-total doctors seem also contending for the equally available power, for selfish purposes, of the Keys of the Cellar. If no one is to drink wine or spirits without the doctor's license, is it a fair inference that the doctors of Massachusetts will be much more frequently called in to nervous and vapourish patients? We would advise all sound Protestants to resist the usurpation of the rights of private judgment, whether regarding soul or body. We are glad, by the way, to find Mr. Combe refuting Fanny Kemble and Miss Martineau's stories about the intemperance of the American ladies, as decidedly as did Captain Marryat. The absurd and unequal law about the purchase of rum only in large quantities was of course eluded.

Excellent persons, true friends to temperance, considered that it had gone too far, for it prevented the great body of the people, who could not afford to purchase a stock of fifteen gallons at a time, from obtaining spirituous liquors of any kind, even for the most temperate use in their families, while it left the rich in possession of the power of indulging their appetites unrestrained.

The law created a great deal of discontent among the mass of the people; and in the phrase of American politicians, both the leading parties, or the Whigs and the Democrats, tried to convert it into "political capital;" that is, to make votes for their side out of popular discontent. As an illustration of this significant phrase, we may instance that foolish and half-tipsy speech of Bradshaw, out of which the ministerial party here contrived to make a good deal of "political capital;" counterfeit coin, but answering a temporary purpose.

From Boston Mr. Combe made an excursion to Lowell by the rail-road; but the reading public have so often, of late, gone over the same ground, that we dismiss this infant Manchester of America with one paragraph, which we trust is well-founded.

The churches are numerous and belong to every sect, Episcopal, Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, Universalist, Unitarian, and Roman Catholic. All subsist in peace, because all are equal in power and privileges, and each pays for that religious instruction which his conscience considers to be right, and he is not taxed for any other.

His second Sunday was spent in the Unitarian church, where the pews are cushioned and carpeted, and where, as in all the churches of Boston, no money is collected. Not there, as in this country, are acquisitiveness and combaticiveness stirred up, when, as Burns sings,—

"A greedy glowr Black Bonnet throws,
And we maun draw our tippence."

I was, says Mr. Combe,—

Struck by the superior elegance and comfort of the voluntary churches of America generally, compared with the condition of the established churches of Scotland. The congregation was genteel in their appearance, but not numerous.

The church service is much shorter than with us, where sermons are lengthening year by year. We have already noticed that Sunday ends at sunset.

Sunday is observed with the greatest decorum in this city; and although the law declares it to terminate at sunset, the only relaxation of observance, which I remarked, was, that political meetings were held on Sunday evenings, and that ladies played on the pianoforte, sang, knitted, or engaged in any light employment, without any sense of sin.

In Scotland, a person would be fined or imprisoned for doing acts after sunset, on the Sunday evening, which in Massachusetts are entirely lawful. Again: in the Revised Statutes of this Commonwealth, it is declared, by Sect. 8, that "no person shall be present at any game, sport, play, or public diversion, except concerts of sacred music, upon the evening next preceding or following the Lord's day," under the penalty of paying a fine of five dollars. In Edinburgh, the best plays and public entertainments are brought forth on the "evening next preceding the Lord's day," or Saturday evening,—and are then most numerously attended: so that in Boston a Christian is fined in five dollars for doing, on that evening, what a Christian in Edinburgh is permitted to do, without any penalty whatever.

These are strange anomalies in the religious world. Whether, first, will the people of Boston open their theatre on Saturday nights, or those of Edinburgh shut theirs up? As in other places, rough jovial conviviality has diminished in New England within the last half century. The gentlemen drink much less wine—and the early hours of dinner, which is taken at two and three o'clock, must always have precluded long sittings; and as the gentlemen uniformly return after dinner to their places of business, dinner and coffee, even when there is company, are over by six o'clock. Some families now entertain in the English style, and dine at so late an hour as six; but this is considered affectation by their fellow-citizens.

Mr. Combe saw a great variety of skulls at Boston, those of Indians, negroes, and Sandwich islanders; every one of them, as usual, confirming the grand theory. One would like to find a little discrepancy now and then, were it but for variety; but no such thing ever occurs. Phrenology is a rule without any exceptions. Indeed, while Mr. Combe was in America, he met with the strongest confirmation which the doctrines have, so far as we know, ever obtained in a living instance. This was in the case of a little girl, whose skull had been fractured when she was only four years of age, and whose self-esteem, and love of approbation, when she was eight, were merely covered by the integuments and the hair.

Both organs wriggled perceptibly, like two lively leeches in the folds of a napkin, beneath the touch of Mr. Combe's finger, in perfect harmony with the stimulus or motive-power of praise or blame, which he skilfully applied to excite them into action.

There is a bad reason for the favourable reception of phrenology in America, and in all slave-holding countries; and that is the alleged natural inferiority of the black race, as indicated by their skulls. Dr. Channing used this argument to Mr. Abdy, at the interview to which we have referred. Mr. Combe appears to have somewhat modified his opinion of the negro head, in which he now says there are so many varieties, that he may perhaps find it rash to assert too much. He was somewhat bothered with ancient Peruvian skulls; but he gets rid of the difficulty by saying that these skulls may have been those of the slaves of the Peruvians. "An inferior and enslaved race may have laboured under the direction of powerful minds."

We have said that Mr. Combe did not go forth in the spirit of Spurzheim. He was often invited to deliver two or three lectures at some town or village, but this he declined for the reasons stated.

They generally offer me twenty-five dollars for each lecture. As the progress of Phrenology has been much impeded by its teachers giving only brief and unsatisfactory expositions of its doctrines, I am under the necessity of declining these invitations.

The most distinguished persons in America—divines, senators, and lawyers—appear to be itinerant lecturers. It seems one of their best resources in a country where professional exertions are often poorly paid.

The instruction conveyed by this method, is comparatively small, but it cultivates intellectual tastes among the people; and it binds the higher and lower minds together by reciprocation of sentiment. To one accustomed to contemplate the indifference with which many of the aristocracy of Britain regard the masses of their countrymen, this effect of democratic institutions is highly pleasing.

In Britain, among the higher classes, only Lord Brougham, it is said, and—rare conjunction!—Sir George Mackenzie, have lectured to the people. Sir George is Phrenology's aristocratic disciple, and merits distinction. Sir Robert Peel has lately lectured to the people; a somewhat fitter companion for the eloquent ex-chancellor; and, we are sorry to say, liberal journals have had the bad taste, and worse sense, to ridicule the attempt. In Tory journals this was natural, and to be looked for.

On a Sunday evening after church, and after the Sabbath was supposed to be over in New England, Mr. and Mrs. Combe went to Brighton, a village five miles from Boston, to attend an educational lecture given by Mr. Mann, one of the clergymen of the city.

We were introduced to a family in the village, who kindly invited us to partake of their evening meal; tea we should call it in England; they, I believe, name it supper. It consisted of tea, coffee, bread, butter, cold meat, preserves, squash pie, and cranberry tart. Before we commenced, our host said grace, in the course of which he introduced a petition for a blessing on Mr. Mann and his efforts to improve the schools of the people, and also on the "strangers who had crossed the mighty deep to communicate their stores of knowledge to the people of this land." The sentiments and language were equally beautiful, and there was no appearance of preparation or ostentation of literary attainments in the prayer. In passing the window of the house, I saw a young woman, apparently about sixteen, with a music-book in her hand, leading a little band of children and servants in singing their evening hymns.

It was the best brains in Boston, the élite of the city, that attended Mr. Combe's lectures. The female heads were especially fine; the men have generally more Benevolence and Veneration than Conscientiousness. Even in promiscuous audiences, the heads of Boston were fair; and the Bostonians, from their skulls, are pronounced to be a people capable of rising to a high degree of civilisation.

The economy of the Americans is displayed in not lighting the street lamps during moonlight; but we think we have seen a compromise between moonlight and lamp-light nearer home.

Voluntaryism occupied a good deal of Mr. Combe's attention. He is decidedly favourable to the principle, though it is attended by some inconveniences. He suggests, as a remedy for the too common occurrence, of the people tiring of their minister, that there should be a rotation of pastors; which Mr. Combe does not seem to know is the exact scheme of John Wesley, and followed in the numerous and far-spread Methodist congregations up to this hour. Dr. Chalmers' grand argument for an establishment is, he alleges, practically refuted in America, for the churches and ministers are found too numerous for the flocks.

In answer to the inquiries of friends in Boston, Mr. Combe gave an account of the Established Clergy of Britain, which, in so far as creeds and catechisms are concerned, also comprehends the Evangelical Dissenters. Whether the description shall be allowed, by the parties interested, to be fair or not, it is perfectly lucid, and a very important section of the work.

In answering my inquiries into their church affairs, some of my Boston friends asked me what objections were urged in Britain against the system of legal establishments for the support of religion. I mentioned a few: The established clergy in England and Scotland support unalterable articles of faith declared by ancient acts of Parliament to be true interpretations of the will of God, and important to salvation: They expel from their livings every one of their own number who presumes to express doubts of the infallible truths of any of these doctrines: They invite their flocks to search the Scriptures, to try all things, and to hold fast that which is good; but if, in following this advice, the flocks chance to arrive at conclusions different from those sanctioned by act of Parliament, they are charged with heresy, denied church privileges, and in private are stigmatized as "bad men." These articles and "Confessions of Faith," moreover, were framed at the very dawn of civilisation, when the arts and sciences, and the philosophy of the human mind, scarcely existed. Consequently, some of the doctrines contained in them stand in direct contradiction to natural truth, while the entire scheme of theology which they propound is widely different from that which any extensive knowledge of mental and physical science, applied to the interpretation of Scripture in the present day, would probably dictate. The professors of these doctrines have the command of the parish schools, and of the universities, and to the extent of their ability they infuse their opinions into each generation as it comes on the stage : But mind cannot be arrested in its progress. Providence bestows on some individuals superior endowments of the moral and intellectual faculties, which lead their possessors into doubt on some points in spite of themselves. But those who are thus gifted have a choice only between two evils ; either to renounce their livings and depart into the wilderness of voluntarism, as outcasts from the fold of the faithful, or to practise hypocrisy. The latter is sometimes preferred, although not without inward struggles. Some of these individuals may be heard praying publicly against "a wicked spirit of unbelief," which is constantly besetting them, and which is probably nothing but the natural operation of their own superior faculties spontaneously suggesting truth, and quietly whispering that some of the dogmas they teach are erroneous. Other individuals, in whom secretiveness is large, and conscientiousness deficient, feel quite at home in the regions of hypocrisy, and enjoy their legal salaries undisturbed by inward visitations. Far from being the advocates of natural science and liberal education, many of the clergy oppose both, and insist that their peculiar articles of faith shall be combined with all public instruction at the expense of the State. They are placed in a false position also in relation to the enlightened portion of the laity, who, while they ostensibly adhere to the parliamentary articles of faith, privately disbelieve them, and, in consequence, while they accord an outward homage to the church, never lose an opportunity to thwart the schemes and defeat the views of the clergy. Conventional hypocrisy, likewise, is the refuge of the philosophers under the dominion of an established church. There is a tacit convention of mutual forbearance between them and the clergy : The clergy make no inquiries into their orthodoxy, and, in return, they leave the clergy to guide the masses in their own paths. The general effect of the system is to chain up the intellect, and paralyze the moral sentiments of the best minds in the highest department of human thought,—theological and moral science.

The intestine divisions in Established Churches,—those between Puseyism, (for which new light O'Connell, as a devout Catholic, now thanks God !) and moderate principles in the English Church, and in the Church of Scotland, between the Non-Intrusionists, and the party who do not wish to set themselves above the law of the land,—were hardly known in America when Mr. Combe was at Boston ; but the voluntary controversy was known to be raging, and Mr. Combe says, "one highly intelligent friend expressed his expectation that the Church of England would fall in five years—I allowed fifty years for the accomplishment of his hopes."

The intestine war has now become so powerful an auxiliary of the Voluntaries, that Mr. Combe may perhaps compound for a shorter period. He seems, by the way, despondingly to intimate that some generations may pass before legislators and rulers are chosen from their cranial developments ; before nations shall choose their ministers, as some phrenologists now select their servants—and (with good security) their clerks and cash-keepers.

Primogeniture, the great support of aristocracy, is unknown in America, where all the children of a family inherit alike. Among the other advantages of this law, Mr. Combe points to one not to be overlooked by bachelors.

The same law renders it more easy for men of superior moral and intellectual qualities to emerge from poverty to wealth. Several such have been pointed out to me, who, having distinguished themselves by their virtues and talents, have married daughters of rich families, and eventually risen to the first stations in the commonwealth. Several clergymen are in excellent circumstances by this means.

It is alleged that the clergy get their full share of the moneyed girls or heiresses, even in Britain,—where the pure aristocracy consider those of the highest rank in America only on a footing with that of our wealthy merchants and bankers, or, at most, as about the equals of our lawyers, or plebeian Members of Parliament. Coleridge sets down the chances, with the female sex, of the black coat as greatly superior to those even of the red. A good deal will depend, we apprehend, upon the age of the demoiselle having a heart and fortune to bestow. The American writers accuse their fellow-citizens of being worldly and ambitious in the marriages of their children ; but Mr. Combe, on the contrary, says, that with the wise and high-minded parents of America, in seeking husbands for their wealthy daughters—

Nature's nobility is preferred, and amidst the trials and vicissitudes of life, high mental qualities are found a surer stay for happiness, than artificial rank. The prospects of the family also are superior. Natural gifts, if possessed by both parents, descend to posterity : artificial rank vanishes in descendants, and leaves no substitute in its place.

This is not very easily reconcileable with the alleged American worship of the dollars ; nor yet with what Mr. Combe, Miss Martineau, and many others, tell us of the exclusives and the castes in Philadelphia, and the other cities, where there is as much family pride as might suffice for a German Duchy. But the rule, Mr. Combe asserts, is not universal ; Mr. Webster is esteemed, and is the greatest political character in Massachusetts—and he is not rich. This proves not much. Even in England, political influence and reputation open a way for the gifted plebeian into the inmost circles of aristocracy. Upon the whole, though an eloquent or insinuating clergyman, or even one not so very eloquent, may occasionally catch a fortune in America, just as at home, fathers, and especially mothers, seem to marry their daughters pretty much upon the common principle of vulgar ambition ; and, as there are no lords nor lords' second sons to be had, sometimes choose a clever and aspiring, though poor lawyer, or a rising member of Congress.

Mr. Combe was told, that such a thing as intimidation at elections, however hotly contested, was unknown—would not be tolerated. We hope this may be so—but should doubt it to hold universally of a country of which he can truly say—

In the United States, whenever party-spirit is strongly excited, the intrinsic merits of a measure, whether in morality or utility, are subordinate considerations ; a despotism of party is engendered and wielded without compunction or control. A higher moral, intellectual, and political education of the whole people, appears to me to be the only remedy for this evil, which is yearly on the increase.

In Boston, he says, "There is no commotion or hostile excitement at the elections ;" an opinion which would not hold of other places. Mr. Combe announces an alarming fact, at the present ticklish moment, when he asserts, that "The of the people exceeds their educational attainments ;" by which he must mean, their knowledge and practical wisdom. The system of education, in the common schools, he does not consider perfect, nor even good ; nor yet that the Americans are an educated people. Many persons at home will eagerly take hold of the following paragraph, to make deductions from it diametrically opposite to those of Mr. Combe. He would educate the people up to the safe enjoyment of their present privileges, and not curtail their rights.

The institutions and actual condition of the people of the United States exhibit at present a heterogeneous aspect to a reflecting mind. The institutions are democratic in a high degree ; for, with a few exceptions, political power is placed in the hands of every man above twenty-one years of age, except he be absolutely insane, a pauper, or a convicted felon, without regard to his wealth, character, or mental attainments. This is not merely a theoretical arrangement on paper, but a practically working system. In point of fact, the masses make and unmake the laws, and every interest of the State is placed at their discretion. One ignorant man is not a fit ruler for a great nation ; nor are ten ignorant men, or a thousand, or ten millions, of ignorant men, more fit to wield successfully the destinies of a great people than one. Numbers do not increase their knowledge, while they add to their confidence and power. Moreover, numbers increase their capacity for evil, and diminish it for good, because they keep each other's ignorance and presumption in countenance. The people become formidable, also, in the fierceness and energy of their passions, in proportion to their numbers, when one common impulse moves them.

The democratic institutions of the United States are only now beginning to develop themselves. The generation of 1775 was trained under a monarchy, and they had the feelings and habits of Englishmen. When their independence was achieved, their mental condition was not instantly changed. Their deference for rank and for judicial and legislative authority, continued nearly unimpaired ; George Washington took the place of George the Third, and the public authorities elected by themselves, came as objects of respect, in place of those named by the English governors. The leading men of each State suggested or proposed candidates for public offices, and the people, as a general rule, adopted them. In this state of things the best educated class continued to rule. But the condition of affairs is now changed. The generation trained to obedience under monarchical institutions is extinct ; a race occupies the field which has been reared under the full influence of democracy. The people worship themselves, as the fountains equally of wisdom and of power. They bend all institutions in subservience to their own views and feelings. They are no longer led by, but they often dictate to, the wealthy and highly educated. Their own education, however, remains essentially unchanged : reading, writing, and arithmetic are its staples, as in the days of yore !

This is an error of the most portentous magnitude, and it is astonishing how so many persons remain blind to it. There are still living a few remnants of the old Federalists, who desire to see the people happy and contented as labourers, but who are as averse to their thorough education as an English Tory would be in similar circumstances. These worthy men forget that their dreams of popular felicity combined with ignorance can never be realized in this country, for the people have obtained power, and they love to wield it. The education provided for them, therefore, in their common schools, should be the most instructive and practical that human wisdom can devise ; for here the masses need every possible light to enable them to discern their true interests in the management of the State. Their governors and legislators are their deputies, and must obey them. Men of great minds may no doubt lead the masses, although ignorant, to good ; but in proportion to that ignorance is the risk that bad men of powerful talents will lead them to evil.

Who is to give them education ? In what time may it be accomplished ? We sadly fear that, like other communities, the society of America, with their reading and writing, must, for a time, be left to the great schools of adversity and experience. But Mr. Combe surely depreciates reading and writing, the keys to all science. These are not education ; but neither are geography, nor astronomy, nor mathematics, nor history, nor any science whatever, efficient education, wanting that master-power which can apply them, and which is not often found merely in the school.

Uninstructed, or partially instructed, as the people are in their common schools, they have freedom and power ; and their sense of justice, nay, their selfish instincts, are powerful teachers.—After transcribing the provisions of an act of the Legislature of Massachusetts, for reclaiming the juvenile offenders of the city of Boston, Mr. Combe continues—

Here the principle of vengeance or punitive justice, as it is more politely called, which is the mainspring of British criminal law, is abandoned. Juvenile offenders are regarded as erring and unfortunate beings, for whom the law prescribes a mode of treatment, at once humane and beneficial towards them and society. In Britain, the laws are enacted by the aristocracy ; in Massachusetts by the people, through their representatives. In Britain, the lawgivers are far removed from personal contact with the poor, the vicious, and the ignorant, and they think only of punishing them when they do wrong. In Massachusetts, the lawgivers live and move in daily communication with the mass of the people, and are dependent on their will for their functions ; they become acquainted with the causes of crimes and the effects of punishment, and they treat offenders with humanity and justice. In Scotland, juvenile offenders, after being committed two or three times to Bridewell for sixty days, or less, for petty offences, are at last transported to New South Wales. In Boston, their first offence would conduct them to this House of Refuge, from which they would not be liberated until they were reformed, provided for by their friends, or had attained to the age of twenty-one if males, or eighteen if females, by which time reason might be better able to govern their actions. This Institution is managed by directors at all times amenable to public opinion : it is open to public inspection ; the inmates are not regarded as undergoing punishment, but reformation ; there is neither desire nor interest in any one to detain them one day longer than is necessary for their own welfare, and the directors are always happy to liberate them whenever, by the interference of their friends, or by other means, they can be adequately provided for. The expenses of the establishment are most properly provided for by public assessment. There is no reason why the benevolent members of society alone should be burdened with the support of such an institution. In Britain, we are still so deeply immersed in the barbarism of the dark ages, that the maxim is very generally admitted to be sound, that society has no right to compel its members to pay money for benevolent objects. It is regarded as a legitimate exercise of legislative power, to levy taxes to maintain prisons and penal colonies for punishing offenders, but quite illegitimate to exact money to rescue the young from the temptations that lead to crime ; it is legitimate to levy taxes to maintain fleets and armies for the purpose of fighting the people of other states ; but illegitimate to raise money to be applied in national education, which, by rendering our own people just, might avert the necessity for fighting altogether !

The children were busily employed when we visited the Institution. They are taught a trade, and receive instruction in the common branches of learning, and in morals and religion.

It is such passages as this which give Mr. Combe's work value in Britain; and highly, indeed, in this view, do we estimate its importance.

In speaking of the immorality involved in what are termed the privileges of the bar, which in this country are becoming a scandal to all but old-fashioned, prejudiced lawyers, Mr. Combe seems to think that the union of the functions of attorney and counsel in the same individual, which is the practice in America, affords some check upon dishonesty; and that an advocate will not lie so frankly where he has investigated the facts of a case himself, as where he is merely instructed by a solicitor's brief, which he is bound to believe. Mr. Combe states the case forcibly.

In the great majority of lawsuits, both litigants are seeking to obtain only what they sincerely believe to be justice; but there are instances of unprincipled and vindictive clients who resort to the law as an engine of extortion or oppression. The division of the offices of solicitor and counsel aids such persons in pursuing their nefarious objects. In London or Edinburgh, an unprincipled client will find out a solicitor as dishonest as himself, and communicate to him a whole tissue of untruths. The solicitor, when he is not called on to do more than convey them to counsel, sets them forth as he received them, or perhaps colours them a little to add to their effect. The barrister believes in his brief as he does in his Bible, and adding a little more colouring to the facts, and much eloquence in the expression of them, presents to the judge and jury a tissue which very much resembles the wrong side of the web of truth. All the parties who weave this tissue affect to be honourable men: The client is merely misled by his own egotism, and the solicitor and counsel are not bound to know that he falsifies. If the client be rich—the greater the falsehoods, the higher in rank is the counsel selected to give them weight and respectability. In such cases the most eminent, and sometimes the most evangelical, men are employed to state the most desperate calumnies and untruths; a duty from which, if the fee be large, they rarely shrink. I am informed that in Massachusetts every counsel is presumed to know the facts from the investigations which it is his duty to make into the evidence in preparing his case; and that extravagant departures from truth, which ordinary sagacity might have avoided, injure his personal reputation.

We hope this is so; and if the lawyer's reputation is injured, within his own profession, by such practices, the bar of America is in a much sounder moral condition than that of England.

Mr. Combe complains, that with the numerous colleges, (as they are called,) or superior schools for boys, in the United States, there are none for girls; for he does not seem to think that such great boarding-schools, or female colleges, as that at which Captain Marryat so adroitly assisted the clever young lady with her French exercise, deserve the reputation which they enjoy; and he rightly argues, that neglect of the female mind must prove highly injurious to a commonwealth, where the people enjoy all the power of the State.

The pauper nurseries, or Farm Schools for pauper children, in the neighbourhood of New York, are little flattering to the country; nor is this a solitary case. In the Representative Assemblies of busy and economical America—

The poor, the insane, and the criminal have few, and these not noisy, advocates, and their interests are postponed. Lastly, It is an unpopular duty to expose the imperfections of any American Institutions; and hence the actual condition of some of these establishments is really unknown to the great body of the upper classes of the city, who would otherwise be well disposed towards their improvement.

Mr. Combe ventured to point out these abuses or neglects in his lectures.

On a visit to the Lunatic Asylum of Bloomingdale, near New York, we have a story which completely realizes the classic fable of Cymon and Iphigenia. We do not undertake to say upon what theory of bump agency Mr. Combe explains the phenomena of this singular case:—

In the course of conversation, a case was mentioned to me as having occurred in the experience of a highly respectable physician, and which was so fully authenticated, that I entertain no doubt of its truth. The physician alluded to had a patient, a young man, who was almost idiotic from the suppression of all his faculties. He never spoke, and never moved voluntarily, but sat habitually with his hand shading his eyes. The physician sent him to walk as a remedial measure. In the neighbourhood, a beautiful young girl of sixteen lived with her parents, and used to see the young man in his walks and speak kindly to him. For some time he took no notice of her; but after meeting her for several months, he began to look for her, and to feel disappointed if she did not appear. He became so much interested, that he directed his steps voluntarily to her father's cottage, and gave her bouquets of flowers. By degrees he conversed with her through the window. His mental faculties were roused; the dawn of convalescence appeared. The girl was virtuous, intelligent, and lovely, and encouraged his visits when she was told that she was benefitting his mental health. She asked him if he could read and write! He answered, No. She wrote some lines to him to induce him to learn. This had the desired effect. He applied himself to study, and soon wrote good and sensible letters to her. He recovered his reason. She was married to a young man from the neighbouring city. Great fears were entertained that this event would undo the good which she had accomplished. The young patient sustained a severe shock, but his mind did not sink under it. He acquiesced in the propriety of her choice; continued to improve, and at last was restored to his family cured. She had a child, and was soon after brought to the same hospital perfectly insane. The young man heard of this event, and was exceedingly anxious to see her; but an interview was denied to him, both on her account and his own. She died: He continued well, and became an active member of society. What a beautiful romance might be founded on this narrative!

What a beautiful pantomime in the hands of genius the first part of the tale might make!

Mr. Combe joins in the frequent complaint of travellers, that the children of America are precocious, spoiled, pert, and arrogant; that their education and domestic training does not sufficiently cultivate their habits of deference, prudence, and self-restraint; and in these respects he gives the preference to his own country, where the boys, the young citizens, are not quite so self-sufficient and presuming, and where few of them wield political power; the sole exception, we think, being the lads of the Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities, among whom the choice of a Chancellor has of late been made a political and party question, to the manifest injury of the boys, and the amusement of the community with Lilliputian contests, where snow-balling would be much fitter exercise.

Appropos to Universities, we are sorry to find—though not very much alarmed—Mr. Combe predicting decay and ruin to our own University, from her obstinate rejection of the new doctrines, and from the blunder committed at the outset by Dr. Barclay, the celebrated lecturer on anatomy, and Dr. Gordon, who both “condemned what they did not understand.” We cannot see of what use Phrenology is ever to be to the general run of mankind, if minds of the order of Barclay and Gordon cannot understand it. The Edinburgh University, by the adoption of the new doctrines, Mr. Combe seriously says, might have arrested her decay, and raised herself to a more exalted height than ever, and, at the same time, contributed very considerably to the prosperity of the city. “While a few rays of the halo cast around her brows by Dugald Stewart still lingered there,” the brain-machinery was discovered: but we must quote the passage. Happily it is not yet too late for the Edinburgh professors to redeem their error—or the Town Council may coerce them for the public advantage:—

While she was yet in this condition, the discovery of the functions of the brain, embodying the true philosophy of mind, and resting on the sure basis of induction, was presented to her. Had her leading minds examined and embraced it, and incorporated it with their teaching, she would instantly have started forward in both her medical and ethical schools at least half a century in advance of all her rivals. The stimulus to thought and improvement which such a step would have created, and the extensive discussions to which it would have led, (and in which, being in the right, she would have triumphed,) would have kept her name constantly before Europe, and have sent forth young and enthusiastic minds, conscious of the soundness of their attainments in the new philosophy, and of their own strength, to spread her fame in every land. She would have stood in the front rank of philosophy for a century to come.

How different has been her actual course!

With every indulgence for the apostle of a new sect—for a man who has bound his whole mind and being to a theory—this is rather too much. “The sure basis of induction!”

But we must take Mr. Combe's work as it is, and have no right to quarrel with his phrenology. Mr. Combe joins in the opinion of Mrs. Butler, (Miss Fanny Kemble,) of the small account made of the matrons of America; who, from the date of their marriage, have neither place nor influence in society, the unmarried girls being the only leaders in society, the only sharers in public amusements. Mr. Combe knew a fashionable young man in New York, who had a very extensive acquaintance among the young ladies of the best families, but had never seen above twelve of their mothers.

The mothers were laid aside, and the young ladies often formed acquaintances, and acted in regard to them for themselves, without judging it necessary to take their mammas along with them.

It must, however, be owned, that the worst consequences which might be anticipated from this system are rarely heard of. These independent young damsels seem fit to take care of themselves; and no doubt they are also guarded by the panoply of opinion and usage.

Mr. Combe's first course of lectures were, we have seen, delivered in Boston, and his next in New York; from whence he went to Philadelphia. They were comparatively short courses; the busy citizens of the United States having less leisure than the blues and loungers, and stray students of Edinburgh. After all that we have read of late concerning the American cities and people, there is little new left for Mr. Combe to tell of mere externals. His attention was given to objects not lying on the surface. He reached Philadelphia about the time that the riots at Harrisburg—the town in which the State Assembly of Pennsylvania meets—were going forward; those disturbances which to us at home presaged a dissolution of the Union. Even in America, he states that the excitement was very great, and all over the Union the proceedings attracted much attention.

The Senate adjourned in confusion, and the mob organized “a committee of safety,” which directed their proceedings. Disorder reigned for several days, during which neither branch of the Legislature could hold a regular Session; “the Executive Chamber and State Department,” says Governor Ritner, “were closed, and confusion and alarm pervaded the seat of Government.” The militia were called out; and obeyed the summons.

In any European country, a tumultuous assault on the Legislature, if successful, would probably have been the forerunner of a revolution; but here it is of far inferior importance. In the United States a revolution can scarcely mean anything but an abandonment of freedom. The suffrage is already all but universal; and the people elect, either directly or indirectly, not only the Legislature but every officer of State. The wildest imagination, therefore, cannot devise a more democratic form of government; and as there is no aristocratic class, having separate interests and distinct feelings from the people, who could usurp power, a revolution could lead only to a despotism. The States, however, are very far removed from that condition in which a despotism becomes possible. There are no poverty-stricken, suffering, and ignorant multitudes, whom an aspiring tyrant can beguile to lend him their physical force to overthrow the liberties of their country. A large proportion of the electors are owners of their own farms, while even the humblest class possesses property and some degree of intelligence. All are reared in the love, not only of freedom, but of power.

We cannot farther pursue reasoning which appears to us conclusive. Yet democracy, as it exists in America, has its drawbacks. Mr. Combe, we think, states them fairly, and as fairly strikes the balance, conscientiously submitting to the greatest happiness of the greatest number. This even consoles him for the ladies being so much occupied in their kitchens in the early part of the day, that they cannot be seated at their ease to receive guests in their drawing-rooms; and so much fatigued in the evenings, that they are disposed to remain by their own firesides, neither often entertaining at home, nor going abroad to be entertained by their friends. He remarks—

A democracy is a rough instrument of rule, in the present state of education and manners in the United States, and I have not yet met with a British radical who has had the benefit of five years' experience of it, who has not renounced his creed, and ceased to admire universal suffrage. But the coarseness of the machine, and its efficacy, are different questions. It is coarse, because the mass of the people, although intelligent, compared with the European masses, are still very imperfectly instructed, when their attainments in knowledge and refinement are contrasted with the powers which they wield. It is efficacious, however, because it is sound in its structure and its mainsprings are strong.

But how admirably are these drawbacks counterbalanced by the manifold advantages! In the following sentences, we have the rationale of democratic institutions:

In the United States, the people have the power to tyrannize, if they please, over the wealthy, the educated, and the refined; in Britain, the aristocracy and middle classes have the power to trample, if they choose, on the masses who have no control over the legislators. So far as my observations extend, the people in the United States have not perpetrated one-twentieth part of the acts of injustice, by their legislation against the rich, which the aristocracy in Britain has done by their legislation against the poor.

I freely confess that while I lived under the British institutions, and enjoyed the advantages which they confer on the upper and middle classes, I, like many others, had a less lively perception of their one-sided character. Even now, after contemplating the greatly superior condition of the masses in the United States, I am bound to state my conviction, that this democracy, in its present condition of imperfect instruction, is a rough instrument of government, and that, were I to consult my personal comfort merely, I should prefer to live in England. But viewing the results of both, as a citizen of the world, and as a man bound to love his neighbour as himself, and perceiving that the one tends naturally to the elevation of the few, and the degradation of the many, while the other tends to the improvement of all, it is impossible not to wish success to the American Republic.

Mr. Combe joins in the now almost-universal condemnation of strictly solitary confinement employed in the reformation of criminals. In describing the system of the Eastern Penitentiary of Philadelphia, he makes many just remarks; though he underrates the healthful mental effect of mere regular labour, of cheerful industry, when he states, that "no advance in moral or intellectual improvement is made during the hours of work;" that nothing is attained "beyond learning a trade." And to gain the desired end, Mr. Combe proposes means that, we fear, will ever be found impracticable, either in America or any other country, unless some band of self-sustained philanthropists, for which we can hardly look, volunteer to be gratis teachers. And even that would not work long and well.

Reading is a very imperfect means of strengthening the moral powers. They must be exercised, trained, and habituated to action. My humble opinion is, that in prisons there should be a teacher of high moral and intellectual power, for every eight or ten convicts; that, after the close of labour, these instructors should commence a system of vigorous culture of the superior faculties of the prisoners, excite their moral and religious feelings, and instruct their understandings. In proportion as the prisoners give proofs of moral and intellectual advancement, they should be indulged with the liberty of social converse and action, for a certain time on each week-day, and on Sundays, in presence of the teachers.

A friend has furnished Mr. Combe with a full account of ELIAS HICKS, the founder of the sect of Hicksites, or Unitarian Quakers. Hicks was a true apostle in his principles and conduct, whatever may be thought of his religious tenets. We were somewhat surprised, considering the recent growth of the Hicksite heresy, to learn that its numbers, in the State of Pennsylvania alone, are 20,000, while the orthodox Quakers amount to only 6,000.

There are now, altogether, 80,000 Hicksites in the United States—an incredible number to have arisen in twelve years.

There is this good of Phrenology, that its disciples find it apropos to everything! It affords a key for the solution of every metaphysical and physical difficulty and anomaly; like the proboscis of the elephant, which can twist a cannon, rend an oak, or pick up a lady's fine needle. By it, Mr. Combe explains "the inward light" of the Quakers, which they say, with the apostle John, "lighteth every man that cometh into the world;" while Mr. Combe explains that the inward light can only be present, above the degree of a farthing candle, with persons having a high crown, or what he calls "large organs of the moral sentiments." "This view," he says, "was new to the Friends; but they told me that it seemed to throw some light upon several anomalies." But we apprehend, an "inward light" that is not common to all real Christians, and all Friends, in a luminous degree, will not satisfy the Quakers. Many of the sect attended Mr. Combe's lectures, though warned against his doctrines, he says, by John Joseph Gurney; but they told Mr. Gurney that "he knew little about the matter." Now, belief in phrenology is the first condition of knowledge. Mr. Gurney had visited the United States on a philanthropic mission.

There is considerable jobbing in the management of private bills in the local legislatures of the States. What we describe as back-stairs influence, is there called "lobbying."

Captain Basil Hall has had so much annoyance on account of his probably rash, but, we have no doubt, honest book, Schloss Hainfeld, and its eccentric heroine, that it is probable he is tired of the subject; else he is here again fairly challenged to a redding of marches by Mr. Combe, the friend of Baron Von Hammer. In this instance, and several others, Mr. Combe has gone somewhat out of his way to attack Englishmen on American ground, admitting that he may have the right of the question. An American—one of those persons who billeted himself upon the single-minded, kind-hearted, and unsuspicious philosopher—has furnished him with some trifling anecdotes of Jeremy Bentham, which it was neither good taste in this Mr. Neale to tell, nor worth Mr. Combe's while to repeat.

The monitorial system—a wonder of its day—has been abandoned in the common schools of Pennsylvania, and a new feature is introduced, which we consider worthy of attention. Female teachers are employed, in the proportion of two women to one male teacher, for each school, and with the best effects.

This arrangement is new in the boys' schools, and one of the directors mentioned that it has been found to answer well. The young women treat the boys with a kindly interest, obviously influenced by sex, and the feeling is reciprocal. The boys, when studying under the young women, are more gentle and refined in their manners than when taught by male teachers, and they perform their tasks more obviously from a desire to please.

Mr. Combe witnessed exhibitions of Animal Magnetism in Philadelphia, that being, though only a revived marvel, one more novel at present than Phrenology. The unbelievers still deny the fact of the French lady successfully operated upon for cancer, during the magnetic sleep; but Mr. Combe's friends asserted the analogous fact, which seems well authenticated, of having seen a tooth extracted from a young woman, who, for the purpose, had been thrown into a similar condition by the operator.

While at Baltimore and Washington, which cities Mr. Combe visited, though he did not lecture in either of them, an audience such as he required not coming forward, he personally learned a little of the aspects and working of slavery. As there is, however, at present on our table an ample Report on American Slavery, sent over at the request of the Abolition Society of Great Britain, of which we purpose to give an early full account, we must be content to state that, wherever Mr. Combe has touched upon the subject, he has expressed those opinions which are now all but universal in this country. If our recollection does not fail, the phrenologists formerly placed the African skull below that of the Red Indian, in the scale of man. Now, Mr. Combe, at least, places the negro considerably above the Red Indian. The ancient lord of the forests of the West is left free, "because he is too worthless a being to be valuable as a slave."

Dr. Sewall, the distinguished anti-phrenological physician of Washington, whom Mr. Combe does not treat either very handsomely or fairly, introduced him to the President, Van Buren, whose bumps, and particularly that of Conscientiousness, are not first-rate.

At this time, a young and beautiful Italian lady, who called herself America Vespucci, appeared at Washington, claiming from Congress a gift of land and citizenship, in right of her high descent. But her sweet smiles, and fine eyes, and charming voice, were quite thrown away upon the impenetrable chairman of the committee appointed to investigate her claims; for she did obtain a committee. "Shew me a reason, a principle intelligible to men-of-business," said this Yankee Joseph Hume; and, alas! there was no O'Connell, nor yet Grantley Berkeley, in Congress. Americus Vespucci had been too much favoured already, in being allowed to deprive Christopher Columbus of his rightful honours; beauty was at a discount at Washington; and the senator stood fast on his "business principle."

Washington was Mr. Combe's most southerly point; and he saw very little that was satisfactory of the West in a hasty and uncomfortable journey to Louisville in Kentucky. He merely notices what he has heard of the lawless, or disorganised and ruffianly, state of society in the regions of the Mississippi. Mr. Combe compares it to that which prevailed in Scotland in former ages; but though the crimes committed are the same in character, America, in these outlying districts, and from its mixed population, made up of the adventurers and ruffians of all nations, appears much more prolific in crime. In Scotland there was some subordination to chiefs and leaders; the feuds were those of clans and families; but, with the buccaniering part of the population of the West, it seems every lawless man for himself. The respectable part of the community are, however, beginning to see the necessity of repressing outrage, and establishing order. It is now unlawful even to draw the Bowie-knife;—it may not yet be practicable to forbid the Bowie-knife to be worn in self-defence.

While Mr. Combe was in the United States, the war spirit broke out,—and fiercely. The Maine Boundary was then the cause; but any pretext seemed sufficient to the excited temper of the people. We, however, rejoice to learn that there is a very considerable enlightened peace-party even among the political leaders, which, but for dread of the masses, would in numbers be still greater. Just as we write, it is with a sad and heavy heart we learn, from the public journals, that war—war between Great Britain and the United States, unwise, unnatural, and only less to be lamented than civil war—appears almost inevitable. What living being can calculate the mischief of such a war to the cause of human improvement, or its disastrous effects on the condition of the human race? And the wickedness and folly of this war, if it shall come, rests mainly with America. These considerations make all the information that can be gleaned concerning the actual state of feeling in America most interesting; and Mr. Combe's report—that of an intelligent observer—is both calm and unbiassed; while he certainly entertains no anti-republican prejudices. The following was written in March 1839, soon after the Tourist had returned from Washington to Philadelphia:—

The Maine Boundary.—War with England.—On the 9th of February Mr. Van Buren presented to the House of Representatives at Washington a report from the Secretary of State, with the relative documents, regarding the dispute with England about the Maine Boundary.

The effect of these discussions on the public mind has been very striking. In every circle into which we enter, almost every voice is raised for war. The battles, both by land and sea, in which the Americans have been victorious over the British, are fought over again in the newspapers; and if one were to judge from the tone of the public mind, war would appear inevitable. Amidst this excitement, however, a few individuals of advanced age and experience may be met with, who, in private conversation, strongly deprecate hostilities; but they regard the popular current of opinion as too strong to be at present stemmed with success.

The opinion is generally entertained in Britain, that the Americans are so intensely devoted to gain, and so averse to taxation, that they are not a warlike nation; but my conviction is different.

The reasons which support these convictions we shall not notice, as they do not appear very conclusive. Nearly the same causes as those alleged exist in Britain—a country which can boast of many more victories and "glorious exploits" than America; and yet the general and earnest feeling here is for peace—a sentiment which, grounded in true wisdom, pervades the working classes more extensively than the higher orders. There is more apparent soundness in the reasons which Mr. Combe adduces why the Americans should cultivate peace; and in his hints that the formation of powerful volunteer corps might lay the foundation of a military despotism.

A few days after Mr. Combe had entered the above passage in his journal, he returns to the subject. YOUNG AMERICA appears as hot-headed—as reckless as YOUNG FRANCE:—

War with England.—This subject continues to occupy almost exclusively the public attention. In my last lecture, on *Combative*ness and *Destructive*ness, I discussed the sources of war, and alluded to the present extraordinary excitement of these organs in the American people, adding that it was a consolation to think that the excitement would not be responded to on the other side of the Atlantic. I proceeded to mention, that since the Reform Bill had become law, political power in Great Britain and Ireland was placed essentially in the hands of the middle classes of society; that they were moral, industrious, and reasonably intelligent; that, from experience of its horrors, as well as from motives of interest, philanthropy, and religion, they were averse to war; and that the disputed territory in Maine would appear to them such a worthless object compared with the evils of hostilities, that they would not echo the warlike defiance sent to them from the United States. After the lecture, a crowd of persons collected around me, and asked if this was really possible! They regarded John Bull as proud, grasping, pugnacious, and still so flushed with his Continental victories, that he would receive menaces from no people on earth, and they expected that the British nation would be roused into a flame equal to their own. The assurances that John Bull had now become older, wiser, and more virtuous than he once was, were received with delight, but not very generally credited. Events, however, verified my prediction in his favour.

It is edifying to observe how this people is acted on. Their leaders are far from participating in their excitement, but they dare not, in the first ebullition of public passion, decidedly oppose them. Mr. Van Buren's message was a rational and statesmanlike document; and I hear the most eminent men in public life daily deploring the headlong impetuosity of their youthful people, and say that they are watching the first moment when the masses may be successfully addressed by reason. There is a want of moral courage, however, in the leaders, which, although easily accounted for, is not the less to be lamented.

Party spirit runs so high, that if, at this moment, the wisest and the best men in the Union, of one party in politics, should present the most forcible yet respectful appeal to the good sense of the people against war, their political opponents would instantly seize the opportunity to manufacture "political capital" out of it. They would pervert every sentence of the address, hurl denunciations of cowardice and want of patriotism against its authors, and offer the grossest adulation to the vanity of the nation.

Those who wish to see how truly Mr. Combe has predicted in this instance, may consult the late proceedings of Congress, as reported in all the English newspapers. More factions, more unpatriotic, more dishonest opposition was never offered to a government, than that shown by members of the retiring government to the party coming into power. These men appear as if they were even eager to embroil their country in a devastating war with Britain, merely to embarrass their successors in office. They are worse than our wildest Tories. Let us finish Mr. Combe's remarks:—

Among other stimulants to the national appetite for war, I hear in conversation, and see in the newspapers, the most exaggerated and absurd estimates of the evils which England must suffer from hostilities. The ruin of her manufactures, the loss of Canada and her West India Islands, the triumph of the Radicals and Chartists, and the bankruptcy of her Treasury, are descanted on, with much complacency, as inevitable consequences of her provoking a contest with the United States. This is the counterpart of the equally absurd lucubrations in which English writers indulge about the consequences to the Americans of a war with Britain: The emancipation of their slaves, the devastation of their south-west territory, the ruin of their commerce and of their Atlantic cities, the dissolution of the Union, universal bankruptcy and anarchy, and, finally, a military despotism, are the certain results with which they are threatened if they shall dare to provoke British wrath.

War between Britain and the United States would be an act of insanity in both, and a disgrace to the civilisation of the nineteenth century; but even this boasting and daring each other to war shows a lingering barbarism in their minds, which it is their duty, as well as their interest, to eradicate as speedily as possible.

An old sagacious Scotchman, long an inhabitant of Philadelphia, settled the American character in a few pithy words:—

"They are most awful braggers; there is no end or limit to their boasting; yet they are the most active people I ever saw. If they only knew how to go right, there is nothing which they might not achieve."

We would fain hope that the braggart part of their character is uppermost at present; that a lull will come, and that something much short of burning their towns and destroying their ships and trade, of which it is painful and disgusting to hear, will tame them down. There is hope in thinking that, if the new government has the sense and virtue to be pacific in its policy in spite of apparent unpopularity, that the country which has carried Gen. Harrison is, notwithstanding present appearances, peaceful at heart. A few weeks after the public temper was in such a state of inflammation, Mr. Combe writes:—

It is lamentable to see the two freest and most enlightened nations of the world thus gloating over the prospect of each other's destruction, in consequence of a dispute about a piece of waste-land, which is not worth more in fee-simple than the value of two line-of-battle ships. It is said here that a million and a half of dollars would purchase the disputed territory out and out! The anxiety for the arrival of the Great Western, with official despatches, is great. Already the derangement in business, the fall of stocks and property, and the apprehensions of another bank-suspension in this city, have cast a gloom over society, and war is already deprecated by the multitude as earnestly as, a few weeks ago, it was invoked.

One of the best actions of Dr. Channing's public life has been his denunciations of the war-spirit. Here he is entitled to every praise; though it is to us inconceivable that this frank avowal of opinions, shared by the best men and soundest thinkers of America and of Europe, should be so very wonderful an act of moral courage in a retired clergyman, enjoying a high reputation in England, of which such declarations are the best support. Had Dr. Channing continued in the quiescent or silent state in which Mr. Abdy found him regarding the Abolition question, the affairs of Texas, or war, he would have occupied a very inferior position on both sides of the Atlantic to that which he now deservedly holds. Immediately following the exaggerated praise of Dr. Channing's moral courage, comes one of Mr. Combe's unhand-some and invidious attacks on Lord Brougham. What has Lord Brougham done to provoke the ill-will of the phrenologists? At worst, he passed over their organology without notice, whether favourable or unfavourable. Mr. Combe, assuming Lord Brougham to be Dr. Channing's reviewer, insinuates that the Doctor is pressed on because he is a Unitarian. Now, we have seen Lord Brougham vilified for being himself a Unitarian. But we must have done.

In Mr. Combe's Journal, the lover of light reading is not to expect the same sort of entertainment as in Captain Marryat's work, and in many of those that have of late appeared on America. There are few, too few, traits of character; few personal anecdotes; no gossip; and no scenic painting—save a charming and natural account of a summer residence on the coast, from the pen of Mrs. Combe:—and we wish she had written more. There is, too, a really fine description of Mr. Combe's emotions, when fairly launched upon the bosom of the Atlantic, which for once shows ideality large, or swelling. To say the truth; we are rather pleased this time to escape the Falls of Niagara, the White Mountains, and West Point.

There is much besides Phrenology, and phrenological squabbles, in these three discursive volumes, not having any intimate connexion with the subject in hand—America; but then generally something worth discussing. The substance of a good political tract, for example, is contained in the pages on "the spirit" (the aristocratic spirit) "of British legislation." It abounds in the same facts with which, in our political registers, we have been boring the public for many years, and which should never be let rest. Mr. Combe concludes this section by saying, emphatically, "The despotisms of Austria and Prussia are, in many respects, less injurious to the people than the government of Britain." Mr. Combe, who fears universal suffrage, or, as it appears, any great extension of the suffrage whatever, after having shown how much the people of this country require to exercise some direct power in legislation, suggests a scheme of reform which will neither satisfy the aristocrats nor the people; and which ought not to satisfy the latter. Assuming the population of the United Empire at twenty-eight millions, he rightly states, that of this number twenty millions are not represented. These twenty millions he proposes to divide into one hundred electoral districts, each of which shall elect a member to be sent to Parliament, to sit along with the present six hundred and fifty-eight as the People's representatives; and, we presume, to control class legislation as far as they are able. The plan is not just although it were practicable.—An Address to the American people concludes the work, in which they are told some wholesome and useful truths, leavened up with phrenology; with which, however, they have no necessary connexion, and for which, if none the better, they are little the worse.

A TRUE HISTORY OF A TRUE LOVE.

SHE WAS AN English girl—whose parents dying,
Had left her early in the world alone;
So young, she had not known the pain of parting,
Nor miss'd love's kiss, nor fond affection's tone.

AN aged relative (who long since wedded
One whose broad vineyards overlook'd the Rhine—
Who dying young, had left her weary-hearted,
Through a long widowhood of life to pine)

Adopted that fair child, and took her with her,
In the proud castle of her lord to dwell;
And loved her with such true and deep affection,
Scarce could an own fond mother love so well.

And to the servitors of that old mansion,
She was the "hopeful lady of their earth;"
Coming like sunshine to their gloomy dwelling,
And changing all its sadness into mirth.

The atmosphere in which she lived was loving,
Love was in every voice and look around her;
And the strong cords of faith in human nature,
(Which nought had loosen'd,) to her race fast bound her.

She sang the ballads of her fatherland
In tones whose liquid sweetness mock'd the birds';
Nor did her young voice mar the heavenly concord
Of music "married" to immortal words.

She read few books, nor ponder'd over lessons—
Love and great Nature were her only teachers;
And tenderness from one, grace from the other,
Shone in the changes of her childish features!

She lov'd to climb the heights above the river,
When the broad sun first pour'd his beams on earth,
And watch the golden clouds that grac'd his coming,
And purple mists to which his rise gave birth.

To her the heavens were truly God's own dwelling,
Earth's sunshine was the smile he pour'd on all;
His music was the wind that rock'd the forest,
Rippled the stream, and curl'd the waterfall.

She join'd the song of birds, and breath of blossoms,
In the glad hymn they pour'd to earth's kind Lord;
Though not a word was breath'd, her praise ascended,
And the Great Judge of hearts knew she ador'd.

And she was yet a child, but drawing onward
To the blest time between the child and woman,—
Springing to meet the deeper thoughts and feelings,
And cares and griefs that with that age were coming,

When one of England's best and noblest sages,
Still young in years, though wide his fame was spread
Wherever Science turn'd her glorious footsteps,
And Hope and blessings followed in her tread,—

Came to the banks of that fair flowing river,
To renovate the health which toil had marr'd;
And claim'd a kindred with the noble lady,
The guardian of that lovely English ward.

And the long room in which were stored the volumes
Fill'd with the wisdom and the thought of yore,
Was open'd to the day, and golden sunshine
Fell on the dusty shelves and leaves once more.

And while he ponder'd o'er the well-known volumes,
A fair young form was sitting round his book;
And his eye glanced from reason's best deductions,
To catch the radiance of her smile and look!

And then she wiled him with her to the forest,
To bathe his spirit in its deep delights;
And while he shared her joy, he gave her knowledge,
And shaped the courses of her fancy's flights.

And Nature, through its blooming loveliness,
Acquired new lustre in its matchless dyes,
When adaptation, order, perfect wisdom,
Were shown in all things to her wondering eyes.

Not Adam, when he heard the angel's story
Of fallen cherubs from their greatness hurl'd,
E'er listen'd with more deep and wrapt attention,
Than she to wonders of this lower world.

It was a pleasant sight to see them sitting Alone together in that antique room,
Still talking on high themes, and knowing nothing
Of fading daylight or the evening gloom.

And then the earliest beams of morning sunlight
Fell on the fair young pupil and the sage ;
And a new world he open'd to her vision—
The bright creations of the poet's page !

It is a glorious thing on senseless canvass
The heroic deeds of mighty men to trace ;
Or wake the silent marble of the quarry
Into immortal forms of truth and grace ;

But nobler far than all the boasted triumphs
Of painter or of statuary combined,
It is to wake into the bliss of knowledge
The sleeping powers of a rare gifted mind !

And many months pass'd by—he was unwilling
To leave the child and home he lov'd so well ;
But Science call'd him in her faithful service,
In other lands, o'er distant seas, to dwell.

But then he left behind him memories precious
As can be felt on earth, or hoped in heaven—
The bliss of doing good—the joy of loving Without a worldly or a selfish leaven.

And in his long, dull, drear and lonely watches,
That young face oft appear'd, soft, calm and pure ;
And it became, to his unconscious dreamings,
His star of hope—"his Tyrian cynosure !"

And she that thus was left, how was she bearing
The heavy parting ! In that wo so wild
That tore her heartstrings, life had a new era,—
Its griefs were come, she was no more a child !

And he to her was father, brother, lover,
All household ties seem'd blended into one !
His name was last upon her lips at vespers,
His first was breathed in earliest orison !

And now that he was gone, the radiant brightness
With which the world look'd cloth'd, grew faint and dim ;

The "general air," the birds, the flowers, the sunshine,
And Nature's self, seem'd to be mourning him.

And all was full of him. The rolling river,
With its hoarse cadence, murmur'd out his name ;
And Europe's wide plains had one only echo
That bore from land to land his toil-won fame !

But she was rous'd from these high phantasies
By other griefs as stern, if not so high,
To view through lonely years the dim life fading,
And then to see her second mother die.

And never did a fond and grateful daughter
Watch o'er the breast on which her childhood slum-ber'd,
With stronger, deeper, warmer, self-devotion,
Than she by that frail form whose days were num-
ber'd.

Long years it lingered. To that dying woman
Death's dart seem'd feeblier than the ties of love !
The angel by her side made dim the vision
Of spirits beckoning her to worlds above !

And when at last the orphan, doubly orphan'd,
Was left once more in the wide world forlorn,
Her soul assumed a new and strange composure,
From mental conflicts and religion born.

And she was beautiful with that rare beauty
Where mind looks out from earth's most perfect grace,
And feeling lends its kindness and softness
To aid the witchery of the form and face.

And many woo'd her for her matchless beauty ;
For her broad lands and heritage, still more ;—
She coldly met the most impassioned pleadings,
Her faith and love were given long before.

Given and were not asked ! The thought could kindle
Blushes as bright as ever graced the morning,
And yet she gloried in her love, and for it
She gladly would have braved the cold world's scorning.

At last her guerdon came.—She had been sitting Till gentle twilight shed o'er earth its gloom,
And her heart's beatings alone broke the silence
That reign'd triumphant through the spacious room.

When a step entered,—there had been no voices
To speak the stranger's message or his land ;
What need had she of words ! She raised her forehead
From its bow'd leaning on her blue vein'd hand,

As her eye caught the form. With a loud cry
Of "Thank thee, gracious God ! at last 'tis he !"
She sank upon his bosom, and her spirit
Became unconscious of its ecstasy.

And they were happy ! Many mock'd and wonder'd
That one so dower'd, and beautiful, and young,
With all earth's blessings strew'd around her footsteps,
And all Heaven's music dropping from her tongue,

Should link her fate to one whose locks were changing,
Whose prime of manhood was already gone !
But souls that look to Heaven still keep their freshness
Though hasty Time be ever hurrying on !

And joy was at their bridal,—though so chasten'd
By sorrows they had known—mixed hopes and fears,
That pleasure wore her softest, gentlest, aspect,
And hid her smiling in a gush of tears !

VIOLET HAMILTON; OR, THE TALENTED FAMILY.

CHAPTER XIX.

WE somewhat abruptly and unceremoniously left Mrs. Burke Barker in her carriage, at the door of Mrs. Herbert's residence. The old Scotch woman who, in this exigency, lent her aid to the Herbert family, from motives of kindness and the desire of obliging, not much alloyed by the love of what her countrywomen term a "handling," had taken her way to the auctioneer, as the family agent ; an office for which her experience in such affairs, and general shrewdness and trustworthiness, peculiarly qualified her ; when Mrs. Herbert, on this busy morning denied to every one, was found at home to Mrs. Burke Barker. She was, indeed, only waiting to receive that lady, previous to setting off to her sick or vapourish friend at Windsor ; whither Mr. Charles Herbert was to attend her in the common stage-coach ! It was a trial, no doubt, of its kind ; but a worse was at hand.

Mrs. Jane Jenkins took ample leisure to admire the new crimson liveries, faced with white, before she sought her "present lady" in the back drawing-room, to announce the presence of her "future lady" in the front drawing-room.

"I desired you, Jenkins, to show that lady into the back parlour below," said Mrs. Herbert. Mrs. Jenkins pouted. The best drawing-room in the house could not be too good for her lady that was to be, whatever might have been suitable for Mrs. Barker.

The brilliant tones of a semi-grand pianoforte, which "the lady," immediately on finding herself alone, awoke with more musical mastery than good breeding, was a more characteristic announcement of a genuine Crippes. Mrs. Herbert reddened with displeasure at a freedom which she would not have admired in any total stranger, and could not forgive in the person who waited upon her.

"Impertinence! She serenades us, I declare! I don't think, Violet, I can see the woman."

"For Jenkins' sake——" urged Violet gently.

"True, O true! to get rid of my worst plague, who this morning has been so teasing and downright impertinent, I have courage to encounter even a female Crippes. Is she not the girl whom that gentlemanlike, well-dressed man, I have seen with you and Sir George Lees, married? What strange choices men do make! Have they fallen into a fortune, Herbert, that so soon after the swindling transactions about Shuffleton's house, and that infamous abduction affair, they are dashing out in this style? He is a politician, I believe—employed by the Carlton Club, perhaps—but he is not in parliament, and has no appointment?"

"Barker is a mystery in a close-buttoned, well-fitting surcoat and neat cravat," said Herbert, laughing at his mother's curiosity.—"But you had better arrest the voluble fingers of Mrs. B. B., ere she fairly splits our heads with a repetition of that hailstone passage."

Mrs. Herbert drew up her gloves most rigidly, also her head; and tried to look as majestic and awful, aristocratic and cross, as it was possible for so pretty and gentle a fair, little, dove-eyed woman to look. While she took the arm of the somewhat reluctant Mrs. Charles, and her way to the important audience, the house still resounding with the pealing harmony created by Mrs. Barker. Violet experienced some slight flutter of nerves in anticipating the awkward recognition of her old friend Polly Crippes, in circumstances so materially changed with them both; but especially after the éclat of the abduction of Miss Juliana Stocks. She felt tremulous, and delicately ashamed for her ancient companion; and would gladly have spared both the embarrassment, and the former the imagined mortification, of the meeting. Her squeamish apprehensions were premature, if not altogether unfounded. Mrs. Burke Barker did not appear to have the faintest recollection of her—cut her dead on her own floor.

For a few seconds that lady, wrapt in her own splendid music, remained apparently unconscious of any one having entered the room, until Mrs. Herbert advanced to her side and interrupted her, by coldly begging to be favoured with her commands. This compelled the brilliant performer to notice her presence, and even to half rise and offer some sort of apology. She seemed, however, to have no more knowledge of Mrs. Charles Herbert than if she had never seen her before. Violet, if somewhat amused, was at once relieved from her uneasiness, and rather glad to find that it was not necessary to renew her acquaintance with the very good-looking and highly and fashionably-dressed person before her.

"I must entreat your pardon for the liberty, ma'am, but I am an enthusiast, and claim to be one of the privileged in music. I never can resist touching a well-toned instrument. . . .

I have used the freedom to call to inquire into the character of a person applying for a rather confidential situation in my family—the place of my own maid, indeed. I understand that she has been for some years in your service. . . . Pray, be seated, ma'am;" and the visitor graciously pointed to a seat by herself.

"I am in my own house," replied Mrs. Herbert, haughtily, and still standing as stiffly perpendicular as if she had been some small German reigning Duchess mortally affronted by an enormity, which, however, no audacious Frau durst commit upon sacred and established etiquette. Violet, however, very quietly placed a chair for her, but at a respectful distance from the ottoman of which the uninvited guest had now taken possession; and Mrs. Herbert, having vindicated her dignity, or given vent to her disgust by gently closing the piano, sat down, saying, frigidly—"Whatever necessary questions you have to put to me concerning my late maid I shall be happy to answer, ma'am; and as quickly as may suit you: I am just setting off for the country."

Mrs. Burke Barker, whatever were her secret thoughts, put a good face on the matter, drew up her neck slightly, hemmed, and said—

"I take for granted that the young woman's moral character is wholly unimpeachable?"

"Morals involve so many points;—far too wide for present discussion. But, I presume that I may safely say, Jenny Jenkins is what you mean by a moral character."

"Have you, ma'am, been in the habit of entrusting her with the key of your jewel-case, and with the other valuable property connected with her department? I should not like to engage a person in whom I could not place the most implicit confidence as to my trinkets and valuable laces; for, to say truth, I am the most careless creature in the world myself."

"You may very safely intrust your family jewels to my late servant," returned Mrs. Herbert. "Any other inquiry, ma'am?" she added, looking to her watch; "I am rather pressed, I am sorry, for time this morning."

"Does she get up small linen well, pray? . . . Of course I do not expect my own woman to have much leisure for such employments; but I wish her to be able to know when these things are properly done."

Violet remembered that the clever Polly was herself rather an expert laundress, at least at a smart frill or cap, if for herself; and, so far from being "a careless creature," that few young ladies were either more vain, or more tenacious of their Birmingham mosaic and lackered ornaments than Miss Crippes had been.

"This, fortunately, is a question which admits of proof," replied Mrs. Herbert to the above query. "Mrs. Charles, my love, be so good as ring the bell for Jenkins to exhibit her starchery."

"Not at all, not at all; pray don't trouble the young lady. I am perfectly satisfied. Indeed this with me is another quite minor point. . . . Does she dress hair well, and in the newest style? In short—for I delight in frankness, and coming to the point—does she thoroughly understand the ornamental department of toilet duties? Has she taste, resource—can the woman, in short, what I call, dress a lady?"

"Jenkins can dress a lady," replied Mrs. Herbert, with emphasis on one word which annoyed Violet, though it probably fell innocuous on the ears of Mrs. Burke Barker, now wholly occupied with the figure she made, and the spirit she displayed; so that Mrs. Herbert's little bit of delicate irony was so much of a well-bred woman's petty spite, misspent. Her visiter went boldly on—

"Then she really is a creature one can tolerate about one. I am delighted to hear it. I have had three of the dowdies in my service within the last six weeks. I am, I own, ridiculously sensitive in some matters," continued the lady, at last rising, (an example which Mrs. Herbert quickly followed,) but stopping short to say,—"By the way, does she write a tolerably genteel hand, if I required her to write a note for me to anything above my tradespeople? That she works well with her needle, I understand; but that is quite secondary. The business of my maid is to dress me, not to make my dresses; there are dressmakers enough in Paris."

Here again were feminine emphases annoying to Violet, who knew that Mrs. Herbert had of late exacted a little work from her maid, however degrading the practice might be considered by fine ladies and their finer maids.

"The salary has, I understand, not been illiberal with you, ma'am, for a person of plain education. That too I consider altogether unimportant; nothing can be too much for a thoroughly qualified person in whom one can place entire confidence," continued Mrs. Barker, still standing her ground. "It is some seasons since she has been to Paris, but she will have that advantage this winter, which we are to spend in the French capital before we go to Vienna. Without foreign travel no lady's-maid can, in the present state of society, be properly qualified for her duties."

"I am no judge," said Mrs. Herbert; signing to Violet to pull the bell.

Violet was involuntarily contrasting the former bold, briak, provincial belle, with the would-be woman of fashion,—a part which Polly, in one sense, performed very well; while the quiet dignity, the balance and repose of her own manner, more perplexed her former acquaintance, who could scarcely believe that the self-possessed and graceful young matron before her, was the shy, sensitive, lacrymose mademoiselle—her father's pupil. "Order the lady's carriage, Robert," said Mrs. Herbert,—compelled to go as near to kicking her visiter down stairs, as one lady could venture with another. Mrs. B. B. drew up, and did move off, honouring Violet in passing with a broad stare.

It is not easy to say whether her parting remarks were the natural impulses of a coarse mind, or proceeded from pure malice. Making a rapid survey of the room, she said aloud, but as if to herself,—“Pretty room, though of the smallest; nothing to suit me, I think, save those vases and the piano;” and to Mrs. Herbert,—“I understand you are selling off your furniture, ma'am? There is nothing, I am sorry, will suit me, I fear, save, perhaps, the instrument. I rather like the tone. It is shockingly extravagant in me, no doubt, with so many instruments; but I am tempted to become the purchaser of the semi-grand. Pray, do let me have a preference, if possible, ma'am; and I assure we shall not quarrel about the price. . . . I wish you a very good morning:” and, with the slightest side curtsy, Mrs. Barker brushed past, leaving her victim trembling with indignant and insulted feelings. It was the very first time that Violet had ever seen Mrs. Herbert's sweet, serene, velvety disposition ruffled by merely impertinent trifles. Tears sprung into her eyes;—“Insolent, underbred, woman! Is this, Violet—is this a foretaste of the bitterness of poverty?”

Violet shared these wounded feelings by sympathy, if not through her understanding; and she might probably have cried for company, if Charles, who had overheard the whole dialogue, had not advanced from the back room, laughing aloud, and broken the dismal spell which enwrapped the ladies.

“Glorious Polly!—but you gave her as good as she brought; eh, mother? Who could fancy you so satirical and malicious.” Mrs. Herbert at once checked her dismal mood, and whispered, “I would not, for worlds, let Charles see that we, silly creatures, are not proof against an impertinent woman! How differently men of the world and foolish women receive such insect-stings. I am ashamed of myself! The men are wiser in their generation.”

Jenkins, to the general joy, in half an hour afterwards, made her farewell curtsy, and held her cambric to her eyes according to rule. But not a whisper was extorted from her lady about a certain Geneva lady's-watch—Mrs. Herbert's third best only, as to which Jenkins had, for weeks past, given hints, and even made several assumptions. The failure of this diplomacy, perhaps, gave Mrs. Jenkins more fortitude to bear the pang of the separation, which she had all the morning declared would utterly annihilate her: and she went off, at last, in visible discontent.

“There goes a viper and an ingrate,” said Mrs. Herbert.

“There goes one of those poor girls, whom ladies alternately spoil by pernicious indulgence and tyrannical caprice,” thought Violet. But she had little leisure for these, or even pleasanter thoughts; and, before Herbert had returned in the evening, having left his mother with her sailing friend at Windsor, the whole house was in that lively brisk confusion which precedes a removal.

"Marion and I have so contrived it, to spare Mrs. Herbert the plague and anxiety attending a change of house. When she returns next week, it will be a charming surprise to find us all nicely settled. You must contrive to fetch her to Chelsea at once, under some pretext or other. How much needless pain we shall spare her!"

Herbert warmly approved the scheme; and the diminished household laboured with so much zeal and alacrity, under the directions of Marion, who was accompanied by her ordinary staff of charwomen, porters, gardeners, &c., that, in five days, order, comfort, beauty, rose at Chelsea, out of the chaos of tables, chairs, and china ware; and the villakin was transformed into a domestic paradise, at least in the admiring eyes of its young mistress. She had even incurred the unsanctioned expense of new chintz furniture and light muslin draperies for Mrs. Herbert's little drawing-room; there, too, stood the semi-grand, that kind lady's marriage-gift to herself. And near the few plants in the little balcony, over the little portico, was the pretty little watering machine, on its light stand. Mr. Herbert's books were not yet completely arranged in "the study," for he had not been half so industrious as his lady. Nor was Violet's sacrum completed, either in its useful or ornamental appointments of poetry and preserving-pots, work-bags, portfolios, and small household stores; but all was in fair train there: and up-stairs everything was complete. Herbert, though still secretly owning far too much that power of external circumstances, to which early education and the entire habits of life systematically subdue the well-born English, long before their fashionable education is completed by the omnipotent usages of London society, also admired,—but without forgetting the woful downfall in fortune and station which this delightful quarter and charming residence must argue to his former associates. He was compelled to feel that there were here none of the harsh or repulsive features of poverty, nor yet any indication of that penurious, watchful, pinching disposition, which entails care; and engenders, first, narrowness, and finally, meanness of mind: yet this was not May Fair, it was not the "West-End," properly so called.

His wife was still too young and uninformed—too new, at least to artificial society—to be able to comprehend why one suburb of the metropolis should not be quite as good as another, if the air was equally pure, and the views as open and fine. In her bosom,

Fireside, the heroic wealth of hall and bower had not yet been forfeited to fashion.

The ancient English dower
Of inward happiness

was still entire in her simple heart. She even greatly preferred their present abode and locality to the magnificent dwellings, and dull, aristocratic squares, which she had been taught to consider the most enviable of residences, without having been spoiled by the lessons. Were there not now before her, first, the river—what could replace its absence from the landscape?—skies often blue, and trees richly green; comfortable houses; lovely children, and neat maids; and sometimes smart little grooms, and nice little carriages; and pleasant, well-dressed people, her new neighbours, ladies and gentlemen whom she longed to salute, walking out, and bringing home books or flowers; and, in the evenings, trails of fragrance from the surrounding gardens, or swells of music from their unseen bowery seats, or from the boats passing with gay water parties; and then the moonlight was so much brighter and softer here!

"Brighter and softer both," said Herbert laughing; but Violet would not yield the point. She could not just explain it in words, but was certain she was right; and that not the first house in London—not Grandeur's most magnificent saloon was equal to their sweet cottage; and she was quite sure Mrs. Herbert would feel the same.

That lady was now to be put to the trial; and when Herbert went to fetch her back, he kept his promise, and seconded Violet's innocent stratagem. Yet, as he approached the dwelling, he hesitated, and said,

"If, dear mother, you shall, as is very natural, feel painful change, try to disguise it from that sweet creature, who has so exerted herself to contribute to our satisfaction, and who is so innocently happy herself in the belief that she has succeeded. We are already at home."

Mrs. Herbert, as they left their cheap vehicle, saw, by a glance at the open casements, that the house was inhabited, nay, in trim order—in gala costume. Plants were in the little balcony, nay, even her favourite fuschia;—plants in the small, but light and airy hall, into which the lady of the house flew forth to welcome her. The caution and prayer of Herbert had been superfluous: the delight of his mother was genuine, and even rapturous. She ran, joyously exclaiming, from room to room, following her blithe conductress, and again and again embracing her as new wonders and delights burst upon them—

"How pretty, how sweet, how nice: such a charming size of a room! O my own dressing-glass, my easy-chair, my — Oh, dear Violet, you have been to me how much more kind than Napoleon was gallant to the daughter of the Emperor of Austria—restored my bed-chamber exactly as it was."

"And transformed your home into a fairy palace," said Charles. "Let us cherish a good conceit of ourselves and our belongings: it is one true element of every-day happiness. I begin to fancy Violet's Lilliputian palace a much prettier residence than our old house. That was a painted, bedizened actress: this is a fresh young Quaker beauty, all modesty and purity, natural lilies and roses."

"Your comparison is happy, Charles. You beneficent little fairy! how have you contrived to conjure up such a scene in five short days?" And Mrs. Herbert playfully pinched the ears of her blushing favourite.

"I don't believe she has slept ten hours during them," said Herbert: "nor allowed me much more repose. But she had three days of the Bronitis of Fleet Street, and her ragged staff—her Scotch, Irish, and Welsh aides.

"And Charles is so charming a carpenter and upholsterer, ma'am! . . . Now that we have discovered his genius, shan't we make him work? He nailed up all those cross sticks by himself—those pales to which I am training the Indian cresses. They, poor dears, are not very rare things to be sure; but they are luxuriant and rich—beautiful, I think them. For that matter, the stars themselves are not rare,—which is just so much the more delightful, as all the world may see and enjoy their beauty."

"And Violet, with the help, I suspect, of Irish Rachel, late Regent Park housemaid's assistant, now Chelsea brevet cook, has constructed tea-cakes, mother!—no comfortable English cottage-home without cakes—and made coffee, superfine, equal to Parisian, which waits you in our drawing-room so soon as you are unshawled."

The ladies went away; and Violet performed the functions of Jenkins in that spirit of kindness, and anxiety to please and oblige, which rendered her offices true service. They quickly rejoined Charles; and were renewing mutual congratulations on being so delightfully settled, when the gate-bell was furiously rung by a boy, whom Violet, who had heedlessly been guilty of the indecorum of peeping from behind the window draperies, at a first visitor, pronounced

"A smart tiger. . . . And a handsome cabriolet! Who can it be, Charles? There is a gentleman jumping out! I vow! —no, it cannot be; he is plainly, but very handsomely, dressed in black."

Herbert now came forward, and the gentleman looked up, smiled to him, and, perceiving some shadow of the lady, took off his hat and bowed.

"If it were possible, I should say it was Crippes, but that figure is clean shaved: he does not squint. Is it Jack transmogrified,—the deformed transformed? But they are ushering the figure, whoever he is, up here—that won't do;" and Herbert intercepted the stranger, whoever he might be, on the narrow, but nicely painted and carpeted, stair, and showed him into the back crib, named his study.

"Can I believe my eyes, Jack? Is it really you?"

"Your ears will be more astounded, my boy—ay, till they tingle. Give me joy, old fellow! You congratulate me—I congratulate you. My fortune is made! and your's, too, Mr. Herbert. . . I have not forgot your kindness to me in adversity—I can now fully repay you; but what is that?—damn such paltry repayment. I will make your fortune—I insist upon it—I have got rid of all my embarrassments—I have cast my slough. Faugh! what a time of it I have had for some years—it turns me sick."

"And your small visual imperfection, Jack—your original—squint the vulgar call it."

"Gone, sir, like other nuisances,—anything to be done or gotten for money,—and I have the tin, now, egad, overflowing in both pockets;—underwent, three days since, the operation for strabismus,—Barker insisted upon it. He asserts that the slightest cast of the eye gives many an honest man the look of a knave; many a rogue looks strait enough though; mine was very slight—an undecided look at times; my mother never could detect it; but it might have been detrimental to my prospects, notwithstanding. What do you think of my turn-out? It is spick-span; though there was no time to have it built for myself. I sail for Hamburg, by the steamer, to-morrow morning. Hey for high fortune! John Bull's land, farewell! But what can I do for you, Herbert? make your fortune, if you will listen to reason and allow me. —Barker would have dissuaded me from speaking to you, nay, prohibited me; I am here on the sly; he is a clever, a devilish clever, but a selfish fellow; and Polly, the jade! looking handsomer than ever, kissed and hugged me, and all that; but I have not forgot their late conduct. "Letters miscarried," all my eye! Nor should I have been taken into favour, unless they had urgently needed my co-operation. The Cryppeses have sung small in London, I guess, since Jack turned stroller."

"Have you seen Mr. Gryphon?" asked Herbert.

"I have. I got the letter you were so good as to leave for me, and the enclosure too; that affair of the lawsuit is all up. My governor has withdrawn his claims for damages for your lady's breach of engagement: he is sensible of your kindness to me; and our family have now a noble game before them. Will you take a hand, and make your fortune? I hope you will. Let me persuade you."

"To engage in the Old Established Church Philanthropic Assurance Company?"

"Hang the Church and the Philanthropic both; that's Barker's own go, and a set of fellows, fences, he places about him. Gad! what they must have sacked by it already—worth £30,000 a-year, it is said. But Pol would require a third of that for herself."

"Worth all the Company once get their clutches over," returned Herbert.

Jack looked up scrutinizingly and rather gravely, —not quite squinting, yet much farther from ordinary direct vision. The operation for strabismus had either not been completely effective, or the muscles of the eye were not yet accustomed to their reformed functions; for, unlike the unreformed British Parliament, they did not "work well." And there was something deeper than the eye in which Jack, with all his levity, real and affected, appeared troubled.

"I have nothing to do with the Company—it has great prospects—has realized already;—mine is a quite different spec. You remember Count Rodolpho:—had the Stocks girl married the Count, she would have been a lady of title, the gipsy, and spared myself and other honest gentlemen all this to do."

"I remember that adventurer; what of him?"

"Come, come, Mr. Herbert—you are a man of the world—you understand a thing or two—Rodolpho is a devilish clever fellow, though I am not sure but the idea of this spec originated in L—don—wits jump, you know. Our snivelling Government, to please Wilberforce and the other old women in small-clothes, have abolished lotteries; but the Continent, my boy, the Continent is open to English enterprise.”

“And you go to France or Germany to organize a grand lottery?”

“Ay, and to sell the shares to honest John Bull;—warm love to fatherland. I reckon upon many such as my quondam friend the little draper, and the sleek-headed, radical ironmonger; I take them as a fair sample of our customers.”

“A lottery which, whether it ever be drawn or not, can make little difference, as the great prizes are likely to be the count’s Merino flocks, or some of his estates and castles in Hungary.”

Jack involuntarily laughed. Symptoms of levity in rogues are sometimes more apt to provoke than decent-seeming hypocrisy. Herbert angrily exclaimed—

“How have you presumed to make me the confidant of such a villanous scheme? Is it not my duty to go at once to the Austrian or French Embassy, and give such information as will cause you and your confederates, should you go to those countries, be sent for life to the fortress of Spielberg, or the galleys, as you will richly deserve?”

Mr. John Quintin Crippes was taken a little aback by the tone Herbert assumed; only a little. Jack was not easily disconcerted by a distant view of danger; and far from prone to take offence, and fire up at what men usually regard as insults or imputations on honour. He laughed without much effort; and there was at all times hilarity, and even a colour of sincerity, in Jack’s laugh. It was not a hollow chuckle.

“Come, come, my good sir; no use for getting on the high ropes about so simple a matter. You must take those who broached the project for much greater ninnies than they will be found, if you do not guess that they have foreseen and provided for every difficulty. You will find that we have at least the countenance of the mighty gents, whom you would alarm very needlessly,—perhaps a surer hold over ’em. But, ’pon honour, all is bona fide, the spec a fair spec, and a feasible. All above board, inviting the closest inspection. To-morrow you will see us flourishing in every morning paper,—in some of them with a delicately-touched editorial paragraph.”

Herbert, though not yet free of suspicion, fancied he might have been too precipitate; and at all events, it was an affair in which he was not entitled, upon mere suspicion, to interfere.

“This could not have been your business with me?—to what am I indebted for the honour of your visit?”

“Not a whit else. Do you imagine that I have no gratitude?—no sense of friendship? I mean you to take an interest in this concern, and net a few cool thousands by it. It shall cost you nothing,—no risk,—merely your name; and if the project fail to realize great profit, you are none the worse. This is but a small line of business for a man of your figure and parts,” continued Jack, looking round the humble apartment. “Look to Barker and his wife flaring up:—The fry of fiddling diplomats, and the younger brothers who were wont to honour my father’s fiddles, ices, and champagne, are nothing to them now. Barker has absolutely made a way among the city fellows,—the capitalists,—they consult him,—they seize his hints. It must be owned Barker has a genius for finance that astonishes. Land companies in the Falkland Islands; rail-road at the Darien; patent for some entirely new locomotive power, which will supersede steam altogether,—something to be done by electricity;—but I am not a man of science.”

“Nor I one of finance; and so Jack I must bid you good by,—wishing you, in the words of the toast of your friend, the Mayor of W——, success in all your intentions—provided they be honest.”

“Good Gad! and is it possible, Mr. Herbert, that a man, I say it again, of your figure and talents, is, at your age, and with your stylish town habits, to sit down to the study of musty law!—in which you may succeed, though Barker says, it is much more likely not,—and certainly not for many years:—I have calculated all those chances in my time in my own case.”

“You, Jack!” said Herbert, laughing; “so you too have dreamed of the Bench and Great Seal in your time.”

“Faugh! don’t mention it—who would encounter an old Eldon’s worry and drudgery, even to be as rich as old Eldon? Certainly no man of spirit, who knows life—and loves pleasure. Your charming lady, too, formed to adorn the most brilliant lot”——

“Thank you, Jack—but I fear that that same lady, so much obliged by your good opinion, is now waiting for me.” Jack saw that there was no chance of an opportunity of displaying his improved looks, and handsome dress, to the ladies. The domestic privacy of the “bit of a box” was as jealously guarded by its master, as if it had been a palace. He rose to go.

“My governor charged me to kiss her fair hand as his proxy. He means to offer his congratulations in person, some of those days. . . . Now that our house has got the sun on the wall, his opera has come uppermost with the old fellow. You know what a fanatico it is. He hopes that your lady will at least attend the rehearsals.”

“My wife must decide for herself about that,” replied Herbert, somewhat haughtily; and Jack, with affectionate adieus, walked off—swore at his tiger like a lord—mounted his own cab with the air of a master, and whirled away.

“Was it indeed Jack Crippes, Charles?” cried Violet, somewhat excited and curious.

“The veritable Jack.”

“Well dressed—looking clean, even—and a private cabriolet. Wonders never cease!”

“Never in London, while such miracle-mongers abound as certain members of that gifted family. I heard to-day that Emmeline, the third or fourth girl—the romping little thing who, at W——, two years ago, used to provoke us to punish her with kisses, has made a conquest of the grandson and heir of the proud old Duke of Plantagenet. His grace will certainly be fit for a strait-waistcoat if the daughter of a mere Mus. Doc. obtain any chance of his duchess's coronet!"

"Emmeline!—She is very young—and very wild—but not an ill-hearted little thing—a duchess! She was thought in the family very like the portraits of Mrs. Jordan. Is it not strange?"

"A high destiny probably awaits the resemblance of poor Mrs. Jordan. The boy, her lover, lost both his father and mother when a mere child. His grand-parents have not only spoiled him, but lost his affections in the process. He was at Eton with a private tutor, whose severity finished the ruin. The boy—he is far from a fool, too—broke out as wild as a sailor after a two-years' voyage, yet was captivated—though tempted, I believe, as much by Mrs. Barker's chickens, jellies, and champagne, as by the plump charms of merry little Emmy,—who must be endowed with an instinctive cunning—and the adroit flattery of Mr. Barker. They are a clever family—over-trump the ———. The old Duke has thrown himself at the feet of royalty, to prevent the attainment of his patrician blood. But, thank Heaven, there are no lettres de cachet in England, although the scions of nobility should disgrace themselves in the absence of the wholesome personal restraint of their fair paramours."

"It is wonderful!—did Jack tell you all this?"

"Oh, no—Jack does not know himself, I dare say, and I forgot to tell him—which, had I loved mischief, I ought to have done. Jack might have spoilt all. The Duke has laid violent hands on his heir just now; but unless the lad revolt himself—which might happen if he were prudently managed—my life on it, that Mrs. Burke Barker, with the help of her husband—who of course knows no more of anything of the sort than the babe unborn—circumvents Plantagenet, and all his kith, kin, allies, and doers."

"Emmeline Cryppes perhaps a duchess!" again ejaculated Violet; that little romp, whose unkempt curls and rebellious shoulder-straps it had so short time since cost her some pains to preserve in propriety—that merry-eyed, neglected child, who had been left with whoever would keep her in the country, until her family gained some footing in town. Emmeline had been sent up at last; and, in a turn of good fortune, her brother-in-law, Mr. Barker, upon nearly the principle which made confessors, nobles, and ministers, throw fair alluring objects in the way of Louis XIV. or XV., (though here with strictly legitimate ends,) had made his wife order her dresses; and he bought her a pony, and sent her scampering in all the by-ways round London, attended sometimes by himself, but as frequently by only Mike Twigg. The plan succeeded. The wild, pretty girl, fresh as a May blossom, and seemingly as innocent, caught plenty of admirers; and her sister and brother-in-law knew how to sift the enormous quantity of chaff from the few grains of matrimonial wheat which they speculated on turning to account. It was to Barker amazing, how adroitly the untutored girl took her cue, and performed her part, though no direct counselling passed between them. He was constrained to feel, that there was in Emmeline a more exquisite subtilty, a more re-finer ductility, than in his own accomplished lady; who, with more experience, and perhaps natural artifice, was more coarsely organized, and had much less original sensibility.

It was a very fortunate circumstance for Mr. Barker, that the young girl formed at once that passionate attachment to her noble boy-admirer, which excited both his vanity and affection, and that she made no concealment of her transports—her Haides abandonment. Had the handsome young Earl been merely the baker's apprentice, Emmeline might not have been quite so easily captivated; although Barker thought even this degree of folly not impossible in her, and at her age; for though she had breathed only the sacred atmosphere of England, where such lapses seldom occur with tolerably well-brought-up damsels, she was wild, giddy, and wilful. As it was, he and his wife had a delicate game to play, though he hoped they were equal to it; and he feared not even the great Duke with all his influence, so much as the hard, genteel vulgarity of the mother of Emmeline, and the appearance and manners of Jack, whom, in the critical state of matters, Barker was doubly happy to ship off for a time. An affair, so important in its consequences to every member of the Talented Family, may be as well pursued to its auspicious close, before returning to the humble household at Chelsea.

CHAPTER XX.

Earl St. Edward, the youthful lover, was too much absorbed by his new feelings, to remember that he had himself parents to whom he owed submission and duty, much less to think that his bewitching and enamoured Emmeline, who could scarce exist out of his arms, had either friend or relative, save the delightful woman who compassionately facilitated their meetings, but who, notwithstanding tender pity for her sister, had most honourably warned him, that he might incur the displeasure of his family by an attachment to one below him in station, and whose only recommendation was extreme sweetness and loveliness, and devoted affection to himself. This was an affair which her husband would never forgive her for being privy to. Yet—and Mrs. Barker covered her tearful eyes with her laced cambric—how could she see her dear sister pining to death under a hopeless passion? Unhappy it was that they had ever met—the fates seemed to rule such things; yet, part they must—though one more solitary ride in the shady lane where the stars had first thrown them together—one more interview, to sigh forth, in the twilight boudoir, the fatal word "which has been and must be:"—But, it must be the very last. The young lord was affected. He, too, began to think, that the dire "farewell" must be said. The matter was almost overdone, when the tears, and sobs, and hysterics of the passionate girl, who was disposed to do anything rather than part with either the lover or the lord, to whom she wildly clung, restored the equilibrium, and carried the day in defiance of the high-minded scruples of Mrs. Barker.

How it happened that her confidential maid—the identical Mrs. Jane Jenkins—ventured to forfeit her mistress's protection and friendship, and accompany the fugitive young lady that same night by a first-rate train for the north, while Mr. and Mrs. Barker followed, in hot pursuit, by the next train, we are unable to say. How, too, for the sudden unpremeditated flight, she had made certain preparations, must remain a mystery; though it is certain that the young bride did not assume the white silk and pink roses provided, and in which, to her bridegroom, she looked so fascinating, until the obliging blacksmith had fairly riveted the hymeneal fetters, exactly four hours before Mr. and Mrs. Barker appeared. Their pursuit could not well have been closer, as some of the newspapers took pains to explain, because, the young couple had unfortunately got the start by an earlier train. The Eton tutor and the Duke's solicitor, Mr. Gryphon, were four hours later still, and the young couple had retired to their chamber, which it was not deemed advisable to invade.

And now, what was done could not be undone. Mr. Barker, like an honourable man, had himself, before leaving London, sent intelligence to Plantagenet House. He was at first savage, and warmly reproached the young man; but the honour of his sister and his family required that the marriage should now be completed with as little delay as possible; and some Bishop finish what the blacksmith had so hopefully begun. In the meanwhile, he and his wife returned to town, as did the Duke's agents, unable to withdraw the enamoured boy of eighteen from his still younger bride; and, perhaps, fancying that it was best to let him cool at his leisure. They, indeed, feared that his escape was now impossible, though afraid to say this to their principal. They left the young pair so much absorbed in hymeneal bliss, that the husband, for a time, forgot how very unsuitable and degrading an alliance he had contracted, and, what was more surprising, the wife so much in love, that she forgot she had married a nobleman, and might live to be a Duchess. Her charming Albert was far far handsomer than Tom, Mr. Stocks' handsome groom, at W——, who had first taught her to ride, and to love also, though this was a secret Emmeline had kept from all the world, even from her sister; as Tom, though he had promised to write to her in London, had not kept his word. This neglect had vexed her for a few seconds each day of a week, but was all so much the better now. What would Tom think, when he heard she had married a lord—whom she loved ten thousand times more than ever she did him—whom, she rather thought, she had never cared much for after all; for now Mrs. Barker said to those who flocked to her on her return to town, to learn all the particulars, "Theirs was such love—such enraptured fondness—very improper, no doubt, and exceedingly to be regretted—as happiness seldom attended such alliances, especially to the lady.—But such love! Barker himself," she remarked, "severe and displeased as he was with Emmy, as well as with Lord St. Edward, Barker says it is more like what one reads of in Shakespeare, or the poets of Italy, than English marriage." And Barker, remembering passages in his own boyhood, had certainly said to his wife, "How blest the fools are! Could it but last, I should almost envy the young lord, that he has got our pretty amorous Cinderella, and escaped some one of the high-blooded dames, that would have been manœuvring for him, or his estate and coronet, as soon as he had fairly left school. Can she keep him, now that she has got him? But that is her look-out—and partly ours. I have little faith in Emmeline's discretion; and to talk of the principles of a woman—of a girl at her age! I look to you for the safety of your sister. I am summoned to the duke to-day; but all the dukes in Christendom cannot unmarry Emmy. There will be other snares laid for her; but, if she have sense, we can cope with them, and love will at first be her safeguard."

The enraged duke would listen to no measures for the completion of the union by a repetition of the marriage ceremony in England, even when Barker insinuated that a future Duke of Plantagenet might be born with a stigma, unless the Scotch marriage was sanctioned by English law, which, as Lord St. Edward was under age, was impossible, without his grandfather's consent. But the duke would have paid any sum to the girl, or her family, to quash her claims. Barker was an honourable man; and nothing of the kind would be listened to. The idea was insulting. His wife, when she heard of this proposal, was by no means so sure.

In the meanwhile, the young pair returned to town; and, as Mr. Barker found it both impolitic and inconvenient to receive them; and as the gates of Plantagenet House were rigidly closed, they and Mrs. Jenkins, a greater woman than ever, found a temporary home in a fashionable hotel, where their childish fondness, and more childish quarrels, and immense consumption of confectionary, afforded great amusement to the other inmates and servants of the establishment. More than once in the second honeymoon Mrs. Barker had been called in to make up the peace; and she uniformly took the part of the aggrieved husband. The merits of the cases of matrimonial grievance it was, indeed, not very easy at all times to comprehend, beyond the fact, that "Emmeline was so saucy and teasing," and "Albert was so cross."

Not once in all this time had Mrs. Barker permitted her father and mother to embrace and congratulate their most fortunate child. There was time enough for that after the marriage ceremony had been repeated; and Professor Crippes had become thoroughly acquainted with the Plantagenet peerage in its remotest periods, and through all its minute ramifications, long before he had made the personal acquaintance of his noble son-in-law. One day, however, that the young lord had gone with Mr. Barker to Ascot, Mrs. Barker carried her sister to see her parents, who received her with pride and joy; though Mrs. Crippes soon remarked, that "it did her little good to have a lord for a son, if they were never to enter his door, or she or hers, save the Barkers, be one farthing the better for him." The better-bred Professor hoped, as soon as prudence would permit, he might have the honour of paying his respects to Earl St. Edward, whose mother had been a pupil of his at Windsor, where both she and her cousin, Lady Laura Temple, had lived with their grandmother the Duchess-dowager of Drawcasair.

"Then that daughter of the Earl of Tarbert must have been as old as St. Edward's mother—far too ancient for Sir George Lees"—said Mrs. Barker, who had been for some time appropriating the baronet as a cavalier, more closely than her sharp-witted mother altogether approved. "Is your old apprentice, Charles Herbert's wife, also connected with the St. Edwards family?"

"No; with the Tarberts only." And the Professor began to instruct the young countess in her noble family connexions, which Emmy declared puzzled her worse than counterpoint; and hastily inquired about the said apprentice, Mademoiselle Violette.

"And she married that charming man we used to have such famous romps with at W——, when I was a chit! Where do they live? I shall certainly go and visit them, and have them to dine with us. Mademoiselle was so kind to me, when you, mamma, used to be cross and box my ears! I liked her very much. She thought me pretty then, and made up one of her pink French dresses into a ball-frock for me, when I was a dowdy thing at the dancing-school.—Were not my brothers, Jack and Ned, in love with her?"

"Pretty reminiscence for a countess," said Mrs. Barker. "Fie, Emmeline! are you not ashamed of yourself, after the match I have secured for you?"

"La! You secured for me, Polly! How can you say so? Much obliged to you, indeed, Mrs. Barker. Did not St. Edward fall in love with me at the riding-school? . . . But I will go to see Mrs. Charles Herbert, and take my husband too,—I am determined on that. She has got a charming husband, but she has not got an Earl, though."

"You little fool! I wish you would take pattern by her in elegance and propriety of manners."

"I am a countess any way," returned Emmeline, pouting and hitching up the shoulder-strap in the old fashion—though, her dresses were now of a fit to remain quietly upon her, had she been so inclined.

"Something must be done to complete Emmeline's education, papa," said Mrs. Barker. "Barker says, that every one, even St. Edward, will, by and by, remark her deficiencies, and want of etiquette. She ought at the least to spend a few hours every morning at my house, where there is no necessity for her masters knowing who or what she is."

"Will she, though!" returned the young countess saucily. "No, Polly; it is about time to give up lessons when one marries."

"Barker has been seriously thinking, father," continued Barker's lady, paying no more attention to her sister than if she were a bit of wax in her hands, "that if we were to engage Herbert's wife to attend Emmeline, in my house, and under my eye, for a few hours a-day, while St. Edward rides out, we could not form a better or quieter arrangement: and useful to Herbert too, poor fellow, in his poor circumstances. Besides singing, Violet could give the countless instruction on many useful points that I have no leisure to impart. . . .

The usages of society—matters of etiquette, I must myself attend to."

"Spoken like yourself, my ever dear, ever talented child!—benefactress and ornament of your family!" returned the proud Professor, in his grandest manner, rising from his chair to his tiptoes. "My angel countess, you must listen to the affectionate sister and talented brother, who have your honour and interest so much at heart. Lovely and gifted as you are by Nature, my darling child, education and pollah must still farther fit you to grace your strawberry leaves, and prove, as you must do, one of the brightest ornaments of the future court of Victoria the First."

"I am determined to be presented at court the same day with the other brides; but St. Edward can't think yet who is to present me—not Polly, it seems, would be received, for as fine and clever a lady she is: setting herself above every one, and always taking Albert's part against me. I always liked Susan better than Polly." This last was a whisper to papa.

Mrs. Barker had, for some time, perceived, that it was to be no easy task to manage the petted, spoiled, wayward, countess. In her, the quick natural parts which distinguished all the family, high animal spirits, a vivacious good-natured vanity, and a singular mixture of shrewdness (some would have said cunning) and simplicity, formed, with warmth of affection, the basis of a character which, under skilful and kind management, might have been moulded to worth and grace; though now, to appearance, Emmeline's ruin, as a moral being, was beyond retrieval. Even in her effervescent tumultuous feelings for her husband, there was little of that saving grace, to a very young woman, still without regulating principle or restraining judgment—love. The fondness with which Emmeline alternately charmed and annoyed her young lord, scarcely deserved that sacred name. Respect for Mr. Barker was another restraining, if not wholesome, influence. Kind and conciliating as were his manners at all times to the pretty animated puppet that he had played for his own purposes. She feared, and in some measure loved him; and she entertained the instinctive affection felt by all his children for the courteous and indulgent Professor whose very flatteries of his family were sincere. Save those feelings, the young countess was far above all the ordinary influences and restraints of the opinions and customs which regulate the conduct of women. She had, indeed, never been under them; having passed at once from the school-child to the ennobled matron. On this subject, Mr. Barker had that morning held a serious conversation with his wife. Emmeline had been piquing the vanity, if not awakening the jealousy, of her young lord, by certain romping flirtations with, happily not one, but three or four hussar-officers living at the same hotel: and Mrs. Barker had chided in vain, Emmeline quickly retorting upon her her own flirtations. Barker had perceived Lord St. Edward's sullenness. The young husband was too proud] to complain; and though Barker again saw the amusing couple, on the same evening, lolling on the same sofa, and eating at the same pine-apple, he was far from being satisfied. "A connexion which secures to Emmeline a station and consequence no one durst have dreamed of," he said to his wife; "and which ought to be of inconceivable advantage to us, and the whole family, may terminate in disappointment and disgrace. . . . If your sister cannot be taught discretion, grinded into the observance of propriety, St. Edward will revolt. Passion is at present his preservative, and her safety; but there will be sudden and violent reaction; the blood of Plantagenet will assert itself. He was born and nursed a high aristocrat. He will not long forget what he has forfeited by his rash marriage, unless his wife retain that influence over his mind, as well as his affections, which only mind and affection, ay, and unbounded complaisance, good tact, a little of her sex's finesse, can enable her to retain."

"Where, Barker, are you to look for all this nonsense in Emmy?" replied Mrs. Barker, peevishly. "She is a pretty, saucy, spoiled child,—but she is St. Edward's wife—and he is a young man and very much in love."

Mr. Burke Barker did not deign to reply. On this occasion, as on many others, his spirited lady did not always, perhaps, quite understand him; and he found it more convenient to issue his commands, and exact obedience, than to reason with her.

"Emmeline seems to have an affectionate recollection of Violet," said he, "and if she, Mrs. Charles Herbert I mean, can be induced to spend a few hours a-day with her—to be in a sort domesticated with her;—in short, I conceive that the indirect influence of Violet's character may have even happier consequences on the foolish child, than any direct lessons she could receive. The mother-in-law, also, the elder Mrs. Herbert, is a woman of pleasant and graceful manners, and familiar with society,—in short, both are very much the sort of persons Emmeline requires. . . . As Herbert spends five days of the week in chambers, they must have abundant leisure for the office for which you have no time," Barker politely said, "and for which it would be impossible to requite them adequately!"

"Pooh!—With money that part of it may be managed;—and to-day I shall sound Emmeline; the main difficulty lies with her; obstinate, ungrateful thing, as she is."

We have seen the result of this sounding. The rustic countess was eager to renew her acquaintance with the gentle and sympathizing "Mademoiselle," whose kindness and indulgence had left so grateful an impression on her heart; but she would be no one's pupil:—had she married an earl to be sent to school?

"Then, Emmeline, since you are so desirous to renew your acquaintance with Violette, suppose we and papa take a drive to the out-of-the-way place at which she lives!"

"Charming!" cried the countess, springing to her feet, and dancing round. "I never see nobody,—I had more friends, and more fun at W— than since I have been in London, and married;—but I have not got my cameo bracelets—I should like to wear my cameo bracelets when I visit Mrs. Charles Herbert; and I wish I had some nice present to make her—she was very good to me, that girl was indeed, papa."

"Bewitching creature," returned the Professor, "who would not be good to you, my angel,—doat on you?"

"You were always mamma's pet, my own Emmeline," said Mrs. Crippes quite blandly, and in unwonted whining tones."

"Was I, mamma?—humph! Order my carriage, papa. I think you and I shall go alone, and Polly can follow us, if she wish it, in her own. Two carriages following look so dashing."

"I ought also to accompany you," said Mrs. Crippes, "and wish Mrs. Charles Herbert joy. It is not right to neglect them, poor things, now that they have fallen into misfortunes."

"Another day, mother," said Mrs. Barker decidedly, "will serve your purpose, and you shall go in my carriage, Emmeline,—we cannot have St. Edward's arms blazoning an obscure cottage-door, in an unfashionable quarter." The countess already comprehended this grand difficulty, and gave way, though she still regretted the want of her bracelets; and while she ran out to set her bonnet and prepare for her drive, and the Professor collected the MS. music of that darling opera in which "Mademoiselle" was to have been prima donna, and which was even dearer to his heart and vanity than his noble daughter, Mrs. Barker and her mother were left alone.

"Why, may I not accompany the countess, my own child, ma'am?" said Mrs. Crippes sharply "Do you and your husband, Mrs. Barker, intend to estrange the affections of my daughter from me? Do you mean to monopolise her and her husband wholly to yourselves, pray? If your father had the spirit of a mite he would put an end to this, and go at once with me to the earl, telling him who we are. Emmeline is his wife, I fancy, and our own flesh and blood—somewhat nearer to her and him, than you and your husband, Mrs. Barker. And I fancy he can do something for us, if he like—and for my son Jack, too,—which is more than ever you have done, Mrs. Barker, rich as it is said your husband is getting in one way or other."

These reproaches were not merely unseasonable; they were false and unjust; for Barker had been really liberal to his father-in-law—more so, indeed, than the increasing expenditure of his own extravagant household, in the opinion of his lady, justified. Among Barker's secret disgusts with his wife, was that intense selfishness which extended even to her father and mother; and he had often personally atoned for this vice, or fault, by contributing liberally to their comfortable immediate subsistence, and to getting forward the family.

"You, at least, have no cause to reproach my husband, ma'am," said Mrs. Barker, reddening.

"I do not reproach him, ma'am. I admire particularly his patience with his wife,—with your extravagance,—and your free, your over-free, conduct, Mrs. Barker, which is secretly cutting your poor father to the heart. Your mother, whom you despise, ma'am, never was so fine a lady as you, perhaps; never had lords and baronets dangling after her; but she always maintained an irreproachable and an unsuspected character, Mrs. Barker."

Mrs. Barker was furious; her large, bold, black eyes absolutely glared on her mother: but both ladies had discretion; and the apprehended return of the Professor with his huge roll of music, and of the little countess, bridled in those upbraiding tempers, to give vent to which was, with both, occasionally a private indulgence. Mrs. Crippes was, indeed, sensible that she had gone too far; and in a mollified tone she said, "You must know, Polly, that no one has your interest more at heart than your mother. The attentions and flatteries of fine gentlemen are all very well for a time; but if a woman forget herself and is exposed, what becomes of her? Despised, disgraced, poor—and you have no settlement. I trust to your own good sense; but clever, proud men, like Barker, are not to tamper with. . . . My other son-in-law, the earl, is much younger, and probably good-natured; though for any advantage the match promises to your father and me, or to my son Jack, save that blonde cap and satin dress you tell me Emmy sent me. . . . Old Coutts, I have always understood, settled a thousand a-year on his wife's mother; and Harriette Mellon was only the natural child of a low, vulgar Irishwoman; whereas my daughter is the lawful child of respectable and educated parents. When the Earl of Dashaway took Miss Prancer off the York stage, he at once settled seven hundred a-year on her parents; and they were poor creatures, who kept a hedge ale-house somewhere. But she insisted on it; and the sooner such arrangements are concluded after marriage the better; strike while the iron is hot."

"Would you but have a little patience, mother," said Polly; for her mother was coming it too strong even for her. "Would you but have a little patience, till Mr. Barker can properly arrange it all. You cannot complain of his want of attention to whatever may make papa and yourself respectable in society. Look at your handsome lodgings, elegant dress, and to every comfort you enjoy. How different from the old times of wretched W——! such a brilliant career opening to your children! every member of the family, now that Jack is provided for, so happy and prosperous!" . . .

"True, true, thank God, Polly; but how long will it last? I shall never be at rest till this young earl settle something handsome on me, which I am sure is his duty to his wife's mother."

"All in good time, dear mamma. The earl is still a boy, and in the meanwhile a very poor one. You are not aware of the obstacles thrown in our way by the perversity of his tyrannical grandfather; but I am sure he is generous, if Emmy can only be prudent, and papa and you keep in the background a few weeks longer. Lord St. Edward fancies you out of town, if he thinks of you at all. But here comes my father. . . . Ah, papa, almost tired waiting for you—so unlike your constant politeness, which, in all tempers, never fails."

If this was meant for an innuendo, Mrs. Crippes took no notice of it. She fondly laid back the luxuriant curls which clustered over the brow of her youngest daughter, for whom she at that moment experienced those maternal emotions, or yearning she-bear instincts, forgotten since she had held her an infant to her bosom.

"My lovely Emmeline! how beautiful you are! and always were; nay, I must kiss you again. When am I next to see my darling child; and the dear earl, who is so handsome, and loves my child so fondly—when are we to have the delight of seeing you together, my angel; for St. Edward is already as dear to me as my first-born son?"

"Ah, my poor brother Jack!" said the little countess, gently repelling the over-done caresses of the mother she had never been able to love, and whose tardy demonstrations of affection were now repulsive. "He was such a funny fellow with his wry nose! And he did Punch so cleverly! Jack was good to me, though. Always, I remember, when he had money, he bought me something. Come along, Polly—your ringlets are well enough, I am sure, for so old a lady. St. Edward at first fancied me her daughter, mamma, at the riding-school!"

"Impertinence! a countess indeed! You are fitter by manners for the wife of a gipsy."

Emmeline only laughed, delighted to have provoked her patronising sister; and, taking her father's arm, giddily whirled him down stairs—the mother following.

"Stay, countess! my angel! indeed, I cannot part with my countess till I know when I am to see her again;" and Mrs. Crippes inflicted more motherly kisses on the cheeks of her treasure. "My dearest love to the earl."

"How very kind mamma has grown," said the shrewd and dutiful little countess. "How much she has always loved me—only I never found it out before. You, to be sure, Poll,—or was it mamma?—sent me down an old green silk dress to make a frock when you married, and when poor Susan and I were scuttling about W——, with whoever would keep us for a few more weeks. I was very glad when Susan married though, just when the Stocks of the Grove were obliged to turn me off, because Jack and you ran away with their relation, Miss Juliana. Susan's husband has but two pounds a-week from your old admirer, Benjamin; but they were so merry and happy, and so was I, in my little truckle-bed in Susan's garret, till you grand folks in London were good enough to remember me——"

"How inconsiderately you talk, Emmeline; if you knew half the difficulties your parents have had to encounter in London, you would not think yourself warranted to blame the seeming neglect of you for a time."

"I do not blame,—I was very happy,—I had lovers then, too, plenty of them,—and poor Susan was always—though she scolded me for being giddy—so really kind."

"Do not mention or think of that unhappy connexion, Emmy; if you would not disgrace us altogether;—above all, never let the earl hear of that unhappy creature. Sister, I cannot call her."

"Susan! my sister, Susan? Sure, Polly, you do not know what you are saying;—Susan's was a love-match just like mine; and her husband and she are very happy and merry, and never quarrel. I had a letter from poor Susan this morning; and mean to make my husband do something for them."

"You! you correspond with those people unknown to us. Oh, papa, will you show Emmeline her folly? She will ruin herself and us one way or other,—that is predestined!"

"My angel," interposed the Professor, who had listened uncomfortably, and was rather at a loss as to the duty expected from him, though sharing in his elder daughter's alarms; "Your charming simplicity,—your youthful innocence, my lovely Emmeline, render you somewhat unfit to judge for yourself in certain matters. Upon your love and obedience, my angel, I entreat you to consult and walk by the advice of your dear sister; a lady who knows the world thoroughly—a woman of the soundest judgment, occupying a high station in the society she adorns."

The countess was much in the mood of saying "Fudge;" but she loved, and, in a way, respected her father; so she merely hitched her shoulder-strap.

Mrs. Burke Barker had always so much to explain. "Emmeline, my love," she said, "you say I have been taken for your mother; and fashionable hours and hot rooms,—perhaps, too, family anxieties—have told on me; but when I come to visit you at Plantagenet Court, the pure air of that princely place, and the kindness of its mistress and that of my lord, will make me young again; a fond mother's feeling for you I do claim."

"I shall be so happy to see you sister,—and my brother Barker,—and you, papa,—and mamma too," interrupted the generous patronising countess, whom vanity warmed into kindness; "but the duke must die first, you know;—and he is sixty-five, papa. How very old! he surely can't live very long now."

"I adore your delightful frankness, my angel; but my Emmy, you must use a little more caution"—

"O, papa, never fear me," interrupted the lively countess; "I am so cunning sometimes: Polly fancies no one can be cunning but herself,—but I"—

"Hush! you giddy thing," said Mrs. Barker, "cunning neither of us are; artifice is not a characteristic of our family; but in that delicate address so essential to every one living in society, but especially to those having your nice part to play, you are still sadly deficient. I was going to say, Emmeline, that whether I look to be your mother or not, I have a fond mother's feelings for you, and your happiness at heart above everything."

"Well, well, Polly, I sha'n't be saucy again,—kiss and be friends,—I daresay you like me."

"Let me see then how like a lady you will conduct yourself with Mrs. Herbert. That is their house now, poor things! But we must make allowances."

Before Mrs. Barker and the Countess St. Edward alighted with their father at the humble gateway of the villabin, we shall take leave for a moment to look within, and see how this "unfortunate family," as all the world and their friends called them, are prospering.

LITERARY REGISTER.

Moore's Poetical Works. Volume IV.

THIS volume contains the fag-end of the Irish Melodies, together with the dedications and advertisements originally prefixed to the separate Parts; the National Airs (less known, and many of them exquisitely beautiful,) and also the Sacred Songs. The preface to the volume contains a few affecting reminiscences of the "Rebel Times," when Ireland, Great Britain warmly sympathizing, morally, mentally, and to a considerable extent physically, participated in the shock and change produced by the French Revolution. Among the ardent British sympathizers in the revolutionary enthusiasm of Ireland at that period, many, we have reason to think, have lived to see that Irish patriotism was then, as at other times, deeply tainted with self-seeking; with views of distempered ambition and personal aggrandisement, from which few of the patriots of '98 were free; while many of the body might have safely joined in the Highland chieftain's prayer—"Lord! turn the world upside down, that honest folk may make bread out of it." But Mr. Moore, who then felt as an Irishman, still remembers only as an Irishman, and as one of a proscribed race.

He somewhat strains the point when he alleges that, at the close of the last century, when Mr. Bunting of Belfast, following the example of the Scottish collectors, rescued the native melodies of Ireland, they had nearly sunk into irretrievable oblivion, owing, first, to the "fierce legislature of the Pale," and, next, to "the deadly pressure of the Penal Laws." While there was a country girl to sing at her wheel, a weaver at his loom, or a plough-boy on the lea, not to mention the wandering mendicants of both sexes—the modern minstrels—and the fire-side circle of the peasant's hut, there was little danger of what would have been a severe national deprivation. Yet are the patriotic labours of Mr. Bunting not the less deserving of praise. With Bunting's well-timed Collection of national Irish airs, young Moore became acquainted about the period that he first knew the unfortunate Robert Emmet, who had previously been his fellow-student at Trinity College, and who was afterwards a member of the same debating societies with him. The questions discussed in these societies often took their colouring from the prevalent republican feelings of the members; and Emmet uniformly supported the democratic side of the argument, and with eloquence and ardour. Among the remarkable sentences in his speeches which Mr. Moore quotes, is the following, which is singularly applicable to times, when

As bees on flowers alighting cease their hum,
So, settling upon places, Wages grow dumb.

Emmet's canon was this:—"When a people advancing rapidly in knowledge and power, perceive, at last, how far their government is lagging behind them, what then, I ask, is to be done in such a case? What but to pull the government up to the people." This is exactly the present condition of the people and government of Britain:—who will lend an active and strong hand at the needful pulling-up process! About this time Moore became the happy possessor of Bunting's national airs; and—but his own words will best tell the affecting anecdote:—"Though never regularly instructed in music, I could play over the airs with tolerable facility on the piano-forte. Robert Emmet used sometimes to sit by me when I was thus engaged; and I remember one day his starting up as from a reverie, when I had just finished playing that spirited tune called 'The Red Fox,' and exclaiming, 'Oh that I were at the head of twenty thousand men marching to that air!' How little did I then think that in one of the most touching of the sweet airs I then played to him, his own dying words would find an interpreter so worthy of their sad, but proud, feeling—or that another of those mournful strains would long be associated in the hearts of his countrymen with the memory of her who shared with Ireland his last blessing and prayer!" Mr. Moore here alludes to two of the most pathetic of his own songs, "Oh breathe not his name;" and "She is far from the land where her young hero sleeps." The first song, though sometimes supposed to allude to Lord Edward Fitzgerald, was suggested by this passage in Emmet's dying speech, "Let no man write my epitaph. . . . Let my tomb remain un-inscribed, till other times and other men shall learn to do justice to my memory."

We have formerly, and rather innocently, perhaps, expressed disappointment at finding Moore the author of not one scrap of the fugitive rebel poetry of that period, which, with many gaudy flowers of poesy, contained not a little heart-warm and heart-stirring power. He relates, that it was in prose—"in dull and twyld prose," too—but we cannot believe that—that he made his first appearance in print, and in the Press newspaper, as a champion of the popular cause. This print had been set up by Arthur O'Connor, the elder Emmet, and the other chiefs of the United Irish Conspiracy. Mr. Moore, we rather think, underrates the literary talent displayed in this seditious journal. Nothing dull could have produced the effect which it did not only in Ireland, but in England and Scotland. In the West of Scotland the Press was, indeed, as popular as in its native field. It was, at all events, warmly admired in Mr. Moore's family circle, to which, on the days of publication, he usually read it aloud after supper; and hence naturally became desirous to contribute to its popular and patriotic columns. His mother, however good a patriot, was much more of an affectionate and wise mother, naturally more anxious for the safety and prosperity of her son, than zealous for the advancement of the public cause; and her vigilance detected Moore's incipient flirtations with the seditious Press before any mischief had been done. On her discovering his second communication, he readily pledged his word to discontinue these dangerous practices; and in a year or two afterwards was dedicating his amatory lays, by permission, to the Prince of Wales

—a much safer line for a rising poet. His first communication to the rebel newspaper was a fragment in imitation of Ossian, which, he says, passed off quietly—nobody being "in any sense the wiser for it." From the persecution directed by the Heads of the University against every student who could, by any chance, be suspected of entertaining national feelings, young Moore came off with safety and honour. The grand Inquisitor, in his case, was the famous Dr. Duigenan; and Fitzgibbon, Lord Clare, then Vice-Chancellor of the University, also took a leading part. The preface contains a few detached notices respecting the origin or bearing of particular songs in the collected Melodies.

It is almost idle to select a specimen of the Irish Melodies; yet we believe that the first couplet of the second stanza of the following patriotic effusion, is familiar to thousands who do not know whence it is taken:—

REMEMBER THEE.

Remember thee?—yes, while there's life in this heart,
It shall never forget thee, all lorn as thou art;
More dear in thy sorrow, thy gloom, and thy showers,
Than the rest of the world in their sunniest hours.

Wert thou all that I wish thee, great, glorious, and free,
First flower of the earth, and first gem of the sea—
I might hail thee with prouder, with happier brow;
But oh! could I love thee more deeply than now!

No, thy chains as they rankle thy blood as it runs,
But make thee more painfully dear to thy sons—
Whose hearts, like the young of the desert-bird's nest,
Drink love in each life-drop that flows from thy breast.

NEW NOVELS.

The Moneyed Man. By Horace Smith, Esq., author of "Brambletye House," &c. &c. 3 volumes.

We have been much pleased with this sober-toned, and natural fiction. It is written in an enlarged and philosophic spirit, and with a moral purpose of no restricted sort. The form is that of autobiography:—Hawkwood, the hero of his own tale, is, at the close of the last century, the only son and heir of the richest banker in London, a cold-hearted, selfish, money-getter; and of a weak and vain mother. The changes of his fortunes and character, the hardening and corrupting influences of wealth, and the beneficial effects of adversity, on a mind of considerable original strength, are well and often forcibly

* Since Mr. Moore neither preserves this poem, or prose-poem, so that it may be recognised among his collected works, where it might have been out of place, we are tempted to make a guess about its identity. However the author may alight his early production, it must have had some attaching quality, since some faint image of it dwells on the memory of the friend to whom we are indebted for the information, after a lapse of forty years. The subject, if our conjecture be right, was the execution of ORR:—

A voice comes on the night-breeze—

'Tis the spirit of ORR that complains;

Pensive he leans from his cloud, and weeps o'er the slumbers of Erin.

Has Erin heard the voice of the hero—has Erin awakened?

No—she still sleeps.

Bloody is the field where she lies,

And her garments are streaming in blood, &c. &c.

It is probable that this indicative quotation from the supposed poem of Moore is very inaccurate. Our informant avers, that, however Mr. Moore may depreciate said effusion, it was, and especially the burden of every stanza:—

Has Erin heard the voice of the hero?—has Erin awakened?

No—she still sleeps—

felt to be deeply impressive—quite thrilling, indeed, in those passionate days. Let no man of genius write anything in the belief that it will not take root, and be remembered somewhere—

* For which Moore has written the song, "Let Erin remember the days of old."

depicted—holding up a truthful mirror to other minds. We may, perhaps, have been somewhat biassed by the tone and tendency of the book, but we are inclined to place the MONEYED MAN above anything which its author has yet produced.

The Naval Surgeon. By the author of "Cavendish," "The Flying Dutchman," &c. &c. 3 volumes.

Though the author of this romance out-Herods Herod, in heaping one outrageous improbability upon another, and clearing the whole per saltum, there is a great deal of good stuff in his work, though not of the finest original texture, nor yet very skillfully finished off.

Henry of Monmouth; or, the Field of Agincourt.

By Major Michel. 3 volumes. Saunders & Otley.

THE MONEYED MAN is a novel of character; the NAVAL SURGEON unites romance with pictures of everyday life; but our third specimen, HENRY OF MONMOUTH, is a pure historical romance of the school of Leandro and the Talisman; and indeed adheres much more strictly to historical events, and the features of the memorable and momentous period chosen for delineation. Major Michel displays throughout a creditable extent of knowledge of the history and manners of the age; he presses every eminent character and picturesque circumstance of the times of chivalry into the service; and with knights, squires, minstrels, and errant damsels, besides the heroic and the subordinate personages, contrives fully to occupy the scene, and to keep alive the action. This was the age of Owen Glendower, of Joan of Arc, of Whittington, Lord Mayor of London, and of the Lollards and Zingaries, as well as of Falstaff's "true Prince;" and we have them all here, busling upon a crowded, busy, and animated scene, until the curtain drops upon the royal nuptials of Henry and Katherine of Valois. In short, HENRY OF MONMOUTH will afford a treat to the voracious admirers of pure romance.

The Romancist and Novelist's Library. Volume I.
Edited by William Hazlitt.

Save the grace of an attractive name in the title-page, we cannot comprehend the use of an editor to these reprints. The prefatory address describes this as the fifth volume, the title-page as the first. The enigma may be explained by having here five of the original volumes, or parts, in one volume; which, indeed, the paging shows. It is more to the point to tell, that the volume comprehends Maturin's first bulky romance, The Family of Montorio, the popular melodramatic Rinaldo Rinaldini, Picken's Deer-Stalkers; May Martin, an American story, and a few other short Tales. The whole forms a popular collection of romantic fictions of the stimulating kind, at an exceedingly low price.

Devereux

Forms (we think) Volume V. of Bulwer's collected novels. About a book so well-known, this is saying all that is needful, as in form and type it is exactly the same as the previous volumes. But in an epistle dedicatory to a friend at Naples, the author has said something of his work, and a very little about himself: and these revelations are always of interest to readers and to thinkers; nor the less so for the gentle tone of philosophic melancholy which often mingles with literary reminiscences. Devereux was the third novel of the series. Like the Disowned, it was written in retirement; and in what its author describes as perhaps the happiest period of his literary life; "when success began to brighten upon my labours, and it seemed to me a fine thing to make a name. Reputation, like all possessions, fairer in the hope than the reality, shone before me in the gloss of novelty, —and I had neither felt the envy it excites, the weariness it occasions, nor (worse than all) that coarse and painful notoriety, that something between the gossip and the slander, which attends every man whose writings become known—surrendering the grateful privacies of life to

'The gaudy, babbling, and remorseless day.'"

Such are among the pains and penalties of even the most successful authorship, thus truly and feelingly indicated by the successful and popular member of a profession, in which to preserve tolerable serenity of mind, the practitioners would require to be more than ordinarily thick-skinned.—Without adverting to the author's criticism on Devereux, as a composition, we shall cite from it one or two felicitous sentences:—

That was a happy age, my dear Auldjo, when, on finishing a work, we could feel contented with our labour, and fancy we had done our best. Now, alas! I have learnt enough of the wonders of the Art to recognise all the deficiencies of the Disciple; and to know that no author, worth the reading, can ever, in one single work, do all of which he is capable. . . . No man, I believe, ever wrote anything really good, who did not feel that he had the ability to write something better. Writing, after all, is a cold and coarse interpreter of thought. How much of the imagination—how much of the intellect—evaporates, and is lost, while we seek to embody it in words! Man made language, and God the genius. Nothing short of an eternity could enable men who imagine, think, and feel, to express all they have imagined, thought, and felt. Immortality, the spiritual desire, is the intellectual necessity. . . . You, a fellow-author—you know, and must feel with me, that these our books are a part of us—bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh! They treasure up the thoughts which stirred us—the affections which warmed us, years ago,—they are the mirrors of how much of what we were! To the world they are but as a certain number of pages—good or bad—tedious or diverting; but to ourselves, the authors, they are as marks in the wild maze of life, by which we can retrace our steps—and be with our youth again. What would I not give to feel as I felt—to hope as I hoped—to believe as I believed—when this work was first launched upon the world!

Devereux, as a literary work, pleased its author better than Pelham or the Disowned: but all artists are proverbially bad judges of their own productions.

The Ports, Arsenals, and Dock-yards of France.
By a Traveller.

This is a republication of a series of letters which, last Autumn, when rumours of war with France were rife and alarming, appeared in The Times newspaper. The letters, in their collected form, are in flattering terms dedicated to the Jupiter Tonans of the leading journal, by an apt and promising pupil of the school; able, audacious, and by no means scrupulous or mealy-mouthed. The information he gives is, however, often of considerable value; and his opinions, and reflections on individuals may be received at discretion.

A Manual of British Ornithology. By William Macgillivray. Part I.—The Land-Birds.

This work is in substance an abridgment of the scientific part of the author's large work, to which it continually refers.

The Spectator, with Illustrations in Acrography.
Volume I.

The book is very well printed—the illustrations are numerous, and many of them are well designed, though, on the whole, they do not convey a very favourable idea of the new art which, it is said, is to rival wood-engraving and lithography, from its cheapness, and the facility with which it may be employed in the illustration of popular works. The art is still in its infancy, and probably susceptible of great improvement; which, from the specimens before us, it would require to exhibit, before it will answer the desired purpose, if elegance is aimed at.

Patchwork. By Captain Basil Hall. 3 vols.

Captain Hall has thus aptly named the entertaining odds and ends which he has dragged from the recesses of his memory, or the depositories of his manuscript journals and note-books. The patches are, of course, of all fabrics, hues, and sizes; and though no particular method is followed in arranging them, they produce an agreeable whole. No one spins a long yarn more deftly and pleasantly than this writer; and he has, besides, often the merit of reeling off a great deal from wonderfully little of the raw material. The sketches relate to early rambles, and to recent family tours in Switzerland, Italy, and Sicily; and to adventures in India, South America, and other places. They appear sometimes like unused fragments of former works.

Pulpit Recollections, or Miscellaneous Sermons, Preached in the Parish Church of Stoke-upon-Trent. By the Rev. Sir William Dunbar, Bart., late Curate of the Parish.

Sensible, brief, and (most of them) practical discourses, these are composed in a spirit of moderation and charity, and with no taint, so far as we have discovered, of the modern high Popery of the Anglican church, termed Puseyism. In the sermon on Simon Peter's call to the ministry, we hear of the direct Divine call which the Apostle received and obeyed, but nothing whatever about Apostolic Succession, continued in the persons of the Bishops of London or Exeter.

A Manual of Chemistry. By Richard D. Hoblyn, A.M., Oxon, author of a Dictionary of Terms used in Medicine, &c. &c.

This writer's previous book gives fair warrant for the accuracy and perspicuity of the present; all the qualities that are required in a manual, whether intended for the purpose of self-instruction, or to assist the student attending a lecturer on the science of chemistry.

Thoughts on Phrenology. By a Barrister of the Middle Temple.

Those acquainted with the writings of Combe, and also with those of Scott, and the orthodox phrenologists, of whom there are a few, will find nothing original in this treatise; but it is written by a thorough and sincere believer in the organs, even up to the thirty-ninth or whatever the latest number may be—whose diffidence has only given way before a strong desire to combat the opposition to phrenology, which he considers still but too general. He contends, that the imputed heresies of Mr. Combe and others, although true, ought not to be charged against the science, which he asserts to be perfectly reconcilable with revealed religion.

NO. LXXXVIII.—VOL. VIII.

Contributions to Aural Surgery. By James Yearsley, Surgeon to the Institution for Curing Diseases of the Ear.

We do not consider ourselves qualified to speak of the professional merits of these papers; but they seem sensible, and they are not empirical.

Memoirs on the Countries about the Caspian and Araxes, Illustrative of the late Russian Expedition against Khivah. Translated from the German of Lieutenant Carl Zimmerman, of the Prussian Service. By Captain Morier, R.N. With a Map, by Arrowsmith.

This Memoir forms a valuable contribution to science; and possesses the rare merit of sticking closely to the text, and admitting no surplusage. In the present state of our relations with India, it has besides a special interest.

The East Indian Year-Book for 1841.

This is a compilation of scientific and statistical information, concerning India; together with a mass of miscellaneous facts and lists, which will be found useful to those connected with that country.

The Year-Book of Facts for 1841.

This little volume differs in no respect from those of the last two years. It does not pretend to any degree of originality; but has its uses, in collecting from the newspapers of this and other countries, and the scientific journals, whatever improvements or discoveries in science and art have been made, (whether real or imaginary,) and all sorts of information connected with the arts, which contribute to the comfort of daily life. The necessity of making up a volume, may sometimes have made facts be adopted which are not of any great importance. Those we copy out, to explain the plan of the work, do not fall under this remark:—

ALE AND PORTER PRESERVED.

In order to save ale or porter in good condition, for a considerable length of time, it is for the most part kept corked down in bottles. An apparatus has been invented, by which liquids may be kept constantly under pressure in casks as well as in corked bottles. The vessel is made in the form of a cask of strong tin, strongly braced by iron hoops, and standing on its end. At the upper end is a cock soldered to a tube, which is immersed to within an inch of the bottom of the cask. At the same end is a condensing syringe, by means of which the air can be forced into the cask, and, whenever this is effected, it is obvious that the liquor will have a tendency to escape through the tube, and out at the cock, with a force proportionate to the degree the air is compressed by the action of the syringe. If the cock be turned, the liquor will rush out with violence, foaming with a fine head. Every time the air (ale!) is drawn from the cask, the air it contains is not exposed to the atmosphere while the liquor is kept under pressure, and no vent-peg is necessary. It is stated, that all the advantages of bottling are obtained by this process, without one half of the waste and inconvenience attending the former system.

CLOTH OF GLASS.

Few are aware that glass is now woven with silk, although its brittle nature would appear to render such a mode of manufacturing it impossible. The fact, however, is indisputable, the new material being substituted for gold and silver thread, than either of which it is more durable, possessing besides the advantage of never tarnishing. What is technically called the warp—that is the long way of any loom-manufactured article—is posed of silk, which forms the body and ground-work on which the pattern in glass appears as the weft, or cross-work. The requisite flexibility of glass-thread to manufacturing, is to be ascribed to its extreme fineness, as not less than fifty or sixty of the original threads produced by steam-power, are required to form one thread for the loom. The process is slow, as not more than a yard can be manufactured in twelve hours. The work, however, is extremely beautiful, and comparatively cheap, inasmuch as no similar stuff, where bullion is really introduced, can be purchased for anything like the price at which it is sold; added to this, it is, as far as the glass is concerned, imperishable. Some admirable specimens may be seen at the Polytechnic Institution, Regent Street, especially two patterns of silver on a blue and red ground, and another of gold on crimson. It is woven in the Jacquard loom.

Report of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, &c. &c. &c.

This is a pamphlet of great value, which may be had for a few pence, we suppose—or, we daresay, freely reprinted whenever it is required, and which can be circulated through the post-office for twopence. It is another important Commercial and Manufacturing Manifesto; or, in the exact words of the title, "The injurious effects of restrictions on trade, and the necessity of immediate changes in our commercial policy; arising out of the Report and Evidence of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on Import Duties, during the last Session of Parliament." The Report of the MANCHESTER CHAMBER is subscribed by the able President, Mr. J. B. SMITH, the recent candidate for Walsall, than whom no man in England better understands the subject in all its bearings. The report sets out with a succinct history of the small, and uniformly successful changes, that have been made in the commercial system since 1814, when the East India Company's monopoly was partially relaxed; noticing the reforms in the navigation laws, and in the silk, linen, and wool trade, all of which have prospered in the face of the dismal prophecies of the utter ruin which was to attend relaxation of the restrictive system.

LETTERS ON EMIGRATION TO NEW SOUTH WALES, &c.

BY WILLIAM AND RICHARD HOWITT.

I.

MR. WILLIAM HOWITT TO MR. WILLIAM TAIT.

HEIDELBERG, Feb. 1st, 1841.

MY DEAR SIR,—You have always manfully and boldly denounced and exposed the system of delusion practised by interested parties towards the British public, in connexion with the South Australian Colonies; and I, therefore, now send you, by permission of the writer, extracts from letters recently received from Port Philip, in which much that you have predicated is shown to be true to the letter; and which so deeply concerns the prospects of those cherishing ideas of emigrating thither, and the honour of the English government, that I lose no time in putting them into your hands. Interested speculators fill the heads of John Bull's innocent family with such Elysian visions of these southern lands; with rich fields of crocus and of asphodel; with such wide-spreading and undulating prairies and uplands, scattered with beautiful trees, and carpeted with such delicious grass; with visions of vast flocks ranging at will over them, and such immense fortunes to be raised on "locations" and on "wool;" that one has only to visit the London Dock in order to see the effect of all this poetry, in ships in scores bound for South Australia, and emigrants in thousands flocking towards them. The swindling and humbug practised on the public have lately met with some severe exposures, by the recent discovery of the extensive robbery and ruin of unsuspecting emigrants in the shape of Australian bank transactions; and by that very colony against which your strictures were directed, after all its flourish of trumpets, being obliged to come with loud appeals to government for pecuniary aid and salvation. Here you have another settlement which has been most loudly eulogized, and towards which, consequently, great numbers have turned their hopes and prospects, depicted by a hand on which you may thoroughly depend. My brother Richard, from whose letters these are extracts, is a man who is well known in the literary world as the author of some beautiful and genuine poetry, and is,

moreover, well known to a considerable circle as a man who is independent in mind and character, has no party feeling, and never joined himself to any political party; but, at the same time, would stand by the truth to the death. The emigrating party with whom he went out took with them, entirely on the faith of many representations, a large property to invest; and now they find that the very first foundation for a secure and profitable investment is wanting—a good government; as in our colonies all the world over, there is neglect on the part of the home government, and, consequently, a source of deplorable destitution of every measure and means for healthily planting and establishing colonies. The land is sold; but the money—which, by a wise and efficient government, would be immediately laid out in building bridges, and docks, and quays; in laying down streets, and raising public buildings; in short, in organizing and carrying into effect all those plans which must make a colony flourish—is regularly sent out of it as fast as raised. In fact, while our government at home is overwhelmed with debt, mercantile distress, and the menaces of a taxed and oppressed people, which they take no means to remove, it is absurd to hope for a real and effective colonial government. Hence, wherever our colonies extend, we have one huge scene of mal-administration and popular discontent. In Canada, hatred to us; in South Africa, despotism; in South Australia, delusion and distress; and in India, a hundred millions of the worst kind of slaves—that is, slaves in the worst condition, without the name of slaves; and a government going on, like the Romans, in extending conquest, till, some day, the whole unwieldy concern will go down together. When and how reform of this awful state of things is to come, time must determine; but no time ought to be lost in laying before government, and those contemplating emigration, such facts as these extracts contain.—Yours very truly, W. Howitt.

MR. RICHARD HOWITT TO MR. WILLIAM HOWITT.

MELBOURNE, 11th May, 1840.

DEAR BROTHER,—I wrote from this place a month ago, for which letter I had to pay the land-postage, 1s. 6d. All letters go from hence to Sydney, although there are ships enough direct for London. The reason, I am told, is this,—the postmaster here has 5 per cent. on all the cash he can raise; and on that account they are sent round about for the nearest. We are perpetually reminded of the old school chimes,—“To be—to do—and to suffer.” At every turn you take there is something to pay. You get out of the ship into a boat, and pay 2s. 6d. to be set on shore. When you reach the shore, a person is ready with a one-horse cart to take you to the river Yarra for 3s.—two miles and a half; to go over the Yarra, 8d. You next bring your goods and luggage to the town,—10s. per ton. You will find at the Wharf a Custom-house—the only sign of civilisation. Another sign of civilisation—they are ready again to be paid for wharfage where there is no wharf, the place being rather worse than God and Nature made it, man having trampled into mud that which Nature left smooth greenward. The first day I came to Melbourne along with my brother, and the other passengers in their boat,—a boat which they had built in Portsmouth. In addition to our being as sharply looked after as so many thieves on the custom-house quay, (God save the mark!) in our absence, to obtain clearances for goods at the other custom-house in the town, the boat was seized by a busy-body of the said customs for not having a name on it. Belonging to six persons, how was it likely! and how could persons, landing for the first time, know anything of the by-laws of Melbourne! We found the boat taken to the opposite side of the Yarra, marked with the Government broad arrow. This was the first mark of the Melbourneites' hospitality to us strangers, on our first touching their shores. I found my brother, and other owners of the boat, using all gentle words, and reasonable arguments, to obtain the possession of the boat,—and all of no avail; the custom-house gents condoling with them, and wishing it were in their power to give it up. Tired of such smooth blarney, I spoke plain English to them. I soon had their metal up; and then, that they might cool a little in our absence, I told them I should have a pretty statement to give of their gentlemanliness and hospitality, and courtesy to emigrants, being come out myself to Port-Philip partly for the purpose. The day after, we found what I had said about the statement had had its effect. The boat was given up to us at once, and without even a fine, which the day before was confiscated to Government sans remorse. Still they conceived they did us a great favour, taking into consideration the hard things I had said of them.

Above all things, it is the greatest folly for emigrants to bring out servants—men or women—with them; they leave almost immediately. Two families only on board the “Lord Goderich” brought servants, and both have left, or are about to leave. Mr. Hall, a tent-neighbour of ours—for we dwell in tents—brought out a servant-man with him, and he has left him in the space of a fortnight. Two vessels have come in from England since ours, the “Lousia Campbell” and the “China.” The governess of a family on board the “China” was yesterday (Sunday) married to a rich settler here. So much for paying the passage of servants—others reaping the benefit of your money.

Alas! for Melbourne—Australia Felix is a portion of New South Wales. Would it were not! The money which goes from hence to Sydney keeps Melbourne poor. THIRTY-NINE THOUSAND POUNDS, and ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND POUNDS, sum after sum, sale after sale—the land proceeds go to Sydney; and the Government revenues are voted away; £70,000 at once to New Zealand, and other sums to other places; but what is expended at Port-Philip! We have no road; the town is knee-deep in mud, or in dry weather eclipsed in its own dust; There is no bridge over the Yarra; the place is left to itself, fine infant town as it is, as though it were a beggar's brat, to wallow in its own filth, and to be choked by its own dust. Nothing is expended on it by the Government. The only evidence we have of the existence of a government, is the presence of half a dozen or a dozen soldiers, the custom-house, and the Government auctioneer. The Sydney Government is a receiving Government! Alas! for such paternity. I say, God help Melbourne! There is nothing else for it.

The land is a pleasant and desirable land enough; but until we have a governor of our own, direct from England, I could not conscientiously advise any person to emigrate here. Persons who come out to this place find themselves miserably deceived in the price of land. They read of its being obtained at 12s. per acre. They expect to have it at that price, or near it; to see it before it is sold; and being able to fix upon it immediately. They must wait a month or two for land sales. Perhaps they want country sections; and none are put up, or sections not worth having. Bad land, and without river frontage—consequently not worth a farthing—that land may be had for this sum; whilst good land, well watered, will fetch an immense price. Some of the surveyors do not themselves exactly know the demarcations of the surveyed.

III.

MR. RICHARD HOWITT TO MR. WILLIAM HOWITT.

MELBOURNE, PORT PHILLIP, NEW SOUTH WALES,
July 11th, 1840.

DEAR BROTHER,—All our friends and fellow emigrants, sooner or later, have had letters from their relations in England, except us. Some of them also have had newspapers; a thing, however, of rare occurrence, the post-offices of these and the parent country being distinct, a disadvantage, amongst many others, which this unfortunate country labours under. Newspapers could be forwarded to us if something were paid upon them, or if they were made up into a parcel. I should not write to you now, save that there are some things, with regard to this region, which ought to be made generally known to the English people, and the sooner the better. Moreover, a friend of ours, one of our tent-residents, is going over to Launceston, V. D. L.; and thus by paying 4d. in that place, I avoid the imposition of David Kelsch, our postmaster, into whose purse must drop 1s. 6d.

for every letter transmitted hence to England. What a shame it is that these colonies are not placed on an equal footing with her Majesty's other colonies!

We have been here the quarter of a year, and ought by this time to know something of Australia Felix. Whence it derived this felicitous name God knows, and Major Mitchell; but certainly not from the nature of the country. It is, however, deservedly called the Land of Promise, performance lying yet in speculation. The land has grown gold to those who have bought and sold it, almost at present its only growth. It is neither a land of rivers and springs of water, nor does it overflow with milk and honey: honey there is none, and milk is 6d. per pint. I have read in the Port Philip papers a document of Lord John Russell's, addressed to the Emigration Board newly formed for the colonies; wherein he points it out, as one of their duties, to divest the information they impart, of all poetical colouring. Now, this, without his Lordship's laying any charge upon me

I will, as soon as I have sufficient health and leisure, perform as a duty, gratuitously to the public. In the meantime I will mention a few of our and the country's grievances. We were led to expect a most delicious climate, the thermometer seldom higher than 90, or lower than 45. On July 3d it was as low as 25,—there was ice an inch thick in the wash-hand basin, and by noon, so sudden and intense was the change, that it was up at 85. This, of course, was in our tent, where all skyey influences are more strongly felt. We have had, I can assure you, enough cold weather; and I attribute to these extremes of temperature, an attack of dysentery, which has, in nearly a week's time, shrunk me to skin and bone.

Another of the disadvantages attending Australian emigration, is the length of time before you can purchase land and locate yourself upon it. We understood that we could have any part of the country we might fix upon, surveyed, and put up by auction; but this we find, like the mildness of the climate, a fable. It is so in the Sydney country and in Van Dieman's Land; and there, if the selector pays for the survey and does not purchase, he is repaid by the purchaser. All who come out hither must either purchase at second-hand, or wait for a Government land sale. Not choosing to do the former of these alternatives, he must either live like a gipsy, in a tent, or endure many exorbitant charges in a new settlement; and even then he will have to submit to some. After waiting for several months the sale day arrives, and, to his mortification, there are only town allotments to be sold, and he wants a country section. The first week that we landed, there was a land sale, but there was no land that suited us. Consequently we had to wait, after a long and wearisome voyage from England, from April the 5th, to June the 10th, before we had any opportunity of purchasing. At the next land sales town allotments alone will be sold, in Melbourne, Williams-Town, and Gulong; and the emigrants who are now arriving, or those who could not supply themselves at the June sales, must wait, and linger and wait. Surely they will not forget this is the Land of Promise, Australia Felix! and that it is pleasant to have something in prospective. If the lands were sold in too liberal quantities at first, the Government has amended that indiscretion; those who purchased have some leisure allowed them to retail their speculations out again: and thus, betwixt the sales, men's land appetites are sharpened, and the present dribblings keep it on edge.

The soil is not generally of so rich a quality as was represented to us in England. Many who came out with us are dissatisfied; some have settled in Van Dieman's Land, and some will return, as soon as they have realized their expenses out, to England. Port Philip, or rather Australia Felix, has disadvantages to contend with that the other colonies in this part of the world have not: the old colony of New South Wales, and Van Dieman's Land also, have abundance of cheap labour; and it is to maintain, in their superiority, these old colonies, that the proceeds of our Melbourne lands in great measure go. After more than £800,000 has been realized, so utterly is the place neglected, that there are no wharfs, yet there are wharf charges; no bridges, no roads, save such as are the result of individual industry and enterprise. There is a shallow and dangerous bay, in which almost every ship of any size is aground; yet there are no lighthouses, no pilots. There has been time enough wherein to dispose of by auction more than £800,000 worth of the public lands, yet there has been no time to facilitate commerce, or to provide a safe entrance to the bay of Port Philip on the part of the Government. Messrs. Morris and Dellanoy, two enterprising persons who were in the habit of offering their services as pilots in the bay, risked their lives, and lost them, by going down last week, in a paltry little boat, to the assistance of the "Mellish," from England, which was fast aground in the bay. I knew Dellanoy well; he had been at our tents, and had gone down in our boat with us from Melbourne to Williams-Town. Our port, had he lived, and been properly appointed, would have had a good pilot in him.

Another of our Melbourne disadvantages is, its Government is at Sydney. This is its greatest calamity. Before you can arrest a person for debt, you must obtain a writ in Sydney. It monopolizes all the law, and, I think, all the divinity,—for the substantial stone church, which is nearly half built, has been deserted for more than two months, for this simple reason, the funds are exhausted. Thus the pleasantest eminence in Melbourne displays a grievous want of religion, or of Episcopalian spirit amongst the Melbournites.

Salaries are paid to protectors of the blacks, yet the blacks are unprotected. Here is a mounted police, well paid no doubt, and ready, on most occasions, to proceed to any place where a white man has been killed by the natives. When the police force was applied to in a case of outrage on the Werreeb river, their reply to the settlers was, that they could render them no assistance. There is little protection for either person or property at the squatting stations. Whites and blacks very often kill each other. You meet with very many people who, you feel pretty certain, must, in their defence, have been compelled to shoot the natives. Some of the settlers at out-stations, when asked how they manage with the blacks, said, "Oh, we were harassed by them for some time at first; but we gave them a good talking to, and they have been quieter since." What the good talking to means, needs no comment. The natives are, most assuredly, a miserable, worthless, and treacherous race; still, after all, human beings. We gave up squatting rather than place ourselves in the disagreeable situation of killing or being killed by such hideous creatures. Whilst the police force is insufficient, and the Government supine, the settlers are only safe through their number, and being well armed. More than thirty whites have been missed, and never heard of, besides what the blacks are known to have murdered. The papers here abound with recorded murders. The last week the Port Philip Gazette contained an advertisement, offering a reward of £50 for a chief called Jacka Jacka, a black whom I have seen hereabout. It seems he and some other natives, armed, went, and finding a hut-keeper alone, murdered him. The reward is offered by the owners of the station, not by the Government!

There has been a public meeting here, and a petition sent from it to the Home Government, setting forth our forlorn, ungoverned condition, and praying that we may have a governor of our own. I know not how reasonable this procedure may be thought by Lord John Russell; but were a government to be accorded to us, and were La Trobe the real governor, instead of the shadow,—with this and with a more liberal and wise policy than has hitherto been pursued towards us,—then, but not till then, is there any chance of our being permanently prosperous. In the present state of things, although we have purchased a farm on the Yarra, and a part of a town allotment, thereby having a stake, an interest in the country, yet we shall not, on this account, cry up the land as Australia Felix!!!

After all, our morality is to be contaminated by a convict population. Twenty-one prisoners of the crown have been sent here from Sydney. These were intended to make some alteration in the woful condition of our public streets; yet, by their coming, one of the loudest boasts of Australia Felix is at an end. There are convicts in the land,—evil leaven in the lump. My paper is drawing to its close, but the subject is only preface here. Perhaps it will be better for me to address, at greater length, and when I know still more of the country, one of the most influential of the English papers. This do with as you think fit.

TAIT'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE.

MAY, 1841.

WHAT SHOULD THE KIRK DO NOW?

"I find that I cannot, as a Scotchman, as a citizen of a great and loyal community, set myself as a Churchman and Presbyterian, in opposition to the known and repeatedly declared and acted upon laws of the land. I have long seen, and still see, no safety for the church, but much and inevitable danger and ruin in her onward course; and, in consequence, have firmly resolved that, from henceforth, I will wash my hands of the business."—Professor Gillespie, St. Andrews.

WHAT the Church should do now is plain—undo what they have done, and begin again on a new and a more heroic strain. With Jesuitry and legal pettifoggery, and half-measures, the public never have, and it is the praise of human nature that they never can have, any hearty sympathy. Hero-worship, notwithstanding the lamentations of Mr. Carlyle, (when the blue-devils tweak him,) is a thing not uncommon, even in this modern age; but the world knows its heroes: and though a brilliant fool, and a magnificent knave, may here and there have enjoyed their parade for a season, it is rare that a mean person, whose trumpeter is conceited ignorance, and his train-bearer a shifting attorney, can fret and strut his hour of artificial public importance with any tolerable success. Nothing that was both foolish and base has ever commanded the veneration of the world: for the foolish men that have been canonized by their fellows were never base; and the base men that have been called great were never fools. But the Church of Scotland, at this present moment, in blowing abroad a clamour of INDEPENDENCE, is doing a thing which is both base and foolish: foolish, because for a dog to bark at the moon, and for state-servants to kick the state-law, can never be accounted wise; base, because to eat the bread of covenanted service, and to disown the yoke, can as little be esteemed honourable. Therefore the Church of Scotland stands now, and so long as she maintains her present undignified position, must stand, without the pale of public sympathy. A Witness may uplift loud testimony here—a Banner may flaunt proudly there; but the popular soul has not been raised, has not been moved, has not been touched in the matter, except in the curl of impatient indignation, or the playful cast of contemptuous humour. It has been an affair altogether of clerical agitation, and such obedient mud as the plashing of immense tails can bring to the surface. It will be nothing better—till it be better managed. Aquila non captat muscus. The people understand common sense, and honest dealing; they do not understand juridical juggle and ecclesiastical equivocation.

The General Assembly of our Republican Church meets on the twentieth day of this month. That many men will go to that meeting, in the present excited times, driven on by the blind instinct of clerical bluster, like a big blundering battering-ram, beating down friend and foe indiscriminately, is to be expected. The "very fervid genius of the Scots" is not wont to exhibit itself to the greatest advantage in the conduct of church affairs; and it requires the prophetic spirit of no Alexander Peden to perceive, that many mighty Nimrods, who are now rolled about in the mouths of men, have been doing what they have done, and are permitted to do what they do before the Lord, as a grand modern instance of that ancient principle of divine government—"WHOM GOD WILL DESTROY HE FIRST MAKES THEM MAD." But madness belongs not permanently to the majority of men—it comes proverbially by fits; and if it does not achieve a broken head momentarily, it is certain to cure itself anon,—as the blast cracks its cheeks the sooner, the more outrageously it blows. It is possible, therefore, probable perhaps, that the Assembly, whose convocation we now wait, may be composed of a majority of men willing to think reasonably, and to act honestly. To the attention of such men we beg leave, with all respect, to submit the one or two simple considerations which follow.

In the first place, not as an essential element of the case, but as a preliminary matter of most vital concernment, the church ought seriously to consider the fact which we have already stated, that the mingled matter of Non-Intrusion and Church Independence, as it has hitherto been managed, has not been able to command, but rather has very strongly repelled the public sympathies of the people of Great Britain. Does any person doubt, seriously, that this is the fact? The Parisian press may not represent fairly the public opinion of France. T are five millions of provincial landholders, whom it certainly does not represent fairly; but the British press, metropolitan and provincial, taken not by sections but as a whole, does represent the public opinion of Great Britain unquestionably; inasmuch that there is no proposition with regard to our social state more true than this—that that opinion which is expressed by the great majority of the public prints of Great Britain belonging to all parties, is the opinion of the great majority of the British people—is the public opinion of the day. Now, if the reasonable men among the clergy will try this test, the fact must stare them in the face palpably, that the church, in her present doings, is not supported by the public opinion of this country. Number her advocates in the press by tens, and her adversaries by hundreds; and the ecclesiastical scale will yet be too heavily laden. Neither can the church pretend that she despises the witness of the press. She has raised up “Witnesses” for herself, more than one; and it has not been found that these sacred newspapers have been in any wise behind their secular brethren, in those gallant displays of the wrath of man, which find their most natural and most convenient arena in the broad sheet of the periodical pen. Or take another test. By what incomprehensible blunder (as huge as Falstaff’s lies) has it come to pass that a set of men, making much noise, and giving themselves out for something in the world, have set about compassing a vast and fundamental change in the public law of the land, without securing to themselves the co-operation, or at least the connivance, of any one of the three great political parties which influence the legislative proceedings of the British parliament? Even the Puseyites, with their monkish drivell, and sacerdotal extravagance, command at least part of a party. The men who have had influence enough to make the Quarterly Review the pulpit of their priestly prelections are not to be despised even now, though No. 90. certainly was an accident somewhat unhappy. But what party, or part of a party, will lend itself as an acoustic chamber to the brays and bellowings of those Established Independents, who now Hildebrandize it valiantly in our Protestant fatherland; conceiting themselves, by the mere noise of multiplied bluster, to be fighting Rullion Green and Drumlog over again; and before God and the blessed angels, because they lack wit to be men, persuading themselves, and fain persuading others, that therefore they are surcharged with saintship to be martyrs?—Alack for the fact!—the lean and lamentable fact!—the party of the Non-Intrusionists consists (if such a thing can be said to have any consistence) of a few stragglers who appear to be many, because, like all itinerants, they are gifted with a sort of ubiquity, riding about like Balaam, on the back of an ass, from one high place to another, prophesying vainly; and who may gain a glorious victory, perchance, if Napoleon gained Rivoli or Austerlitz by a regiment of limber sharpshooters, making a furious patter from behind a hedge. The party of the Independence-men in Scotland is constituted so,—a nimble lawyer here, a foolish lord there, (for the wise lord, snuffing mischance, withdrew,) and a host of SILLY WOMEN; a class of persons, this last, who, since the days of St. Paul and the bishop of Ephesus, have ever been accustomed to take a prime part in ecclesiastical disturbances, but who do not seem to have commanded so much respect from Apostolic men in primitive times, as from pious presbyters now. Observe, we do not say here, that these and such persons only, compose the party connected with the Church of Scotland, who are decidedly opposed to extrinsic state patronage in the Christian church; we are talking of the mingled matter of Non-Intrusion and Independence, as it has been blundered into a tentative existence, for an hour, by rash and foolish men; and we say, without hesitation, that the persons who agitate this matter in public places, are, when set against the whole Scottish people, mere stragglers and flying skirmishers, and of no public account. The church has got herself into a bog; she brays lustily, like a whole concert of croaking frogs, to get out. No man can blame her; but let no man imagine that the danger is, in any degree, proportioned to the din. The Presbyterian Church in Scotland has no cannon balls; and if she had, her foremost fighters, who now abound in the wish, happily lack the wit to use them. Let them lie, therefore, where, with folly preposse, they have lodged themselves—till they repent—flouncing in the mud, like a mad eel self-baited. No hand will be reached to help them; no pitiful tear will fall; even laughter will cease; for the plight, though absurd enough, is too serious to be ludicrous. The Duke of Wellington confessed that he was wrong in the late matter of the Canadian seminary. The church must even retract like the “great and good” soldier; unless, indeed, it be, that ecclesiastical pride, by how much the more high it soars than secular, by so much the more hardly can it be brought to repentance.

This brings us to the second, and the main matter. The church must say PECCAVI in some shape or other, or the ship is lost. The breeze is up. It is madness to be careering it flauntingly with studding sails in these times. It is not the season for churchmen to play mad pranks. Pope Gregory himself, if he were alive, could not steer them through the racket which they have raised; for it is the nineteenth century, and John Locke and Jeremy Bentham have not written in vain. Let them, therefore, be advised by one who wishes them no harm; let them take down their top-gallants, and bring in their flying jibs, and see whether they will not sail more comfortably. This is what the Church of Scotland should do: let them undo what they have done, and begin again on a more sober, but which also shall be a more heroic strain; for heroism does not necessarily imply madness. This may be done specially, and very simply, thus,—

The Veto Act must be repealed in the first place, unconditionally; and the admission of ministers into the kirk must be ordered to be proceeded with henceforth, in all respects, according to the laws and practice of the land, as before the passing of that act. Ordination must be given to every lawful presentee, as a spiritual induction, indeed, but as the necessary counterpart of the civil right with which the presentee is clothed. If it be degrading to the clerical body to be compelled to do a spiritual act, at the wink of the civil magistrate, it is a degradation which they brought upon themselves, by throwing themselves, at the Reformation, into the hands of the magistrate, praying for his protection, accepting his pay, and spontaneously consenting to hold no articles of faith but those which should bear in their front the statutable stamp. It may be a very great degradation this. The Roman Pope plainly thinks it is, and we think so also; but there is a greater degradation still: and that is, trifling with plighted faith, and attempting to slip sneakingly out of honourable engagements. Let every man bear his own burden. Let every man who possesses a privilege pay the tax. This is the law of nature, and the law of God. The watch-dog, whom you see gnawing that bone so comfortably, wears also a collar, the badge at once of his dignity and of his bondage. The pet-finch, that warbles amusement to my lady's leisure, is not liable to be frosted in the winter-time; but for this privilege it is kept in a cage. Such is the plain state of the case with regard to this portentous church turmoil. Whoso stands by the law, by the law let him also fall. All the lawyers in the world, and all the divines, cannot argue away the palpable reasonableness of this rule. There is something stronger, by which the world is governed, than law and theology; and this something is the honest heart, which God (whatever some sour divines may preach) has not been uncareful to plant in the majority of human breasts. By this honest heart the church-question will be finally, has been already, decided, in the public opinion of the country. The experiment of undermining has failed; patronage must now be overthrown. Let the church submit, for she must submit, in the meantime, to the grievance; VIRESCIT VULNERE VIRTUS, as the Galloway arms have it,—valour is not always the source for a wound; and let her buckle, when the raw is healed, for a new fight in an open and honourable style. Assuredly John Bull is not the man who will permit either party to deviate an iota from the strictest rules of fair play. Instead of a factitious collision of jurisdictions, (got up, for the nonce, to confound weak intellects, and to break the fall of tumbling conceit,—nothing better,) we shall then have a real and natural collision of principles,—a grand moral battle, wherein, if we have any faith at all in things more divine than teinds and teind-courts, we must assuredly know that right and truth shall obtain the final victory. It is in vain to expect salvation otherwise. No god will descend from heaven to untie the knot which a man has twisted about his own neck; and as for further tricks and subterfuges, the administering of unlawful oaths to licentiates, (which has been talked of,) or other indirect inventions—these stratagems, as certainly as they are in their own nature base and unworthy, so certainly will they issue in ignominy and disgrace. It is a hard thing to kick against the pricks. It is a hard thing for the heady huffiness, and shifting desperation of foiled ecclesiastics to hold out for any time against the sober, compact strength of law and reason, and public opinion, in a Protestant laity. The House of Lords, in particular, we may be assured, is a fulling-mill, strong enough to beat any clerical cloth into decency. Again, therefore, we say, the CHURCH MUST SUBMIT; and churchmen must confess, that in this one case, if never before, Presbyterian councils, which, we are credibly assured, sometimes may err, actually have erred.* They must get themselves out of the false position before they can find themselves in the true one;—the sham-fight must cease before the real one can commence. To this real fight the Church must now make up her mind, or compromise the matter altogether, covered with shame, retiring back from the imposing stage of social advance, into the neat snug parlour of her own countrymanse, where the serene souls of Principal Robertson and Doctor Blair sway benignant, the twin patron-saints of Moderatism, the Castor and Pollux of our whilom Zion, who threw oil upon the surface of the ecclesiastical waters for a time, and two times, and half a time, so cunningly, that they almost seemed to have achieved a sempiternal stagnation. This easy and inglorious exit of so much talk and so much trouble, those who are not content to anticipate, can prevent, by a very simple procedure. It is this:

The General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, as soon as possible after it shall have repealed the veto act, and allowed the present laws of the church to resume their free and undisturbed operation, must pass a declaratory act in favour of the principle of non-intrusion, such as was passed in the year 1736. But this act must not be allowed to stand in the books now, as it did then, in the shape of a mere abstract isolated assertion. It must be accompanied by an act or acts of a clear, practical, decided character, which shall give the Scottish people some assurance that their ecclesiastical leaders are in earnest, and that the new evangelicals are not minded to act the solemn farce of the fair and foul old Moderates over again. They must pass a resolution in particular, declaring that the Church of Scotland is a thing essentially republican in its character; and that it is the duty of all church-officers to strive, with bond fide perseverance, to realize this character as much as possible in the detailed branches of the constitution. They must then pass an act, declaring that the manner in which the eldership has hitherto been chosen, (by the minister,) is contrary to this republican character of the church; and that henceforth the elders of every parish shall be elected freely by the members of the church in each parish. Such an act seems absolutely necessary as a preliminary to any change of the law of patronage; because, without it we cannot even know what the real sentiments of the Scottish people are in the matter, and we shall also run a great risk of playing the functions of ecclesiastical government altogether into the hands of the clergy, as happened in Massachussets.* Such a measure, also, will serve to remove completely those ugly suspicions as to the sincerity of the leading Churchmen in the present agitation, which could not fail to be raised even in the most charitable minds, by the auricular confessions of a great southern doctor to a wise northern lord, which a happy chance brought before the public. The Assembly must then be prepared to come forward with some definite scheme of popular election in the case of ministers, which shall take the place of patronage as now practised in the church. What this scheme shall be—whether a direct-system of universal suffrage, as the Secession now practises; or some machinery of the nature of a standing congregational committee, as is found to work not ill in the Episcopal congregations of Scotland—the church must consider. Only some scheme must be agreed on; otherwise, seeing the church, like the state Conservatives, are always agreed on their NO, there is no chance for our Yes.

This scheme being drawn out, and agreed on, the Assembly must then be prepared to pass a declaratory resolution, to the effect that it is essential, for the good and well-being of the Church of Scotland, that lay-patronage shall cease, and that the scheme of popular election (whatever it may be) shall be introduced in its stead. A special commission must then be nominated by the Assembly to represent this matter to her Majesty the Queen, and to her Majesty's Government for the time being. And the Assembly, simul et simul, with this resolution, shall pass a solemn Act, binding themselves by a public vow, either to achieve the abolition of patronage, or to throw up the emoluments and privileges of the establishment. A term should be stated, say ten or fifteen years, (giving time for political changes and chances,) within which, if patronage be not abolished, the Church of Scotland as an establishment shall cease to be. This procedure is clear, fair, and honourable, and we may say, also, heroic in a modern fashion, though not to be named in the same breath with the old Scottish heroism of Crookshank and M'Cormack, whose names are read on the sacred stone of the Pentland. As the church is now, entangled in self-woven meshes, no party can respect it: as the church shall be, adopting the unequivocal straight-forward procedure here sketched, no person with a generous heart will be able to withhold from it the spontaneous tribute of admiration. Whatever opinions men may entertain with regard to the general policy of an established religion, and the expediency or in expediency of the Scottish Establishment in particular, they will, in the case we have supposed, be obliged to acknowledge, and will, we are convinced, willingly acknowledge, that the churchmen of the Establishment will have acted like honourable and independent men, and may well reap that harvest of public sympathy and respect, which, from men so acting, is never permanently withheld.

In all that we here say, we, of course, suppose, that the majority of the present anti-patronage agitators, are, in thorough earnest; that they are honest believers in the popular character of the Presbyterian church; and that they really do look upon state-patronage as a grievance so great, that a Christian church cannot exist in a healthy condition while this clog hampers its neck. If, however, the real state of the fact be, that, while they look upon popular control in the Church as a good thing, they consider a manse, a glebe, and a teind-court, as a better thing, they will, of course, act unwisely in not sacrificing, or running the least possible risk of sacrificing, the latter benefit to the former. Let them hold by the tithes by all means stoutly, while they consider them conducive to the salvation of souls, and while they submit to the law of the magistrate, by whose authority these contributions are levied. This conduct also will be consistent and honourable; and those who consider the action foolish, will be able to say of the actor simply, that he is a man—for humanum est errare. Only, after the racket that has been raised, such conduct, though honourable enough in principle, will not fail to appear ludicrous in the circumstances. The great drama that is being acted now, will then appear only as a storm in a tea-kettle, as a whiff of ecclesiastical gunpowder; a Presbyterian bull, pompously disposing of the kingdoms of the world which belong not to the Presbyterian Pope; a battle of squibs and crackers; a game at soldiers, played by boys; a futile fanfaronade of words, that cumbersome wind might escape. And as for the martyrdom that was so complacently talked of,—shades of Guthrie and M'Kail, let us not insult you by naming it!

One observation we shall add. No change of the law can be brought about in this country, without the aid of some influential political party; and the Church having fallen so foolishly between two stools, in this her first struggle against Patronage, must take full care, in her second, to be backed either by the Liberal or by the Tory interest; and between these two there scarcely seems, for a Scottish churchman, to be any choice. The Tories are the natural patrons only of a sacerdotal aristocracy, as is the Catholic (for we must not now say Protestant) Church of England. True, they have ever been wont to make a fondling of establishments; but it can be their fondling only so long as it is a child, and will be fondled. With the rough independent manhood of the republican Church of Scotland, Toryism has no sympathy. Let but the Christian Church affirm herself, by self-generated—not inoculated—fact, out-and-out to be a Church on her own account, and by her own virtue, sheerly; and she will straightway find no more decided enemy to her dearest rights and privileges than the genuine English Tory. The Tories have always been forward to feed the Church bountifully, and to make a boast of their liberality; but they have also invariably put a snaffle into the nostril of the noble steed, that it might pay for its corn in sterling submission. Above all mortal things, the regular Tories fear a free, an independent, and a popular, Church. Look to Austria and Prussia for this, if you will not believe us. They have, some of them, even a shrewd suspicion of the grand truth, that the Christian religion is a thing essentially democratic and equalizing in its tendency; that fraternization, not subordination, is its watchword; and, with this evil conscience, they lie in anxious wait continually, lest some day the wicked treachery should actually come out, which they have practised on the divine genius of gospel truth, degrading it, for so many ages, into the ready handmaid of despotism, and transforming God's free Church into a normal school for all manner of pusillanimity.—It is the grossest of all delusions,—a natural monstrosity,—an unnatural wedlock,—a profane concubinage. Let no Scottish churchman—let no democratic Christian—lean upon the Tories!

May we hope also, in conclusion, that whatever is done in the present General Assembly, may be done without any phylacteried display of Independence and Non-intrusion oratory. The public ear is sick of the barren theme. If the Strathbogies men are to be deposed, let them be deposed at once, with as few words as possible. There is a certain sublimity in decision of conduct, even when it is the decision of a fool. As matters now stand, much speaking can only serve to fill the air with an idiot trembling, impotent to move one pebble out of its place. The hour is ripe to have done with the prating heraldry of terrors and splendours that shall be. Let the deed show what is meant. The Rubicon is before them—at their feet. If they have courage to plunge in, let them plunge; if not, let them cease to sing their own praises constantly out of their own mouths, boasting themselves to be Cæsars already, when the sword is only half drawn, and will not out. The public will now be glad to see something done. Let the foolish men in the Church throw themselves down, like the Sphynx, and break their heads, the law having read their riddle. Let the wise men do discreetly, and do decidedly, as God may give them grace,

PASSAGES IN THE LIFE OF A RADICAL.

SAVE incidentally, through the chronicles and annals of their "betters," the people of the most highly-civilized nations, whether ancient or modern, have known as little of the history of the People, as the whole world has yet learned of the exact social condition of one-half the species. The "Masses" and the "Women" have been passed over by history, either in total silence, or with that slight regard which argues not so much contempt as indifference. It was worth no one's while to think or speak of the ignoble numerical majority, save as they served the immediate purposes of their masters, chiefs, and leaders. Even when we chance to learn the consequences of some irregular or insurrectionary movement of the vulgar herd, generally the causes and motives remain to be inferred or guessed at. Latterly, however—and the momentous fact is not above half a century old, if so much—the People and the Women having, for some time, been awakened to thought about their own condition, have begun to speak and write about themselves. They have found exponents of their feelings, and wants, and discontents, belonging to their own Order, among the self-taught poets and story-tellers; and, latterly also, among the political mechanics and artisans. The fact seems as wonderful as if there were veritably painters at last found among the lions. De Foe, and one or two more, had indirectly written about the People—the many; and Franklin, and a few others, for them; but, until now, their social condition seems to have been considered as altogether below the dignity of history and of literature; and while volumes were compiled to narrate the history of one distant Indian campaign, the important movements of the masses of Lancashire and Yorkshire, and the west of Scotland, have been limited to newspaper paragraphs, and a few lines in an Annual Register. Yet these were the first tumultuary and symptomatic heavings and throes of the agitation which has already led to important changes in British society, and which promises vast results to all mankind. The first man among the people who wrote for his Order, in anything approaching the true strain, was COBBETT; and as our eye accidentally falls upon these words in the Passages in the Life of a Radical, we, with pleasure, transcribe them:—"Let us not, with all the faults of William Cobbett, withhold the homage which is still due to his great name." If any man fully deserve the title, he was, indeed, the Luther of the Political Reformation. No man was more loyal to the cause; none ever stood more stanchly by his Order. He was a main instrument of the change which, silent and almost unsuspected, was going on during the long course of the anti-revolutionary wars of Europe; which wars, ushered in, in England, by brutal and incendiary "No Popery" and "Church and King" mobs, were closed by Hampden clubs and Delegate meetings. In the interval, the masses had ceased to riot, save when instigated by the hired spies of their treacherous government, and had concentrated all their demands in self-government through their freely chosen representatives. The beneficial effects of the Sunday schools, commenced at a period of alarm to teach the people due subordination to their spiritual and political superiors, began to be felt, limited as the education obtained in them was. The immortal seed, lying dormant in so many uncultured minds, began to germinate in a few. A little learning was found a blessed thing. In comparatively few years, it brought the sort of men who, on the instigation of their superiors, burnt Dr. Priestley's house about his ears, to demand the Charter. Even those who the most decidedly repudiate each of the Five Points, must confess that this was a change for the better.—Our attention has been drawn to sages in the Life of a Radical, principally as it forms a record of this change, and because it is written by a man of great natural talents, who was one of the captains or lieutenants of the Movement, during the important five years, from 1816 to 1821. This is SAMUEL BAMFORD, whom many of our readers will remember to have been introduced to them in our pages,* by a kindred spirit, if of higher intellect, by EBENEZER ELLIOTT; and whom they must have seen to be a man imbued with the genuine poetical fervour. He is also a man of action and humour; and a clear, graphic, and spirited narrator. Bamford's personal narrative, during the memorable years alluded to, which has lately appeared in a series of little tracts, comprehends the best, if we may not say the only, connected account which we have yet had of the early stages of the Movement in his own district. Mr. Bamford has since grown an older and a wiser man. His thoughts about Reform—not, indeed, its objects, but the means of accomplishing them—have been considerably modified since that period; and we are rather disappointed at finding him not only saying that all true reform should begin at home, and that a man's first interest is that of his own household, which is most just and wise, but that a prudent working-man's exertions should also, in the present state of society, end there. We can well conceive the disgust which a man like Samuel Bamford must often have received from his associates in the good work—from the vapouring, the conceit, the intemperance, the vaunting, and low profligacy of too many of the prominent reformers;—but are good men and true to abandon the field for this, or for any cause?

The close of the war found Samuel Bamford working at his trade of a silk-weaver in his native village of Middleton, where he still remains. He was, though young, already known in his own neighbourhood as a poet; he was a good reader and an expert writer; then and still no small accomplishments in his station: and, in virtue of them, he was chosen Secretary of the HAMPDEN CLUB, which was organized in the village. Major Cartwright had shortly before perambulated England and Scotland on a political mission; and although we hear nothing of his appearance at Middleton, it is probable that the Club was there, as in many other localities, the fruit of his patriotic labours. The Middleton Club, as its Secretary relates, prospered.

The number of members increased; the funds, raised by contributions of a penny a-week, became more than sufficient for all outgoings; and, taking a bold step, we soon rented a chapel, which had been given up by a society of Kilhamite Methodists. This place we threw open for the religious worship of all sects and parties, and there we held our meetings on the evenings of Monday and Saturday in each week. The proceedings of our society; its place of meeting, singular as being the first place of worship occupied by reformers (for so in those days we were termed,) together with the services of religion connected with us, drew a considerable share of public attention to our transactions, and obtained for the leaders some notoriety. They, like the young aspirants of the present, and all other days, whose heads are as warm as their hearts, could sing with old John Bunyan—

"Then fancies fly away,
We fear not what men may."

Several meetings of delegates from the surrounding districts were held at our chapel, on which occasions the leading reformers of Lancashire were generally seen together. These were John Knight, of Manchester, cotton-manufacturer; William Ogden, of Manchester, letter-press printer, afterwards immortalized by Canning as the "revered and ruptured Ogden;" and William Benbow, of Manchester, shoemaker.

We need not give more names, but cannot forbear the enumerator's closing reflections:—

About half of them are in their graves; the remainder I hope may live to see the bread found, which so long ago they "cast upon the waters." Let not any man despise the humble workers of a great change: such have often been the forlorn hope of truth against error—of right against wrong. Let no Christian condemn humble beginnings: such were they in life's station, who cast the seeds of living bread in the wilds of Galilee, from whence it spread to Antioch, and to proud Rome.

They had not long gone on thus, quietly and well, until spies appeared among them. At one important meeting, when it was proposed to send forth missionaries or delegates to awaken slumbering Yorkshire, the first spy, if he really were such, appeared:—

At this meeting a man of the name of William Wilson appeared as the delegate from Moston; he was known to several present, and being considered a good Reformer, was chosen secretary for the occasion. He thus took copies of all the resolutions and proceedings. Soon afterwards it was discovered that he was in communication with the police of Manchester. He then left the country, abandoning his wife and a young family of children; and was next heard of as a police officer at London, to which place his wife and children followed him. Whether or not he is in the present force, I have not heard; but there was recently a man of his name, whose marks were, S. 38. Can this be our first traitor?

The existence of undoubted traitors, of hired Government spies, soon became a matter of notoriety. The views of the Reformers were, at that time, comparatively moderate. They contended, indeed, for Universal Suffrage and Annual Parliaments; that no placeman or pensioner should sit in Parliament; and that every twenty thousand of the male inhabitants of proper age should constitute an electoral district.

It was not until we became infested by spies, incendiaries, and their dupes—distracting, misleading, and betraying—that physical force was mentioned amongst us. After that our moral power waned; and what we gained by the accession of demagogues, we lost by their criminal violence, and the estrangement of real friends.

The author has now considerably modified his original views; and fears that annual parliaments would, from "the hell broke loose" of general elections, prove "an annual curse."

When the Hampden Clubs had been fully organized throughout the country, Sir Francis Burdett (!) the Grand-Master, issued a mandate, summoning delegates from every club to meet in London to discuss a Reform Bill which was to be presented to Parliament; and Samuel Bamford was appointed delegate from Middleton. Upon this occasion he saw, not without awe and wonder, which, however, lessened by proximity, all the leaders of the period. Bamford is among the first of the people's Clarendons; and some of his sketches have great value, as this of HUNT, who possessed all the physical and some of the moral qualities of a popular demagogue. To see him was, to a rustic Reformer, an event :—

Of Mr. Hunt I had imbibed a high opinion ; and his first appearance did not diminish my expectations. He was gentlemanly in his manner and attire,—six feet and better in height, and extremely well formed. He was dressed in a blue lapelled coat, light waistcoat and kerseys, and topped boots ; his leg and foot were about the firmest and neatest I ever saw. He wore his own hair ; it was in moderate quantity, and a little grey. His features were regular, and there was a kind of youthful blandness about them, which, in amicable discussion, gave his face a most agreeable expression. His lips were delicately thin and receding ; but there was a dumb utterance about them which, in all the portraits I have seen of him, was never truly copied. His eyes were blue or light grey—not very clear nor quick, but rather heavy, except, as I afterwards had opportunities for observing, when he was excited in speaking ; at which times they seemed to distend and protrude ; and if he worked himself furious, as he sometimes would, they became blood-streaked, and almost started from their sockets. Then it was that the expression of his lips was to be observed—the kind smile was exchanged for the curl of scorn, or the curse of indignation. His voice was bellowing ; his face swollen and flushed ; his gripped hand beat as if it were to pulverize ; and his whole manner gave token of a painful energy, struggling for utterance.

He was constantly, perhaps through good but misapprehended intentions, placing himself in most arduous situations. No repose—no tranquillity for him. He was always beating against a tempest of his own or of others' creating. He had thus more to sustain than any other man of his day and station ; and should be judged accordingly.

At the same meeting appeared Burdett, Cobbett, Cleary, and Major Cartwright, who took the chair.

He was far in years—I should suppose about seventy ; rather above the common stature ; straight for his age ; thin, pale, and with an expression of countenance in which firmness and benignity were most predominant. I see him, as it were, in his long brown surtout, and plain brown wig, walking up the room, and seating himself placidly in the head seat. A mild smile played on his features, as a simultaneous cheer burst from the meeting. Cobbett stood near his right hand. I had not seen him before. Had I met him any where save in that room, and on that occasion, I should have taken him for a gentleman farming his own broad estate. He seemed to have that kind of self-possession and ease about him, together with a certain bantering jollity, which are so natural to fast-handed and well-housed lords of the soil. He was, I should suppose, not less than six feet in height ; portly, with a fresh, clear, and round cheek, and a small grey eye, twinkling with good humoured archness. He was dressed in a blue coat, yellow swan-down waistcoat, drab kersey small-clothes, and top boots. His hair was grey, and his cravat and linen were fine, and very white. In short, he was the perfect representation of what he always wished to be—an English gentleman farmer.

But we are not yet done with Hunt, who seems always to have been greatest out of doors. The petitions for Reform were to be carried in procession to the residence of Lord Cochrane in Palace Yard :—

Now it was that I beheld Hunt in his element. He unrolled the petition, which was many yards in length, and it was carried on the heads of the crowd, perfectly unharmed. He seemed to know almost every man of them, and his confidence in, and entire mastery over them, made him quite at ease. A louder huzza than common was music to him ; and when the questions were asked eagerly, " Who is he ! " " What are they about ! " and the reply was, " Hunt ! Hunt ! huzza ! " his gratification was expressed by a stern smile. He might be likened to the genius of commotion, calling forth its elements, and controlling them at will. On arriving at Palace Yard, we were shown into a room below stairs ; and whilst Lord Cochrane and Hunt conversed above, a slight and elegant young lady, dressed in white, and very interesting, served us with wine. She is, if I am not misinformed, now Lady Dundonald. At length his Lordship came to us. He was a tall young man, cordial and unaffected in his manner. He stooped a little, and had somewhat of a sailor's gait in walking ; his face was rather oval, fair naturally, but now tanned and sun-freckled. His hair was sandy, his whiskers rather small, and of a deeper colour ; and the expression of his countenance was calm and self-possessed. He took charge of our petitions, and being seated in an arm-chair, we lifted him up and bore him on our shoulders across Palace Yard to the door of Westminster Hall, the old rafters of which rung with the shouts of the vast multitude outside.

Burdett is next shown up :—

We were shown into a large room, the only remarkable thing in which was a bust of John Horne Tooke. Sir Francis came to us in a loose grey vest coat, which reached far towards his ankles. He had not a cravat on his neck ; his feet were in slippers ; and a pair of wide cotton stockings hung in wrinkles on his long spare legs, which he kept alternately throwing across his knees, and rubbing down with his hands, as if he suffered, or recently had, some pain in those limbs. He was a fine-looking man on the whole, of lofty stature, with a proud but not forbidding carriage of the head. His manner was dignified and civilly familiar,—submitting to, rather than seeking, conversation with men of our class. He, however, discussed with us some points of the intended Bill for Reform, candidly and freely ; and concluded with promising to support universal suffrage, though he was not sanguine of much co-operation in the house. Under these circumstances we left Sir Francis, approving of much that we found in and about him, and excusing much of what we could not approve. He was one of our idols, and we were loath to give him up.

Still I could not help my thoughts from reverting to the simple and homely welcome we received at Lord Cochrane's, and contrasting it with the kind of dreary stateliness of this great mansion and its rich owner.

The political clubs which Mr. Bamford visited in London seemed of a very inferior character to those which were held, solemnly and orderly, in the chapel in his own village : drinking, smoking, noise, and confusion, prevailed. At some of them, he saw Watson, Preston, Hooper, and other wrong-headed persons of the time, then recently engaged in riots ; and he remarks :—

I could not but entertain a slightful opinion of the intellect and trust-worthiness of these two men, when on a morning or two afterwards, at breakfast with me and Mitchell, they narrated with seeming pride and satisfaction, their several parts during the riots. Preston had mounted a wall of the tower, and summoned the guard to surrender. The men gazed at him—laughed ; no one fired a shot ; and soon after he fell down, or was pulled off by his companions, who thought (no doubt) he had acted fool long enough. Such were two of the most influential leaders of the London operative reformers. I repeat that I thought meanly of their qualifications for such a post. But how blind is human perception—how slow should we be to condemn ! I myself was at the same moment going hand and heart with some who were as little to be depended upon as the above ; and yet I could not perceive my situation. The blind were then leading the blind.

While the debates on the Green Bag were going on, Bamford, for the first time, entered the House of Commons; and he vividly describes his feelings on that occasion, which are the more worthy of notice as they were then shared by tens of thousands. There has often appeared to us something extraordinary, and almost preternatural, in the feelings of hate and repugnance with which old Reformers regarded Lord Castlereagh when they first saw him. It seems to have been with the same undefinable horror and antipathy with which a reputed witch or sorcerer may have been regarded in old times, or the noxious serpent which holds its fascinated victim with its "glittering eye." No other public man ever inspired the same kind of antipathy since the era of Lauderdale or Claverhouse. Bamford does not seem to have participated in it to this extent; but he disliked the whole of "the borough-monger crew" into whose presence he pressed.

After a tough struggle at elbowing and pushing along a passage, up a narrow staircase, and across a room, I found myself in a small gallery, from whence I looked on a dimly-lighted place below. At the head of the room, or rather den, for such it appeared to me, sat a person in a full loose robe of, I think, scarlet and white. Above his head were the royal arms, richly gilded; at his feet several men in robes and wigs were writing at a large table, on which lamps were burning, which cast a softened light on a rich ornament like a ponderous sceptre of silver and gold, or what appeared to be so. Those persons I knew must be the speaker and the clerks of the house, and that rich ornament could be nothing else than the "mace"—that same thing, or one in its place, to which Cromwell pointed and said, "Take away that bauble; for shame! give way to honest men." On each side of this pit-looking place, leaving an open space in the centre of the floor, were benches one above another; and on these benches sat some three or four hundreds of the most ordinary-looking men I had ever beheld at one view. Some were striking exceptions; several young fellows in military dresses gave relief to the sombre drapery of the others. Canning, with his smooth, bare, and capacious forehead, sat there, a spirit beaming in his looks like that of the leopard waiting to spring upon its prey. Castlereagh, with his handsome but immovable features—Burdett with his head carried back, and held high as in defiance—and Brougham, with his Arab soul, ready to rush forth and challenge war to all comers. The question was to me solemnly interesting, whilst the spectacle wrought strangely on my feelings. Our accusers were many and powerful, with words at will, and applauding listeners. Our friends were few and far between, with no applauders save their good conscience, and the blessing of the poor. What a scene was this to be enacted by the "collective wisdom of the nation!" Some of the members stood leaning against pillars, with their hats cocked awry; some were whispering by half dozens; others were lolling upon their seats; some, with arms a-kimbo, were eye-glassing across the house; some were stiffened immovably by starch, or pride, or both; one was speaking, or appeared to be so, by the motion of his arms, which he shook in token of defiance, when his voice was drowned by a howl as wild and remorseless as that from a kennel of hounds at feeding-time. Now he points menacing to the ministerial benches—now he appeals to some members on his side—then to the speaker; all in vain. At times he is heard in the pauses of that wild hubbub, but again he is borne down by the yell which awakes on all sides around him. Some talked aloud; some whinnied in mock-laughter, coming, like that of the damned, from bitter hearts. Some called "order, order," some "question, question;" some beat time with the heel of their boots; some smothered into their napkins; and one old gentleman in the side-gallery actually coughed himself from a mock-cough into a real one, and could not stop until he was almost black in the face.

And are these, thought I, the beings whose laws we must obey! This the "most illustrious assembly of free-men in the world!" Perish freedom, thou, and her children too! O! for the stamp of stern old Oliver on this floor, and the clank of his scabbard, and the rush of his iron-armed band, and his voice to arise above this Babel howl!—"Take away that bauble. Begone! give place to honest men."

Such was my first view of the House of Commons, and such the impressions strongly forced on my feelings at the time. The speaker alluded to was Henry Brougham. I heard at first very little of what he said, but I understood from occasional words, and the remarks of some whom I took for reporters, that he was violently attacking the ministers and their whole home policy. That he was so doing, might have been inferred from the great exertions of the ministerial party to render him inaudible, and to subdue his spirit by a bewildering and contemptuous disapprobation. But they had before them a wrong one for being silenced, either by confusion or menace. Like a brave stag, he held them at bay, and even hurled back their defiance with "retorted scorn."

This was not Queen Caroline's Green Bag, but that got up against the liberties of the people, which led to the subsequent suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act.

The delegates returned home, and the famous or ludicrous Blanket expedition, begun in folly and ending in mischief, was immediately concerted. No one from Middleton went out as a Blanketeer; and Bamford did not even attend the preliminary Blanket Meeting. The insane expedition, like the march of the Glasgow Radicals intended for Carron Works and ending tragically at Bonnymuir, remains as a warning. The germs of these follies were, he conceives, imported from London to the Provinces by the delegates; and they were contrived and fostered, as in Scotland, by spies. "The good and fatherly maxim of the worthy old Major [Cartwright]—'Hold fast by the laws,' was unhappily lost sight of." The people are wiser now.

Out-door great meetings were then first held in that part of the country, and the spies came into more active service. The country was now in the worst condition, and Bamford's retrospect of the tender mercies of unmitigated Tory government at this time, may not be without its uses.

Personal liberty not being now secure from one hour to another, many of the leading reformers were induced to quit their homes, and seek concealment where they could obtain it. Those who could muster a few pounds, or who had friends to give them a frugal welcome, or who had trades with which they could travel, disappeared like swallows at the close of summer, no one knew whither. The single men stayed away altogether; the married ones would occasionally steal back at night to their wan-cheeked families, perhaps to divide with them some trifle they had saved during their absence—perhaps to obtain a change of linen or other garment for future concealment—but most of all, as would naturally be the case, to console, and be consoled by their wives and little ones. Perhaps one had found an asylum amongst kind friends, and had brought home a little hoard, the fruits of his own industry and carefulness, or of their generosity. Perhaps he had been wandering in want, not daring to make himself known, until his beard disguised him, his shoes and stockings were trampled from his feet, and his linen was in rags; when, at length worn out and reckless, he would venture home, like the warried bird which found no place to rest. Perhaps he had been discovered to be a reform leader, and had been threatened, mayhap pursued, and, like a hunted hare, now returned to the place of former repose. Then he would come home stealthily under cover of darkness; his wife would rush into his arms; his little ones would be about his knees, looking silent pleasure, for they, poor things, like nestling birds, had learned to be mute in danger.

But, with all precautions, it did sometimes happen, that, in such moments of mournful joy, the father would be seized, chained, and torn from his family, before he had time to bless them, or to receive their blessings and tears. Such scenes were of frequent occurrence, and have thrown a melancholy retrospection over those days. Private revenge or political differences were gratified by secret, and often false information, handed to the police. The country was distracted by rumours of treasonable discoveries, and apprehensions of the traitors, whose fate was generally predicted to be death or perpetual imprisonment. Bagguley, Johnson, Drummond, and Benbow, were already in prison at London; and it was frequently intimated to me, through some very kind relations-in-law, that I and some of my acquaintance would soon be arrested. And, strange to say, many of their predictions were verified. King's messengers did arrive, government warrants were issued, and the persons they mentioned were taken to prison.

A cloud of gloom and mistrust hung over the whole country. The suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was a measure, the result of which we young reformers could not judge, save by report, and that was of a nature to cause anxiety in the most indifferent of us. The proscriptions, imprisonments, trials, and banishments of 1792, were brought to our recollections by the similarity of our situation to those of the sufferers of that period. It seemed as if the sun of freedom were gone down, and a rayless expanse of oppression had finally closed over us. Cobbett, in terror of imprisonment, had fled to America; Sir Francis Burdett had enough to do in keeping his own arms free; Lord Cochrane was threatened, but quailed not; Hunt was still somewhat turbulent, but he was powerless, for he had lost the genius of his influence when he lost Cobbett, and was now almost like Sampson, shorn and blind. The worthy old Major remained at his post—brave as a lion, serene as an unconscious child. Then, of our country reformers, John Knight had disappeared; Pilkington was out of the way somewhere; Bradbury had not yet been heard of; Mitchell moved in a sphere of his own, the extent of which no man knew save himself; and Kay and Fitton were seldom visible beyond the circle of their own village whilst, to complete our misfortunes, our chapel-keeper, in the very tremor of fear, turned the key upon us, and declared we should no longer meet in the place.

Our society, thus houseless, became divided and dismayed; hundreds slunk home to their looms, nor dared to come out, save like owls at nightfall, when they would, perhaps, steal through by-paths, or behind hedges, or down some clough, to hear the news at the next cottage. Some might be seen chatting with, and making themselves agreeable, to our declared enemies; but these were few, and always of worthless character. Open meetings thus being suspended, secret ones ensued: they were originated at Manchester, and assembled under various pretexts. Sometimes they were termed "benefit-societies;" sometimes "botanical-meetings;" "meetings for the relief of the families of imprisoned reformers," or "of those who had fled the country;" but their real purpose, divulged only to the initiated, was to carry into effect the night attack on Manchester, the attempt at which had before failed, for want of arrangement and co-operation.

Bamford at last left his home, for safety, but his first wanderings, with another proscribed patriot, apparently a great simpleton, whom he made his jest,—a silly person who dabbled in medicine and surgery, and was nicknamed the doctor—leads to to no result, save some very amusing and graphic descriptions of Lancashire scenes and manners, and to this portrait of the author, sketched by himself,—

Behold him then. A young man twenty-nine years of age; five feet ten inches in height; with long well-formed limbs, short body, very upright carriage, free motion, and active and lithe, rather than strong. His hair is of a deep dun colour; coarse, straight, and flaky; his complexion a swarthy pale; his eyes, grey, lively, and observant; his features strongly defined and irregular, like a mass of rough and smooth matters, which, having been thrown into a heap, had found their own subsidence, and presented, as it were, by accident, a profile of rude good nature, with some intelligence. His mouth is small; his lips a little prominent; his teeth white and well set; his nose rather snubby; his cheeks somewhat high; and his forehead deep and rather heavy above the eyes. His hat is not quite so broken, but quite as well worn as the doctor's; his coat of brown cloth, as yet unpatched, but wanting soon to be; his waistcoat of lighter colour, bare and decent; his hamsters of dark kerseymere, grey at the knees; and his stockings of lambs' wool, with some neat darning above the quarters of his strong nailed shoes. Such, reader, was the personal appearance of him who now endeavours to amuse thee; of the qualities of his mind and disposition, an opinion may be formed from this work.

We learn incidentally, on this ramble, that Bamford claims "gentle blood;" and that the elder branch of the lords of Bamford had lost his lands for rebellion against the king, while the loyal younger branch obtained possession of the halls and fair estate.

Healey [the Doctor] remarked that I indeed had not an estate to lose, but was taking a fair course for losing my head, and was already an outcast wanderer on lands belonging to my ancestors.

The poetical vein of the writer often breaks freshly and richly forth in the course of a narrative which, however, might often, without detriment to its main interest, suffer large curtailment. Here we have the fugitives upon Ashworth Moor, and the whole passage is finely and freely drawn.

Having rested and taken refreshment, we went strolling upon the moor, and ascended Knowe, or Knowl-hill, from whence we had an extensive prospect. In the distance on our left were the Moors towards Todmorden and Walsden; following the horizon, we next saw the ridge of Blackstone-edge, streaked with sun-gleams and dark shadows; then the Moors of Saddleworth, particularly Oaphin with his white drifts still lingering, and Odermon with his venerable relics of druidism, his "Pots an' Pons." The mountains of Derbyshire and Cheshire rose like a region of congealed waves; whilst Vale Royal, to the south, lay reposing in a glorious sun; and the country towards Liverpool was bounded by a bright streak, probably the Irish Sea. A dim white vapour indicated the site of Preston or Blackburn; Bolton seemed near at hand, and Bury close on our right below. Manchester, Stockport, Ashton, Oldham, and Rochdale, were distinctly visible; and neither last nor least regarded, was one small speck—it was the white end of a house at Heabers, which directed our looks to the misty vapour of Middleton, rising beside dark woods from the vale in which the town is situated. That was the smoke of our own hearths, heaped by those who were thinking of us. We could almost see them: whist! could we not hear the voices of our children! of their mothers calling them home! And in the fond imagination we shouted their names, but there was no reply; and then, feeling we were cut off and outcast, we more sadly understood the human desolateness of Him, who said, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head."

But even in this wild region were objects to call us back to reality, and teach us that in every situation there is something to be thankful for,—that

There is mercy in every place—and that a bounteous Creator is nowhere unmindful of those he has called into life. A beautiful spring of water, pure as a cup from heaven's banquet, was gently brimming over a basin of white sand and pebbles into which it arose. A sward of sweet green grass, lined the margin of a silvery band that lay glimmering and trickling on the sunny side of the hill; whilst here and there were tufts of rushes, glistening with liquid pearls. We took the water in our hands and drank "to our families and friends;" "to our suffering brethren everywhere;" "to the downfall of tyranny and soon;" and "to liberty," with three huzzas. An old black-faced tup, lifted his horns from the heather, looked gravely at us, and giving a significant bleat, scampered off, followed by such of his acquaintance as were browsing near.

Some of the adventures are of a homely comic cast, and well told in the broad Lancashire dialect, but we pass them all, to take up the political traitor at his own cottage door, when he ventured to return home. The homely interior is altogether charming.

Come in from the frozen rain, and from the night wind, which is blowing the clouds into sheets, like torn sails before a gale. Now down a step or two.—'Tis better to keep low in the world, than to climb only to fall. It is dark, save when the clouds break into white scud above; and silent, except the snort of the wind, and the rattling of hail, and the eaves of dropping rain. Come in!—A glimmer shows that the place is inhabited; that the nest has not been rifled whilst the old bird was away. Now shalt thou see what a miser a poor man can be in his heart's treasury. A second door opens, and a flash of light shows we are in a weaving-room, clean and flagged, and in which are two looms with silken work of green and gold. A young woman, of short stature, fair, round, and fresh as Hebe; with light brown hair escaping in ringlets from the sides of her clean cap, and with a thoughtful and meditative look, sits darning beside a good fire, which sheds warmth upon the clean-swept hearth, and gives light throughout the room, or rather cell. A fine little girl, seven years of age, with a sensible and affectionate expression of countenance, is reading in a low tone to her mother:

"And he opened his mouth and taught them, saying, Blessed are the poor in spirit; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn; for they shall be comforted. Blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness; for they shall be filled. Blessed are the merciful; for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God. Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called the children of God. Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness sake; for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you; and shall say all manner of evil against you for my sake."

Observe the room and its furniture. A humble but cleanly bed, screened by a dark old-fashioned curtain, stands on our left. At the foot of the bed is a window closed from the looks of all street passers. Next are some chairs, and a round table of mahogany; then another chair, and next it a long table, scoured very white. Above that is a looking-glass, with a picture on each side, of the Resurrection and Ascension on glass, "copied from Rubens." A well-stocked shelf of crockery-ware is the next object; and in a nook near it are a black oak carved chair or two, with a curious desk, or box to match; and lastly, above the fire-place, are hung a rusty basket-hilted sword, an old fusée, and a leathern cap. Such are the appearance and furniture of that humble abode.—But my wife!

She look'd; she redd'n'd like the rose;
Syné, pale as any lily.

Ah! did they hear the throb of my heart, when they sprung to embrace me! my little loving child to my knees and my wife to my bosom.

Such were the treasures I had hoarded in that lowly cell. Treasures, that, with contentment, would have made into a palace

The lowest shed

That ever rose on England's plain.

They had been at prayers and were reading the Testament before retiring to rest. And now, as they a hundred times caressed me, they found that indeed, "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted."

The night after his return home the family were knocked up at midnight by a muffled figure, who turned out to be Bamford's co-delegate, and who, like himself, was now skulking. The anecdote sets in a striking light the agency of the spies, and the real share which the Government and its emissaries had in the disturbances. For this reason we shall cite the passage at full length. When the man was admitted—

He said he had particular reasons for coming disguised, and at that unseasonable hour, and that he wished to see me and some half-dozen of our most trusty reformers in the morning, at the house of a friend whom he named, residing at Stanniccliffe, a short distance from Middleton. I promised to attend him as desired, and he departed. At the time appointed, myself and several others went to the house, and being shown into a private room with our visitant, he commenced by entering into details of his private business-transactions, from which it appeared that he was greatly embarrassed, and knew not how to extricate himself. He had been at various places; at home he durst not remain; and had last come from London, where he had been in communication with some of the best friends to reform, who, with himself, had come to a determination to strike a decisive blow at once. He then detailed a plan which, if acted upon with energy, would, he said, effect all that was required. Some ten or a dozen of our best men were to provide themselves with arms, and march to London, where they would be joined by others, and at a time agreed upon, the united body were to rush upon the ministers at a cabinet-council, or a dinner, and assassinate the whole of them. All London would then rise; the population would subdue all before it; the country would be our own, and a new government would be established. Our arms were to consist of a stout walking-staff, with a socket at one end for the reception of a dagger, which, he said, "may be easily made from the blade of a common knife, such as this," (taking one from the table.) Pistols might also be carried by those who could procure them. When asked how the money for the journey was to be raised, he pulled a gold watch from his pocket, and said, if no other means were left, he would dispose of that to raise money. This would not do: it was rather too bare a trap. Besides, it was far wide of our code of reform, and we declined having anything to do with it. We also endeavoured to dissuade him from lending himself to such projects; and we left him without making any impression upon him.

The fact was, this unfortunate person, in the confidence of an unsuspecting mind, as I believe, had during one of his visits to London, formed a connexion with Oliver the spy, which connexion, during several succeeding months, gave a new impulse to secret meetings and plots in various parts of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Derbyshire, and ended in the tragedy of Braadeth, Ludlam, and Turner, at Derby. This was probably Oliver's first demonstration on his "professional tour;" it failed—but from that very week, private meetings, for highly criminal purposes, again commenced. Agents came from Manchester, and glided through the country, depositing their poison wherever they could. Meetings were held at Blackley, two or three at Middleton, one or two at Chadderton, the same at Failsworth, and again at Manchester, where some fools and their deluders having been collected, a partial explosion took place, of which further notice will occur shortly.

Let us not, however, in recounting these transactions, lay blame where it ought not to be. Let us not confound the blind instrument with the intelligent agent who directed it. If the individual before alluded to, our mysterious visitant, erred greatly in these matters, he suffered for his error. A leading provincial journalist, with much apparent truth, afterwards stigmatised him as "a spy;" the sore obloquy stuck to him long; and whether it has yet been entirely removed admits of doubt. But, had he been a spy, he would not have been left to struggle with poverty and disgrace in England, but would have been removed and provided for, as Oliver was. HAD HE BEEN A SPY, HE WOULD HAVE BETRAYED THOSE WHO NEVER WERE BETRAYED. We may allow that he was credulous and inconsiderate, and consequently unfit to be a leader in those or any other times; but this is far short of an admission that he was a co-villain with Oliver. He was an egregious dupe no doubt, but he was not a spy.

If it be asked, why did not you, as consistent and honest reformers, denounce this plot to the government at once, as, in obedience to the laws, you ought to have done? My reply is, because we were persuaded the government knew of it already; that, consequently, if attempted it would fail; and, lastly, because we had accepted the man's confidence, and he had placed his safety in our hands. This last dilemma may serve to caution others, how they accept responsibilities which may lead to criminality or dishonour.

Bamford's hour arrived;—in a very few days after this he was arrested, and not very well treated by the local functionaries and their myrmidons, of one of whom, Nadin, the deputy-constable of Manchester, and an active and thriving emissary of those days, he has drawn the portrait in living lines. The arrest and journey to Manchester is dramatically told.

A stream of people followed the coach and dragoons through the streets of Manchester; and on approaching the Exchange, down Market Street, the "Merchant Princes" crowded the steps, and welcomed the poor captive with loud huzzas!

The "Merchant Princes" have somewhat changed their tone. The criminal jail of Manchester is well described. Bamford expected to be sent off for London immediately, his alleged crime, like that of the numerous other prisoners, being high treason. The king's messengers who attended the prisoners to London, seem to have executed their functions much more mildly than the Lancashire constables. There was all the difference usually found between a yeomanry force and regular soldiers.

It was the object of the government to create all the alarm and dismay possible, by this and every other political arrest. The chained and fettered prisoners, hurried on from town to town in close carriages, attended by king's messengers, and escorted and guarded by parties of dragoons, excited the greatest interest and curiosity, and also warm sympathy. After the party had passed Leicester, the following rural and English scene is traced by Bamford, followed by the natural reflections to which it gave rise.

The night was gleamy and star-light; and as the coach dashed forward, we soon entered upon what seemed a pretty rural country. Now we passed a large substantial-looking farm-house, with its homestead; now a loving couple were overtaken walking arm-in-arm by some deep and bowered lane; next the mirth of home-wending youths would be heard; or, mayhap, the strains of a devout hymn from some chapel-comers. Anon, a white cottage would lend us a blink from its cheerful hearth. Ah! what a paradise seems the lowliest shed, when viewed from the vista of a prison-door—how enviable appear the humblest mortals that walk abroad of their own free will—and what a dove-nest is that, where a fair hand is seen closing the white chamber curtains for the night! Yes, it is at such moments, and under impressions produced by such objects, that we can best appreciate the blessing of the poorest hearth—of the humblest home—in which, as I have before intimated, if there be contentment, happiness will surely abide. Wise, indeed, is he, and wealthy beyond all riches, who enjoys, with a thankful heart, the blessings, few though they be, which he finds bestowed on his humble estate; remembering gratefully, that "better is a dinner of herbs, with love, than a stalled ox, and hatred therewith." But we seldom find out these things until it be too late: we count not our jewels, perhaps, until the dearest are lost.

Our party of four was now inside the coach, and we began to sing. Ridings, who understood music, gave one or two pieces with a pathos and solemnity which I had never heard expressed before.

Glory to thee, my God, this night, brought the singing parties of our own homes to our recollection; and we all participated in the emotions of our amiable and talented musician. O'Connor sometimes laughed; sometimes cried like a child. At last he broke out into that mournful lament—

Where is my cabin-door fast by the wild-wood?

Sisters and sire, did ye weep for its fall?

Where is the mother that look'd on my childhood?

And where is my bosom-friend, dearer than all?

Oh! my sad soul, long abandon'd by pleasure,

Why didst thou dote on a fast-fading treasure?

Tears, like the rain-drop may fall without measure;

But, rapture and beauty, they cannot recall.

To which we all responded as chorus:—

Where is my cabin-door fast by the wild-wood?

Morning at length broke; and, as we approached the dark woods and green meadows of Woburn, I gave my

SERENADE.

The grey dawn of morning is spreading on high;

And Venus is glowing so bright in the sky;

The cattle are lowing, the tender lambs bleat;

Arise, dearest Mary, before it be late, &c. &c.

Lancashire also sung a sweet and simple melody, to words somewhat like the following:—

I wonder why my love is cold,

Whilst I so kind would be?

I would give hoards of countless gold

To win thine heart from thee.

To win thy love, my beautiful maid,

And find it ever true,

One thousand jewels, too, were thine,

That flash like sun-bright dew.

We breakfasted at Redburn, a small village, which takes its name from a clear, sedgy stream, immortalised by the unfortunate Chatterton, and said, with much probability of truth, to have been reddened with blood at the great battle of St. Albans.

These singers could not, surely, have been very bloody-minded traitors. O'Connor was a poor innkeeper, who had merely allowed meetings to be held in his house; but every Irishman was then a suspicious character.

Arrived in London, the prisoners were examined before the Privy Council, at Whitehall, from whence they were sent to Coldbathfields prison. Of their residence there, and their fellow-prisoners, generally unfortunate women, Bamford gives a very interesting account, and one which touchingly displays the soul of goodness in things evil. Their own condition, and their devices to elude their oppressors, deserve more attention. Their guide and adviser seems to have been our author, who did the best for them that was possible in the circumstances. None of them had, on their first hurried examination, which appears to have been merely a piece of State mummery, committed themselves.

I proposed that every day after dinner they should appoint a chairman, who should put such questions to them as he considered the Privy Council were likely to do at their next examination, supposing some one of their body to have given secret information. That their replies should be deliberated upon, and determined accordingly; and those replies should be committed to memory, and, in substance, strictly adhered to at their next interview with the ministers. That they would consequently all give the same account; all be of one party, and of one mind; and that, if government brought them to trial, it would have to unmask its spies and informers, instead of making them fall by their mutual contradictions, mistrusts, and jealousies, which, as it seemed to me, the government would prefer doing.

They all declared it was the best of advice; and it was adopted with acclamation. I would have retired, but they would not suffer me, and insisted that I should become their questioner. I complied at length; put them through a catechising according to my poor ability; and established a set of replies, such as I thought would either answer or ward off any question they were likely to encounter. The basis of the old tale was adopted—Their meetings were to devise relief to persons who had fled from the suspension act, and to their families in their absence. This was to be the skeleton; we stuffed and padded it in our own way, and threw over it a cloak of plausibility, which we thought the devil himself could not penetrate. And so we continued, day by day, catechising and drilling, until my fellows would, I believe, have stood before old Rhadamanthus without quail or fear.

Several of the party were finally committed for trial, immediately separated, and sent to different prisons. A new prisoner named Plant, who arrived from Manchester, unfolded to Bamford the arts of the officials in attempting to obtain evidence where none existed. During his incarceration in the New Bailey at Manchester, Joseph Platt, one of the police-officers, who had formerly known him,

Came to him one night in his cell, and after reminding him of old acquaintance, and expressing much friendship towards him, said he had obtained permission to make a proposal, and that it would be his fault if he did not take advantage of it for his own good. Two of the persons already sent to London, he continued, had offered, on condition that their lives were spared, to disclose the whole of the Manchester plot, and to give details of the proceedings of the conspirators at their several meetings. These discoveries, he said, would place all of them in jeopardy: and they might think well, if they got off with transportation for life. He added that, knowing Plant, and having a great respect for him, and a feeling towards his family, he had, as a great favour, obtained permission from the magistrates to mention the thing to him; and to say, that if he (Plant) would come forward, and give a statement of all he knew about the conspiracy, he should have the first chance of becoming King's evidence, and of thereby saving his life, procuring his freedom at any rate, and of very likely, getting something handsome in the way of a provision afterwards.

George assured me, that his only reply to this (which was repeated on a second visit) was that "he knew nothing, and could not, therefore, tell anything;" that such had been his constant answer; that he never in the least varied it; and that at length, his friend Platt gave him up, and resigned him to the scaffold, or to perpetual chains abroad.

If such was his answer to Platt (and I never had any reason for doubting it) he certainly gave the true one. He had never been at a plot-meeting before the one at Ardwick; and the proceedings at that had scarcely commenced when the police arrived and took the whole party into custody.

On his fourth examination, Bamford spoke out to Lord Sidmouth, telling him that if he waited for evidence to establish the crime of high treason against him, he might wait for ever, as, in endeavouring to obtain Reform, he had always acted openly and legally; and he also told another tale that yet remains to be enforced on Ministers;—that

The gentry, or what were called the higher classes, were too proud, or too indifferent, to examine minutely, the abodes of the poor and distressed; and that the interests of many, as well as their want of accurate knowledge, tended to elicit from them, distorted or partial statements of facts. The poor, I said, would be content, could they only procure the common necessities of life by hard labour, but they could not even do that; and if ministers were thoroughly acquainted with the distress of the people, they would be almost surprised that the country was not a scene of confusion and horror, instead of being as it was, peaceable, though discontented.

He was detained for a good while longer, but finally dismissed on his own recognisances, Lord Sidmouth giving him a solemn and suitable admonition, and assuring him that "it was the wish of his Majesty's Ministers to do all they could to alleviate the distress of the people," of which they have since given many proofs. His old friend, the king's-messenger, gave him and some others of the discharged prisoners, neither good counsel nor admonition, but many substantial proofs of esteem and friendship; and, after seeing some of the London sights, Bamford returned to his humble and happy home. And now the man of mature age makes these sage reflections on his subsequent conduct:—

I now went to work, my wife weaving beside me, and my little girl, now become doubly dear, attending school, or going short errands for her mother. Why was I not content!—why was not my soul filled and thankful!—what would I more!—what could mortal enjoy beyond a sufficiency to satisfy hunger and thirst,—apparel, to make him warm and decent,—a home for shelter and repose,—and, the society of those he loved! All these I had, and still was craving,—craving for something for "the nation,"—for some good for every person—forgetting all the time to appreciate, and to husband the blessings I had on every side around me; and, like some honest enthusiasts of the present day, supervising the affairs of the nation to the great neglect of my own,—of my

Hours more dear than drops of gold.

But it was not with us then, as it is now; and we have that excuse to plead. We had none to direct or oppose us, except a strong-handed government, whose politics were as much hated as their power was dreaded. We had not any of our own rank with whom to advise for the better,—no man of other days who had gone through the ordeal of experience; and whose judgment might have directed our self-devotion, and have instructed us that, before the reform we sought could be obtained and profited by, there must be another,—a deeper reform,—emerging from our hearts, and first blessing our households, by the production of every good we could possibly accomplish in our humble spheres,—informing us also, and confirming it by all history, that, governments might change from the despotic to the anarchical, when, as surely as death, would come the despotic again; and that no redemption for the masses could exist, save one that should arise from their own virtue and knowledge,—that king-tyranny, and mob-tyranny (the worst of all) might alternately bear sway; and that no barrier could be interposed, save the self-knowledge and self-control of a reformed people.

Above we have noticed Bamford's change of views, which is carried, as we think, much too far. All the personal reforms which he describes are most desirable; but more must be wisely aimed at, and perseveringly sought. It is high authority which teaches us, that all rulers must be kept to their duty by the vigilance of the governed, and even by being made a little uneasy. Even before Bamford's return from London, new private meetings and intrigues were afoot, under the instigation of spies; and he was told, mysteriously, that a decisive blow was to be struck for the liberties of the country. Among his acquaintances of the Reformers, there was a certain Joseph Mitchell, a person whom he did not greatly esteem; and in Mitchell's case, we have the complete development of those plots which ended so tragically for many innocent families, and misled and betrayed individuals. When he heard of Mitchell as a leader, he says—

The enunciation of Mitchell's name certainly did not awaken confidence on my part; nor did the intelligence that he was moving about with a well-dressed, and apparently affluent stranger, at all tend to repress certain forebodings which had begun to arise in my mind.

One day, when I was at work, a message was sent requesting me to step over to the Dog and Partridge public-house, which was opposite to where I lived. I went, and found an aged grey-headed man, stooping beneath probably seventy years; his venerable locks hanging to his shoulders, and having in one hand a stick, and on the other arm a basket containing rolls of worsted and woolen yarn, and small articles of hosiery which he seemed to have for sale. On looking at him more steadfastly, I recognised him as my old co-delegate to London, from the town of Derby, Thomas Bacon, and I shook him heartily by the hand, and sat down beside him.

With him was a tall decent-looking young man, much like a town's weaver; wearing a blue coat, and with a clean white apron wrapped about his waist. After a civil salutation to him also, I addressed friend Bacon, and asked what particular business might have brought him to our part of the country, so far from his residence? With a smile he pointed to his wares; but almost immediately gave me to understand that he carried them only as a disguise to his real business.

We need not pursue the conversation; the consequences are enough. Bamford tells—

Reader, this pertinacious old man was, in a few weeks after, arraigned for high treason at Derby; and pleading guilty, was with fourteen others, transported for life; whilst the young man, who was one of the Turners, was hung and beheaded, with the equally unfortunate Brandreth and Ludlam.

The stranger whom Joseph Mitchell had so assiduously introduced amongst the discontented classes of Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Derbyshire, first inveigled them into treasonable associations,—then to armed insurrections,—he got them to arm as has been done in the present day,—and then betrayed them. How one, if not more, of my neighbours at Middleton escaped, has just been shown. I thought it no dishonour to deny a person and a name, when apprised that their discovery would probably lead to the ruin of the parties sought after, if not of many others.

That stranger,—that betrayer, reader, was, OLIVER THE SFR.

Fifteen men were tried and condemned, and three were executed, among whom was Brandreth; the rest were transported for fifteen years.

The Habeas Corpus Act was restored early in the following Session of Parliament; and a Bill of Indemnity being passed, the remaining prisoners were all relieved, and returned to their homes.

Agitation was speedily renewed; and at one of the first open-air meetings, Bamford appears to have been the first person who ever suggested what has since been often acted upon in the manufacturing districts of both England and Scotland,—namely, the women voting. He also, a poet as well as a politician, proposed to introduce vocal music into the assemblages,—a powerful instrument in touching the heart and exciting the feelings; but this was overruled as an innovation by those, surely, who knew no better. His own Lancashire Hymn, written to, he says, "one of the finest trumpet strains he ever heard," may serve as a specimen of the national lyrics which were to be chanted by the People at their public meetings.

We are next dramatically carried through the successive scenes of Hunt's bold doings in Manchester. The Reformers had often been taunted as dirty and ragged,—as the "great unwashed;" and the maxims or mandates issued by the Committees were "Cleanliness, Order, Sobriety, Peace." Regular drillings were commenced; and if the men did not acquire the use of fire-arms, they learned to march in regular order. Their drill-sergeants were generally old soldiers of the militia or the line. It is not easy to discover the harm of the healthful exercise and pleasant pastime described, had it been practised among a people who, having no cause for discontent, felt none. The drillings appear rather needful recreation to men engaged the long day in the occupation of weaving.

When dusk came, and we could no longer see to work, we jumped from our looms, and rushed to the sweet cool air of the fields, or the waste lands, or the green lanesides; we mustered,—we fell into rank, we faced, marched, halted, faced about, countermarched, halted again, dressed, and wheeled in quick succession, and without confusion; or, in the grey of a fine Sunday morn, we would saunter through the mists, fragrant with the night odour of flowers, and of new hay, and ascending the Tandle-hills, salute the broad sun, as he climbed from behind the high moors of Saddleworth; when,

Lo! what a world is before us spread,
From the fringed dell, to the mountain head;
From the spangled turf whereon we stand,
To the bend of heaven, and the verge of land. * * *

Maidens would sometimes come with their milk-cans, from the farms of Hoola-wood, or Gerrard-hey, or the fold near us; and we would sit and take delicious draughts, new from the churn, for which we paid the girls in money, whilst a favoured youth or so, might be permitted to add something more, a tender word or a salute, when blushing and laughing, away would the nymphs run, for a fresh supply to carry home.

Next would follow a long drill, in squads; and so expert were the youths, that they would form a line, and march down the face, or up the steep, or along the sides of the Rushpenny; and suddenly halting, would dress in an instant, in a manner which called forth the praises of the old campaigners. Then, when they broke for a little rest, would follow a jumping-match, or a race, or a friendly wrestle, or a roll down the hill, amid the laughter of others sitting in the sun. Some would be squatted on the lee of a bush of gorse or tall fern; some reading, some conversing, in earnest discussion on the state of trade, or national affairs, or on their own privations, or those of their neighbours,—for few secrets were kept of those matters,—some would be seen smoking their pipes, kindled by burning glasses; and so till the bugle sounded to drill, and after that, away to breakfast.

Such was one of our drilling-parties. There was not any arms,—no use for any,—no pretence for any ;—nor would they have been permitted.

Such as they were, however, they excited extreme apprehension ; and the local magistracy memorialized the Home Secretary to give them power—unconstitutional power—to put an end to them ; and obtained it. This leads us to the memorable and bloody field of Peterloo, the remembrance of which will never be effaced from the hearts of the people. Bamford addressed his own division, the Middleton squadron, previous to setting off for the meeting. They carried no arms of any kind, not even a stick : and thus, in good order, they set forth,—a fair specimen of all the bodies which, in so many different directions, upon that fatal day moved to the central point.

I may say with truth, that we presented a most respectable assemblage of labouring men ; all were decently, though humbly attired ; and I noticed not even one, who did not exhibit a white Sunday's shirt, a neck-cloth, and other apparel in the same clean, though homely condition.

My address was received with cheers, it was heartily and unanimously assented to,—we opened into column,—the music struck up,—the banners flashed in the sunlight,—other music was heard,—it was that of the Rochdale party coming to join us,—we met ; and a shout from ten thousand startled the echoes of the woods and dingles. Then all was quiet save the breath of music ; and with intent seriousness we went on.

Our whole column, with the Rochdale people, would probably consist of six thousand men. At our head were a hundred or two of women, mostly young wives, and mine own was amongst them. A hundred or two of our handsomest girls,—sweethearts to the lads who were with us,—danced to the music, or sung snatches of popular songs : a score or two of children were sent back, though some went forward ; whilst, on each side of our line, walked some thousands of stragglers. And thus, accompanied by our friends, and our dearest and most tender connexions, we went slowly towards Manchester.

A circumstance interesting to myself occurred. On the bank of an open field on our left, I perceived a gentleman observing us attentively. He beckoned me, and I went to him. He was one of my late employers, Mr. Hole, of the firm of Hole, Wilkinson, and Gartside, of Peel Street, and one of the heads of the town. He took my hand, and rather concernedly, but kindly, said he hoped no harm was intended by all those people who were coming in. I said, "I would pledge my life for their entire peaceableness." I asked him to notice them ; "Did they look like persons wishing to outrage the law ? were they not, on the contrary, evidently heads of decent working families ! or members of such families ?" "No, no," I said, "my dear sir, and old respected master, if any wrong or violence take place, they will be committed by men of a different stamp from these." He said he was very glad to hear me say so ; he was happy he had seen me, and gratified by the manner in which I had expressed myself. I asked, did he think we should be interrupted at the meeting ? he said he did not believe we should ; "Then," I replied, "all will be well," and shaking hands, with mutual good wishes, I left him, and took my station as before.

At Newtown we were welcomed with open arms by the poor Irish weavers, who came out in their best drapery, and uttered blessings and words of endearment, many of which were not understood by our rural patriots. Some of them danced, and others stood with clasped hands and tearful eyes, adoring almost that banner, whose colour was their national one, and the emblem of their green island home. We thanked them by the band striking up "Saint Patrick's day in the morning." They were electrified ; and we passed on, leaving those warm-hearted suburban capering and whooping like mad.

Of Bamford's account of the Massacre,—and by no other name shall we ever call that cruel, indiscriminate, and most impolitic assault upon the people—we shall cite but one or two paragraphs. Bamford, as soon as the chairman, Hunt, had been chosen, was about to withdraw with a friend to procure refreshments after their fatiguing exertions and march ; but they had not gone far, when the yeomanry cavalry appeared :—

"Stand fast," I said, "they are riding upon us, stand fast." And there was a general cry in our quarter of "Stand fast." The cavalry were in confusion ; they evidently could not, with all the weight of man and horse, penetrate that compact mass of human beings ; and their sabres were plied to hew a way through naked held up hands, and defenceless heads ; and then chopped limbs, and wound-gaping skulls were seen ; and groans and cries were mingled with the din of that horrid confusion. "Ah ! ah !" "For shame ! for shame !" was shouted. Then, "Break ! break ! they are killing them in front, and they cannot get away," and there was a general cry of "Break ! break !" For a moment the crowd held back as in a pause ; then was a rush, heavy and resistless as a headlong sea ; and a sound like low thunder, with screams, prayers, and imprecations from the crowd-moiled, and sabre-doomed, who could not escape.

By this time Hunt and his companions had disappeared from the hustings, and some of the yeomanry, perhaps less sanguinely disposed than others, were busied in cutting down the flag-staves, and demolishing the flags at the hustings.

On the breaking of the crowd, the yeomanry wheeled, and, dashing wherever there was an opening, they followed, pressing and wounding. Many females appeared as the crowd opened ; and striplings, or mere youths, also were found. Their cries were piteous and heart-rending, and would, one might have supposed, have disarmed any human resentment ; but here their appeals were vain. Women, white-vested maids, and tender youths, were indiscriminately sabred or trampled ; and we have reason for believing, that few were the instances in which that forbearance was vouchsafed, which they so earnestly implored.

In ten minutes from the commencement of the havoc, the field was an open and almost deserted space. The sun looked down through a sultry and motionless air. The curtains and blinds of the windows within view were all closed. A gentleman or two might occasionally be seen looking out from one of the new houses before-mentioned, near the door of which, a group of persons, (special constables) were collected, and apparently in conversation ; others were assisting the wounded, or carrying off the dead. The hustings remained, with a few broken and hewed flag-staves erect, and a torn and gashed banner or two drooping ; whilst over the whole field, were strewn caps, bonnets, hats, shawls, and shoes, and other parts of male and female dress ; trampled, torn, and bloody. The yeomanry had dismounted,—some were easing their horses' girths, others adjusting their accoutrements ; and some were wiping their sabres. Several mounds of human beings still remained where they had fallen, crushed down, and smothered. Some of these were still groaning,—others with staring eyes, were gasping for breath, and others would never breathe more. All was silent save those low sounds, and the occasional snorting and pawing of steeds. Persons might sometimes be noticed peeping from attics and over the tall ridgings of houses, but they quickly withdrew, as if fearful of being observed, or unable to sustain the full gaze of a scene so hideous and abhorrent.

Besides the Manchester yeomanry, who, as I have already shown, did "the duty of the day," there came upon the ground soon after the attack, the 15th hussars, and the Cheshire yeomanry ; and the latter, as if emalous of the Manchester corps, intercepted the flying masses, and inflicted some severe sabre wounds. The hussars, we have reason for supposing, gave but few wounds, and I am not aware that it has been shown, that one of those brave soldiers dishonoured his sword by using the edge of it.

This is the simple narration of an eye-witness. Do our readers remember Shelley's "Masque of Anarchy?" If not, let them read it in connexion with this sad tale.—We have, perhaps, had enough of Peterloo; yet

That laughter to the nation
Shall steam up like inspiration,
Eloquent, oracular,—
A volcano heard afar.

Bamford escaped with some difficulty, and his wife had been in greater peril than himself. He got home to Middleton in a kind of disguise, and met with people now for the first time burning for revenge. What follows of the pieties of the poor afflicted mother, is quite as pathetic as the scene of the blind widow by the wayside, in the romance of "Old Mortality."

Some proposals which I heard assented to, filled me with horror. The immolation of a selected number of the guilty ones might have been discussed before God and man; but what these men sought would not do, and I retired and put off my dress, more thoughtful than when I took it up.

I found Redford's mother bathing his wound with warm milk and water, and to please her, he said it was easier. It was a clean gash of about six inches in length, and quite through the shoulder blade. She yearned, and wept afresh, when she saw the severed bone gaping in the wound. She asked who did it! and Tom mentioned a person; he said he knew him well; and she, sobbing, said she also knew him, and his father and mother before him; and she prayed God not to visit that sin on the head of him who did it, but to change his heart and bring him to repentance. That prayer had well nigh touched my heart also; but Tom rapped out one of another sort, to which I incontinently, as may be supposed, added my "Amen."

The wound having been linted, and bound with sticking-plaster, Tom put on his clothes, the slash in his coat having been sewed, and the blood sponged off by a young woman. His mother then, with many prayers and much good advice, resigned him, as she said, "to the guidance of God, through a wild and weary world."

The people now seriously thought of having recourse to force, and this time of their own impulse, and Bamford gave them wise and excellent counsel, and took no part in their rash and ill-advised proceedings; but he was, notwithstanding this forbearance, a marked man, and, in a few days after the murderous meeting, he was arrested at midnight, in his own house, by a posse of police, a party of the 32d regiment, and Nadin, the deputy-constable, who seems to have been the Major Sirr of Manchester. This man was in the habit of telling his prisoners that they would be hung, and other pleasant things.

He informed me in his usual dogged way, striving to be civil, that he had a warrant against me for high treason.

I said if that was the case, I was ready to accompany him; but he would never convict me, and if he did, my blood would kill him. He and his assistants then commenced searching the place for arms.

They examined a small recess, which served as both cupboard and larder; but

No beef was found, nor any beer,
No crusted wines the soul to cheer.

The drawers were rummaged; my oaken box was explored; a shawl was spread on the floor, and all my books and papers were bundled into it: there was not, however, anything of consequence; some poems, in manuscript, had been deposited elsewhere.

The order was then given to move: my wife burst into tears; I tried to console her; said I should soon be with her again; and, bestowing a kiss for my dear child, when she came in the morning, I ascended into the street, and shouted—"Hunt and Liberty!" "Hunt and Liberty," responded my brave little helpmate, whose spirit was now roused. One of the policemen, with a pistol in his hand, swearing a deep oath, said he would blow out her brains if she shouted again. "Blow away," was the reply; "Hunt and Liberty." "Hunt for ever."

In the London jails, Bamford had acquired some knowledge of thieves and flash men, and in Manchester prison it was extended. He makes many pregnant reflections on criminals and criminal law, and cognate topics connected with his own situation as a friendless prisoner. He, however, bore himself bravely like a poet and a philosopher, not thinking small personal accommodations worth making the great fuss about, which he insinuates later captives have done.

Wherever the narrative ceases to be personal, it becomes comparatively flat and of little interest; and perhaps, for modern readers, too much space is occupied with Hunt, and the inquests at which he attended, after the slaughter.

Hunt, Johnson, our author, and a few more, were finally sent off to Lancaster Castle. And here the narrative abruptly stops, with an address and warning to the Chartists. Probably the narrator has not met with sufficient encouragement to proceed with his series, and his public adventures were also drawing to a close. From another source of information, we are enabled to say that he was subsequently tried at York, not for high treason, but for misdemeanour, in his share of the great day's work of Peterloo. To this he pleaded not guilty; and he got off with an additional twelve months' imprisonment in Lincoln Castle. It is his boast that he has been confined in more prisons for the cause of freedom, than any other Englishman now living. Some of his best poetry was written in these prisons.

We shall leave the Chartists to seek and read Bamford's address for themselves; but we earnestly wish that we could give more attention to his verses, which in several styles justify all that Elliott and others have said of them. The Pass of Death, Tim Bobbin's Grave, and the very sweet English pastoral, A Little Rosy Beauty, must be familiar to many. They are fair specimens of Bamford's poetry. We shall, therefore, merely in a few lines, point to a less known piece, describing those delicious hours when the gifted hard working-man finds leisure to contemplate the lovely face of the Nature which he loves.

Hours more dear than drops of gold
Come when the tender buds unfold;
Then do I wander to field and glen,
Far as I may for the gentlemen.
Over the blade of emerald sheen,
Over the herb that creeps between;
Odours inhaling that sweetly smell,
As I gather the cresses beside the well.

Spring moves on as glad I gaze,
 Culling the flowers wherever she strays—
 "Come from the earth ye dwellers there,
 To the blessed light and living air ;
 For the snow-drop hath warned the drift away,
 And the crocus awaiteth your company ;
 And the bud of the thorn is beginning to swell,
 And the waters have broken their bounds in the dell ;
 And are not the hazels and slender vine
 Blending their boughs where the sun doth shine ?
 And the willow is bringing its downy palm—
 Garlands for days that are bright and calm ;
 And the birch is adorning its painted stem,
 And the primrose peeps like a starry gem."

Hark ! from the heavens you thrill of joy—
 Child of the sword art thou up so high !
 "I can sing on the wing," the warbler cries ;
 "There is life in the gale—I arise, I arise ;

Up, as I soar, it is cool and clear,
 Whilst the earth brings forth, and the gems appear ;—
 Plenty I gather, and freely I fly—
 How happy am I, how happy am I !"

Is not this SAMUEL BAMFORD, the silk-weaver of Middleton, a man deserving to be farther inquired about by his countrymen? and are not the above specimens, in prose and verse, those of an author who ought to be prized, independently of the episode in the national story which he has told, and of the lessons he has inculcated? Eighteen Numbers of his Narrative have appeared, and they and his poems may be had at small cost, by sending to him at Middleton. If there be any shame attending this final and very prosaic intimation, the shame is neither his nor ours.

THE SULTAN AND MEHEMET ALI.

THE consequences of our Oriental policy are beginning to develop themselves. We are entering upon a new scene of that drama of folly and passion, in which Lord Palmerston has been performing the principal part. The first act began with the signature of the treaty of July, 1840. The diplomatic puppet of England strutted away in the front of the stage in all the pride and dignity of sovereignty; but the strings were pulled, the motions were directed by an unseen arm, stretched out from the north. The perils, the risks, the costs were British;—the success, the triumph, was to be Russian; the seeds were sown by English hands; the harvests are to be culled by Muscovite gatherers.* In the name of the integrity of the Ottoman empire, to shatter that empire to its very foundation; in the name of the "independence of the Ottoman empire," to reduce it to the lowest ignominy of vassalage, was the plan and the purpose of the Tzar. To that plan and purpose our Cabinet blindly lent itself. It carried out the views and objects of Russia with enthusiastic daring; it trampled upon all constitutional principles; it applied the public revenues, without the sanction of Parliament; it entered into treaties involving peace and war, without communicating them to the Legislature, which was then sitting; and as soon as the Houses of Lords and Commons were prorogued, it sent forth our fleets and armies to destroy the towns, and seize the fortresses of Syria. Our soldiers and sailors obeyed the orders of their commanders. They did their work—horrid work!—promptly and bravely. Little did the people of England know of the causes, less did they think of the consequences of the quarrel. They heard of "glorious triumphs" and "splendid victories!" of the heroism of Napier and the flight of the Egyptians; and "the still small voice" of reason and benevolence essayed in vain to make itself heard, amidst the rumble and the thunder of noisy and successful war.

But now the loud artillery is silent, and its very echoes are dying away. The dust, the smoke, which concealed the horrors of the siege, and of the explosions of St. Jean d'Acre, are dispersed; and the consequences of our desperate doings are beginning to present themselves to our view. Those who invented,—those who espoused,—those who carried out our so-called "policy," cannot complain of having been thwarted in their objects even from the beginning. The resistance which the public opinion of England was able to oppose to "Palmerstonian statesmanship;" the honest doubts of a large section of reformers; the repeated warnings of those who had any special or local knowledge of the state of the East; the dangers to which the claim to the right of intervention in the internal concerns of other nations might expose us;—these weighed not as much as a grain of sand in the balance of the department of foreign affairs. The approval of a portion of the Conservative press—the "hallooing-on" of some of the more reckless of the Tory leaders—far more than compensated for the disaffection and alienation of a few reflecting and "crotchety" men, who thought that to risk the repose of the world,—to break up our liberal alliances,—to let loose the million fiends of jealousy and hatred, (whom the pacific policy of a quarter of a century had held in subjection,) was not to be compensated by the humiliation of an Egyptian ruler, (with whom we had no personal misunderstanding, and to whom we owed nothing but friendship or gratitude,) or by the establishment of Turkish authority in the land we are wont to call "Holy."

If the apprehensions of the prudent and intelligent friends of reform in England were wholly and scornfully disregarded, it was not to be expected that the passionate clamours of France should obtain any sort of attention, still less arrest the perverse resoluteness of our Foreign Secretary. He has admitted that they produced quite a contrary effect. He made the resistance of the French the ground, the justification, of the precipitate promptitude of his own proceedings. He had it as much at heart to degrade M. Thiers in Europe, as to dethrone Mehemet Ali in Syria; to trample upon Louis-Philippe, as to uphold Abdul-Medjid. And if the personal spite and vanities of a Minister could be indulged without involving the greater and graver interests of the multitudes over whom he rules, we might smile upon the subtle and dexterous fencing with which Lord Palmerston has so frequently lunged upon the weak points of his adversary, while he has successfully covered or guarded his own.

* There is a charming anecdote in the speech made the other day, by Baron Brunow, at the dinner of the Russian Company. "Did Russia push forward in the field of action? Did Russia spread over the Levant her armies and her fleets? No! not a single Russian soldier has started from our frontiers; not a single Russian ship has sailed from our harbours. England has taken the lead." Admirable diplomatist! and well deserving the honours which his imperial master has showered upon him.

We arrive, then, at another chapter of Oriental history. The purposes of the treaty of July are fulfilled; the menaces of France have turned out to be only idle words; the Egyptian army has withdrawn from Syria; Lord Ponsonby is sovereign in the Divan; and a Hatti Scheriff is fulminated under his inspirations,—a Hatti Scheriff which unveils, without any restriction or reservation, the policy and the honesty of the Porte.

It was a startling document for those whose ears, having long been tickled with news of Turkish regeneration, and of the progress of "reform" and "civilisation" at Constantinople, had really anticipated something like prudence, or forethought, or wisdom, or probity, from our Ottoman allies. It has at once staggered those optimists who imagined that a few phrases, falling from the lips of the debauched and drunken Sultan Mahmoud, had sufficed to control the despotic habits,—to restrain the corrupt practices,—to counteract the perfidious intrigues,—to purify the pervading mendacity,—to strengthen the inherent and growing imbecility of the Ottoman rule.

It is true that the Hatti Scheriff has been repudiated by "the Powers," who have been preaching up "the independence of the Ottoman Empire;" it is true that "the Courts" have decided that the "independent" Sultan has construed the notion of "independence" somewhat too literally; it is true that the relationship of "sovereignty" and "vassalage" has been interpreted in a somewhat too sincere and startling impatience at Constantinople; but, nevertheless, the Hatti Scheriff has been issued. If persisted in, it brings with it inextricable embarrassments, discords, and war; if withdrawn, it covers the Sultan and the Sultan's counsellors with ignominy and disgrace. But whether annulled or not,—whether the Sultan turn round upon his allies and say,—“Maintain me in the authority you have recognised, and pledged yourselves to support;” or, “I only wait your commands in order to submit and obey,”—the Hatti Scheriff lets in floods of light upon the purposes and policy of the Divan.

By an examination of the details alone, can a proper estimate be formed of the malice and malignity of this state-paper. Its object is the utter annihilation of all regular authority in Egypt.

Under the pretence of establishing the sovereignty of the Sultan, it undermines, one after another, every element of strength and security. It seeks to destroy, by one murderous blow, all that has been done for good government and civilisation. We must exhibit it article by article, and shall only assume that England, Europe,—the world, have no interest in the utter ruin of Egypt; that it is no part of our policy to deliver over the regions of the Nile to desolation and anarchy; but, on the contrary, that it is far better for us that there should be security for person and property; that the desert should still be traversed in safety; that our India communications should be maintained in all their promptitude and all their security. If other views have prevailed at Constantinople,—if our diplomacy have contemplated with delight the undoing of all that has been done for peace and order in Egypt,—if a repetition of the bloody strifes and struggles which have been always associated with Turkish intrusion in the land of the Pharaohs,—be a subject of indifference, or even of gratification, to our mighty makers of mischief,—in such indifference, or in such passions, the people of this country do not share. They have reposed, no doubt, too blind a confidence in their rulers; they have too thoughtlessly allowed the happiness of nations, and the peace of the world, to be trifled with, and placed in extreme peril; but their approval has not gone beyond the assent of silence,—and the silence of a nation must not be mistaken for applause.

We apprehend that the moral responsibility of Great Britain for the consequences of her policy cannot be called in question for an instant. She who has been so all-influential for evil cannot be utterly helpless for good. She who has urged and forced the Porte upon her career of violence; she who has furnished her with the instruments of aggression, whether intellectual or physical; she who encouraged her to break up the status quo of peace, and to rush into all the hazards of war; she who has involved the Porte in all the perplexities of new entanglements;—cannot now abandon her ally, cannot now proclaim herself guiltless of the consequences of her own acts. She has incurred a fearful responsibility; and the follies and crimes which may grow out of her interference will be visited upon her head.

Need we recall to the recollection of our readers the situation of Egypt under the rule of the Sultan, before the reign of Mehemet Ali? Barbarian after barbarian filled the land with anarchy or deluged it with blood. He who could intrigue most successfully, or bribe most liberally, or murder most extensively, stood the best chance of being armed with the authority of the Porte. The Porte obtained its Egyptian revenue by trafficking in the feuds and crimes of the various candidates for despotic power in Egypt. This traffic, this resource, it is the first object of the Hatti Scheriff to re-establish. “The Sultan is to nominate the successors of Mehemet Ali to the pachalic;” competitors for the privilege of robbing and impoverishing Egypt, are to be again invited into the field of sanguinary controversy. He who will pay me—and seek compensation in the most successful extortion and oppression,—he is to be the chosen ruler. The hereditary principle, which in a country rudely governed and slightly civilized, might give some security for stable institutions, is to be buffeted about in the harems, and put up to auction by the Seraffs of Stamboul. And then, the next condition of the Hatti Scheriff is, that the chosen Pacha is to proceed to Constantinople for investiture. He will be supported or deposed according to the quantity of favour he can borrow or buy. If he be confirmed, he will be accompanied on his return by swarms of Turkish harpies, who will keep up the old traditions, that all the wealth of the Ottoman empire is the heritage of those who represent the Caliphate; and, in addition to the local exactions of Egyptian authorities, hordes of Turks will grind the poor Fellahin (the peasantry) into dust; and as they retire back to their native country with the spoils of Africa, they will be replaced by new and more voracious hordes, draining all the produce of the Nile.

Next in effrontery is the declaration of the Hatti Scheriff, that the Sultan is to nominate all the superior officers of the Pacha's army. Now, the Pasha's army represents the Pacha's power. It is the most extraordinary work of his genius. Though not comparable to the regular armies of Europe, it has always proved itself infinitely superior to the armies of Turkey, which have been overthrown and scattered by the Egyptian troops whenever they have met. And be it remembered, the Egyptian army was made of materials the most degraded and the least promising. The Egyptian peasants had been treated as mere outcasts by the Turks. The idea of a Fellah bearing arms in the presence of an Osmanli was never dreamed of till Mehemet Ali's time. To disorganize the Egyptian army, to destroy its efficiency, to lower it beneath the level of Turkish military tacticians, is a prominent object of the wretched politicians of the Porte; and this, therefore, has been insisted on by the Hatti Scheriff. Then comes the interference with the revenues. The hold of Turkey upon Egypt has been long that of a demand for tribute amounting to about one-twentieth of the income of the Pacha. The Hatti Scheriff is bold in its extortions. It demands one-fourth of the whole. Nay, more, it insists on controlling the collection; on meddling with the details of administration, on nominating fiscal supervisors: in other words, in administering the financial affairs of Egypt as those of Turkey are administered. Now, what is the administration of Turkey? A century ago, her revenues were from twelve to fifteen millions sterling—they have been reduced to less than three! The revenues of Egypt were about £300,000—they have been raised to four millions! The Hatti Scheriff proposes to introduce the Turkish system, and to supersede the Egyptian!

Lastly, the currency of Egypt is sound: it is a metallic currency. The gold and silver coins bear the date of Mehemet Ali's reign: they represent substantial value. The Hatti Scheriff requires that the money of Turkey,—its base coinage,—its degraded paper-money,—shall be introduced, and have legal course in Egypt. No doubt, this would be another legitimate means of pillaging the Egyptians! But is this our purpose?—we ask again, is this our interest?

So much for Egypt,—so much for the “tender mercies” of our policy,—so much for the development of our plans in that portion of the “entire Ottoman Empire,” which Mehemet Ali is to hold. Now, what is the condition of the countries we have wrested from him? Candia, Arabia, Syria! We found them at peace;—what is their present state?

The Greek population of Candia is in revolt; the establishment of the Turkish authority is regarded by the Candiot Christians with such abhorrence, that they have already taken up arms against it; five thousand Turkish troops have left Constantinople to subdue “the insurgents;” the policy of our Government is with the Turkish oppressor: on which side are the sympathies of the British people? They who rejoiced in the liberation of the Greeks,—they who hailed the triumph of the Cross over the Crescent, in the land of Themistocles,—will pray also for the deliverance of Crete.

Arabia! the Holy Cities! No sooner have the troops of Mehemet Ali been withdrawn, than “a great reformer” has appeared in the desert. He proclaims that “Mecca is in one of his sleeves, and Medina in the other; and that he will march to the deliverance of Jerusalem.” Will the Turks be able to subdue the dwellers among tents? Can they rescue the Kaaba from “the regenerators of the faith?” Not they. Arabia will be as certainly freed from the dominion of the Sultan, as Transylvania is; and it is thus we have preserved “the integrity of the Ottoman Empire!”

And Syria! unhappy Syria! whose chieftains we have corrupted with our bribes,—whose mountaineers we have armed with our muskets,—whose towns we have destroyed with our artillery,—Syria is fast hastening to that anarchy which pervaded it during the ages of the Ottoman rule. The Druses will not surrender their arms, but will use them for the maintenance of their rude and ancient independence; the Maronites claim, and will obtain, the protection of France, and will set Turkish exactions at defiance; the Greek Christians have already made terms with Russia, and will be watched over with paternal kindness by the Muscovite Tzar; the orthodox Catholics have Austria on their side; and our saints will take care of the Protestant missionaries and converts, while they are helping forward a plan for the restoration of Palestine to the Jews, and the advent of the Millennium; and the Mussulmans,—the fanatical Mussulmans,—to whom the establishment of Turkish rule is but the establishment of their title—their right to oppress; and the wandering Arabs, and the Annassia, and the Mutualis, with all their passions unchained,—their domineering and predatory habits,—no longer controlled by any sovereign authority,—does it require the foresight of a prophet to announce, that “our glorious and successful Oriental policy” has been only a costly and a melancholy failure.

MEMOIRS OF JEREMY BENTHAM.

BY JOHN BOWRING.

PART X.

I RESUME some of Bentham's conversations referring to the earlier periods of his life.

"I was one day in an eating-house in Clement's churchyard with Clark; and just as we had done dinner, in came Goldsmith. He and Clark talked together. I was too young and too insignificant to be talked to. I supped at the Mitre Tavern once, when they exhibited a complete service of plate. We came to hear Johnson's good things. There was Bickerstaff; there was Ellis, the last scrivener of the city of London, who died at the age of ninety-four, a pleasant old fellow; there was Hoole; there was White, a clerk of Ellis'; and there was Goldsmith. But I was angry with Goldsmith for writing the 'Deserted Village.' I liked nothing gloomy; besides, it was not true, for there were no such villages. Bickerstaff was obliged to march out of England some time after.

"Lord Dunmore used to call on me. He was a sort of a liberal; and we stimulated one another by talking of the despotism which had been exhibited by the expulsion of the six Methodists at Oxford. He told me, his notion was, there had been several revelations—Jesus' one, Mahomet's another—at which I was very much scandalized. We made trifling chemical experiments together: it was just then the airs [gases] were discovered.

"His family name was Fincastle. He had a tutor of the name of Watkins, who went to Virginia, where he had a house, and where, I believe, he died. For a Church-of-England man, Dunmore was free of prejudices; and we had many common sympathies. Watkins went to the unhealthy parts of Essex, where the curacies are doubly as large as the ordinary healthful curacies. He was there cheated by a Parson Griffinhoof. I took up the pen for him, and made Parson Griffinhoof pay what was due. Parson Griffinhoof (as I was afterwards told) said, 'I do not know who Mr. Bentham is; but he must be some old experienced man.'"

Bentham sent, in 1782, at the request of Lord Shelburne, to Lord Ashburton, his as yet unpublished "Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation." Lord Shelburne had read the volume in MS., and recommended it to Lord Ashburton; but I find, from a memorandum, that the proof-sheets were neither acknowledged nor returned. In this year Bentham took a journey to the north of England. At Buxton he was much struck with the beauty of a Miss Meynell: a sweet girl, he said; he met her, twenty years after her marriage with Sir George Cornwall, at Sir John Coghill's. She had many daughters; and Bentham was urged by Lord Shelburne to attach himself to one of them.

Strangely varied were the subjects which occupied Bentham's thoughts. At this time I find him engaged in writing, for some favoured Melpomene, "Instructions for the Harpsichord," some of which are very characteristic.

After remarking that facility of playing depends on the choice of fingers, and its accuracy on the verticality of the fingers over the keys to be struck—that expression is the result of the smartness of the stroke and of the evenness, and the staccato, in their appropriate places, he points out "how the timidity inseparable to early practice" is "the cause of error" in the non-verticality of the fingers.

"As every time of shifting the whole hand to a new position endangers a miscarriage, the beginner covets to execute as many notes together as he can without shifting it. When at last a note comes at such a distance from that preceding it, that shifting can no longer be forborne: one finger is sent out before the rest, like the dove out of the ark, by way of trial, to be followed by the whole hand if it succeeds.

"For a long time before the learner can form a comprehensive idea of the relation of the respective distance between that numerous assemblage of keys that are necessary to the instrument, and for want of having the idea of the distance of each key from that which is to succeed it ready in his mind, he is forced to measure it, as it were, at the time of striking. In consequence, he is obliged to keep his finger over the first key while he is feeling for the second. If he moves his whole hand at once, he knows not how far to carry it. As confidence increases by habitual excercitation, the danger is gradually obviated; the practitioner becomes less afraid of trusting his whole hand to move at once. In time, practice, of itself, will effect a cure. But the cure may be accelerated by its being known on what circumstances it depends. The practitioner, when he sees clearly what these circumstances are, will better understand how to conduct himself so as to favour their operation. He will understand, for example, that his business is to repress his solicitude for success—not to mind, at first, if he does stumble on a wrong key; but to move his hand freely, so as all along to give his fingers the requisite vertical direction.

"Habit, blind habit, will of itself do much; but it will do much more: it will do the same thing in much less time when enlightened by observation."

To Melpomene the following hints will be matter rather of curiosity than of use:—

"The momentary and casual evanescent instructions, that are given ad hoc by a master, may be rendered much more efficacious by being registered in writing, and worked up into general standing rules, since the design of them is only to assist other young practitioners towards that perfection whi^{ch}

he has already attained. But if there is a kind of melancholy pleasure, as the poet says—

Suave mari, &c.

in seeing others struggling under the difficulties we have ourselves surmounted, we may reap a pleasure of a purer and less exceptionable kind in contemplating the causes of those difficulties, and such expedients by which others may be assisted in removing them. If there is a pleasure in the recollection of vanquished difficulties, that pleasure will, in a generous mind, be improved by a view of such expedients as are calculated to enable others to surmount the like."

It is amusing and instructive to follow Bentham in his studies of the art of composition. Many of his MSS. are curious evidences of the way in which he exercised himself in order to train his style to precision. One specimen will serve to exhibit what he calls the "Forms Direct and Indirect of Legislation"—as where stealing is forbidden, and the punishment of death attached to it:—

1. Steal not. If thou do, thou shalt be hanged.
2. Thou shalt not steal. If thou do, thou shalt be hanged.
3. He that stealeth shall be hanged.
4. Whoso stealeth shall be hanged.
5. If any one steal, he shall be hanged.
6. All persons that steal shall be hanged.
7. Every person that stealeth shall be hanged.
8. For him that stealeth, the punishment shall be hanging.
9. For any one that stealeth, the punishment shall be hanging.
10. For all persons that steal, the punishment shall be hanging.
11. For every person that stealeth, the punishment shall be hanging.
12. Let no one steal; if he do, he shall be hanged.
13. If thou steal, thou shalt be hanged.
14. Stealing or theft shall be punished by hanging.
15. For stealing, the punishment shall be hanging.

I mentioned among Bentham's acquaintance a mercantile man named Villion, a Genoese, "who helped," said Bentham, "to cheer my Lincoln's-Inn solitude. He was very fond of my company, and was generally welcome to me. But once he annoyed me by coming at dinner time; for I had but a scanty fare, and he grubbed up half of it. His dress was very shabby, and he wore a shirt as coarse as a hop-sack. Everything about him was mean; and as I attributed it to his poverty, I only pitied him. But I soon learned he had lost no less than £4000 by the failure of his brother—this alone was equal to £200 a-year—so he sank in my estimation. I could have excused his poverty, but not his being so rich and living so meanly. I was passionately fond of chemistry then, and he studied chemistry for the love he bore me. In his brother's absence he once gave me a dinner at his brother's expense. I remember a garden-like paradise on the top of the house. He used to borrow books of me. He was received into many good families, among others that of Peter Noailles, who had extensive silk works at Seven Oaks. Noailles had a beautiful wife and a beautiful daughter; and, being introduced by Villion, I dined there once or twice. There was a renowned wine-merchant of the name of Chaillet, who afterwards migrated to Bedford Square. He had two daughters, one of whom married a secretary of the first Lord Melville. When I was a suitor on the subject of 'Panopticon,' the secretary did me some friendly service, and I once met his father-in-law at his office, and he said to me—'Mr. Bentham, was it you that wrote the Defence of Usury?'—'Yes.'—'Then you shall dine with me.' I went, and was surprised to find his wife a vulgar, purse-proud woman. There were a dozen people present, and we had some music. I remember observing something white on the middle of the table, and I asked what it was: 'You will see,' she said; 'that is not to be eaten yet: it will be eaten by and by.' Once, when in the carriage with her, she asked me to make some verses to entertain them. I make verses! I, indeed!! But, in truth, I was so secluded, and my father kept none but the most trashy company, that I was glad of any society."

Villion seems to have been much attached to Bentham. One of his letters, written in answer to a communication of Bentham, which was the resumption of intercourse long dropped, has the following passage:—

DEAR SIR,—Upon my returning to town to-day, on account of the election of East India Directors, I have been—shall I say agreeably or disagreeably?—surprised at finding at home your obliging letter of the 8th instant. It hath recalled to my mind a friendly connexion which, as long as it lasted, was at once the pride and the delight of my life. But this connexion not being equally supported on both sides, it necessarily grew, by slow degrees, weaker and weaker, till it broke at last.

"This event, although long foreseen, and according to the common course of nature, which seldom, very seldom indeed, admits the continuation of an intimacy between unequals, hath, however, affected me so much, that I do assure you time hath hardly afforded me any relief; even Time itself, whose ever-working hand hath almost obliterated out the very deep impressions made upon me by the heavy strokes of repeated misfortunes; misfortunes which the generality of people would agree in looking upon as the most severe ones. I have endeavoured to reconcile myself to that event by the consideration, that when we leave nothing at all behind us to regret, we are prepared to meet death with fortitude and indifference."

Bentham answered this epistle in the language of kindness, welcoming the re-establishment of friendly relations, to which Villion replies—

Lothbury, No. 28, Monday Morning, 19th April, 1784.

"MY DEAR SIR,—An engagement for yesterday brought me to town very late on Saturday evening. I had been pressed in an obliging manner to stay till the next morning, but I congratulated myself for having luckily withstood the civil importunities of my friends, as I anticipated, by some hours, the inexpressible satisfaction and comfort which your letter of the 14th instant gave me. So kind, so friendly, so moving, so artless a letter, dictated by the heart,—coming from you to me,—makes more than ample amends for full ten years trouble and uneasiness of mind. I am sure, in the course of a very long life, I should never forget a single word of it. I look upon it as a pledge that promises to me the continuation of what will soften the unavoidable misfortunes of this world,—will increase greatly the enjoyments it may afford,—and, what I value more, will add dignity to me, not only in my own estimation but in that of others.

“Had it been a more early hour,—had I not been afraid to disturb you,—had I been sure you could give me a bed,—I should have fled directly to your chambers. I called there yesterday. To my very great disappointment I did not find you at home; and I left a note which I scribbled at the coffee-house in a hurry, and under the first impression of my chagrin at seeing my hopes frustrated.

“It is very unlucky for me that I cannot absolutely see you, nor to-day, nor to-morrow. If you be disengaged next Wednesday evening, I shall call upon you. Should not that day suit you, choose any other you please, and be assured that I shall make you a sacrifice of any engagement of mine,—let it be of duty, business, or pleasure, for I can have none greater than that of assuring you in person how affectionately and truly I am, my dear Bentham, your humble servant, and sincere friend,

“FRANCIS VILLION.”

George Wilson and James Trail were, of all Bentham's acquaintance, those with whom he was most intimate. “George Wilson,” said he, “was my bosom friend. We had been both of us friendless. He had lived at Aberdeen, where his father had been collector of the Customs. He had been at Edinburgh University. He was related by marriage to Dr. Fordyce. I made acquaintance, before I was of age, with Dr. Fordyce, in consequence of his lectures on chemistry; and I once gave him and (Chamberlain) Clark, a dinner in Lincoln's Inn. Dr. Fordyce was, I think, at that time the only chemical lecturer, and was only poorly attended. Wilson was first cousin to a Lord Forbes; and Fordyce invited Wilson to dinner to meet me. He had no legal acquaintances except Sir Archibald Macdonald, who was an aristocrat and a puppy, and took no notice of Wilson,—so that Wilson really knew nobody but Dr. Fordyce, who was a queer creature without conversation. Wilson and I there met. He was not a forward—no!—he was rather a reserved, even bashful man: but he was six feet one inch in height. Not long after it happened, I was not so poor but I could go and live apart from my father; so I went to a little eating, or chop-house, called the Three Tuns, where I used to dine for thirteence, including a penny to the waiter; and thus to be free from troublesome company. While sitting at one table, he was at another. I recognised him, and asked him to take tea with me. I found he was fond of chess. I was passionately fond of it. This was long after our meeting at Fordyce's, who was in the habit of bringing people together, giving no one any account of the others, so that they were constantly in awkward plights. He thus introduced me to Solander's Club, where nobody knew me, and I knew nobody, and had nothing to say to anybody, nor anybody to me. At this time I was writing the Fragment. I showed him parts of it: he seemed struck with them, but uttered no praise, for he was afraid of being thought a flatterer. There was a constant correspondence between him and his sister, who was living with her father at Aberdeen. He used to show me her letters, by which I perceived the impression which the Fragment had made on his mind. Our intimacy strengthened, and at last we lived together constantly. While living in that habit of intimacy, came Lord Glenbervie and Silvester Douglas, who had been bear-leader to the Douglas whose legitimacy had been questioned. That Douglas was a ward of Lord Mansfield; but he had, notwithstanding, so lived as to outrun the constable. The great Douglas had his opera girl, and the little Douglas had his, so he was recalled in disgrace. Douglas, who was a pert, supercilious fellow, but had talents, very considerable talents, came and entered himself at Lincoln's Inn. He and Wilson knew one another, and he used frequently to come and call Wilson to the other side of the room, and leave me in solitude, which annoyed me not a little. Douglas had seen much of the grand monde, Wilson nothing,—so he would not lose any opportunity of hearing about it. Wilson afterwards got acquainted with Will Adam,* father of all the Adams (except the first Adam,) that have made so much noise in the world. He was nephew of Adam, the architect, who built the Adelphi. He fought with Charles Fox. Wilson was a most determined Whig, and a slave to the fashion. Very plain, but not the less anxious to be in the fashion. The aristocratical section of the public-opinion tribunal had prodigious influence on him. In his study of the laws of property, he got hold of some of my phraseology, which was of great use to him. He admired Fern prodigiously—I held him in contempt. For many successive years we used to go, in the long vacation, to the country together. How I found means I know not, but that I had two or three trifling legacies. My father, on his marriage with Mrs. Jezabel, made a little settlement on me, of a farm in Essex, worth £60, on which there was an excessive land-tax, reducing it to less than £50. Then there was a malt-house at Barking, which, when it was tenanted, gave £40; but it was not always tenanted: and for these allowances I was to appear as a gentleman, with lace and embroidery on occasion. I had four guineas to pay my laundress, four guineas to my barber, and two to my shoe-black.

“Wilson became a silk-gownman, and was at the head of the Norfolk Circuit. He was cold in his manners, and rather touchy in his temper. I never but once had anything like a quarrel with him, and then we were meeting at Dr. Fordyce's, and he said, he wanted to consult me upon some point of law. I laughed at him. He was a lawyer of eminence—I had quitted the law. He took it in dudgeon even after I had explained it, though the explanation was simple enough. He was out of humour, but ultimately I quitted him. I had been sadly plagued with these chambers of mine. I had divers tenants, more bad than good—insolvent and solvent. Among the insolvent was F—, from whom I could never get rent, nor drive him from the chambers. They told me I had no redress. I could not eject him but through the Benchers. Wilson was a Benchers, but he refused me all assistance. This shocked me so much, that I could not afterwards see him with pleasure;—but the Benchers denied me relief. I thought the rascality was characteristic. The lawyer! The Scotch friend! They gave, as a reason, that F. was not a member of the Society. I knew nothing of the existence of such a law; but I knew that, if it existed, it was frequently violated, for there were many holders of chambers who were not members of the Inn."

* The late Lord Chief Commissioner Adam was the son, not the nephew, of the architect.—E. T. M.

James Trail had held a situation in one of the colonies, and in the course of his life had been deputy-usher at court, dramatic sublicenser, tutor to the Duke of Sussex, a barrister and M.P. for Oxford,—which he owed to the Earl of Hertford, to whom Bentham represented him and his family as retainers. To his connexion with the Hertfords Bentham attributed the severity with which he always judged the Shelburnes,—for a feud existed between the two noble families, and Trail was in the habit of speaking of Lord Shelburne in terms of extreme abhorrence. So far was this pushed, that on the occasion when in the solitary king's speech prepared by Lord Shelburne, the words were introduced, that "Accounts cannot be too public,"—an admirable maxim, and whose recognition on such an occasion, was a highly important conquest for reform,—Trail set upon this phrase, as Bentham declared, "like a mastiff upon the throat of an assailant of his master, and called it, 'hodge podge,' 'innovation,' 'miss-meddling,' and 'farrago.'" So blinding are the effects of party-prejudice.

In reference to the politics of the day, Trail writes to Bentham on the 22d May, 1784, from London:—

"It is reported that Pitt means to repeal Mr. Burke's act, or at least some part of it, in order to restore the Board of Trade.

"Sir James Lowther has been exceedingly offended that Lord Abergavenny was made an earl before him, because the daughter of John Robinson, formerly his steward, may eventually take rank before his wife. It is said that he is now pacified, but on what terms I have not heard: according to some, he remains a commoner, and will, notwithstanding, support the administration; others say, he takes his six titles, and has obtained besides the promise of a blue riband.

"We hear that Pitt has prepared an India bill, nearly the same with Fox's: The trade to be left in the hands of the directors,—the government to be vested in commissioners for a term of years, but named by the crown. Probably his plan, establishing the succession to offices in rotation, will make a part of this bill; and in that case it will be nearly the same with what Fox proposed, after his first bill was rejected by the House of Lords.

George Wilson, on the 19th June, writes:—

"The Westminster scrutiny goes on rapidly. In this first week, two votes of Mr. Fox's have been decided upon, and both confirmed; a third has been heard, and the decision adjourned till Monday. Trail is drawing like a wagon-horse, from morning to night, and from Monday to Saturday. I am, as usual, attending the King's Bench, and idling away the afternoon."

Dr. Swediaur writes from Edinburgh, on the 15th July:—

"Dr. Smith, with whom I am intimately acquainted, is quite our man. He is busy about a new edition of his Wealth of Nations. We have a club here which consists of nothing but philosophers. Dr. Adam Smith, Cullen, Black, Mr. McGowan, &c., belong to it, and I am also a member of it. Thus I spend once a-week in the most enlightened and agreeable, cheerful and social company."

Several of the letters of this period refer to the publication of Voltaire's Memoirs, of which Dr. Smith says:—

"Have you read Voltaire's Memoirs of his life, written by himself? I have just got a copy of it from Paris; it is excellent,—and great many of the anecdotes, especially those about the King of Prussia, I know to be true; the old scoundrel will not be much pleased to have his character so much exposed during his life-time."

And Mr. Trail, on the 9th August:—

"I have read Memoires de Voltaire. They are entertaining, and if not genuine, at least a tolerable imitation of his manner. If I had been persuaded that they were authentic, I am not sure but my expectations would have been disappointed in the perusal. There is nothing interesting, and little of anything except what relates to the King of Prussia.

"I admit that Smith's book is in the press, and that it has considerable additions,—it will appear in 4 vols. octavo,—I cannot learn to what particular points the additions relate. It will not be published in less than two months.

"I hear of no public news but from the papers; I need not, therefore, repeat what you see there. If the General Advertiser is to be had at Whitechurch, you will be entertained, perhaps, with the account, given in that paper of last Saturday, of Fox's speech the night before. I am told, by those who heard it, that it was equal to any he had ever made, and with the uncommon advantage of being a reply to Pitt, who has now given up the only remaining measure he had struggled for some time to maintain. The people in the city, I hear, are beginning to talk very freely of the inexperience and incapacity of their late favourite minister; and Fox has given them great satisfaction by his temperate and discriminating opposition to such measures only as they have disapproved of. If Pitt should have as much to do next session, I own I should not be surprised to see such a current against him as might affect his power,—but he has got through all his taxes, having provided for the interest even of that part of the debt which will not be regularly funded till next session. I cannot foresee that he will have anything to do next session but to mend the high roads and enclose commons, and make a parading speech about the produce of the sinking fund, and the application of the surplus.”

One of Trail's letters, of the 16th September, gives a detailed account of Lunardi's balloon ascent the day before; which is interesting as one of the earliest experiments in aerostation.

“London, 16th September 1784.

“DEAR BENTHAM,—Wilson has so far relented that he has permitted me to write you some account of Lunardi's excursion with his air balloon. Fordyce undertook to fill it with inflammable air, and executed his part of the business with great coolness and success. He intended to have begun his operations on Tuesday evening, about six o'clock, but was prevented by various accidents till five next morning, so that he was obliged to make ten gallons of air in a second, which exposed the balloon to be set on fire from the great heat produced by his rapid process. The ingredients were, oil of vitriol, and zinc, with a great quantity of water; and according to his calculations, he was, from £150 worth of each, to collect a sufficient quantity of air, and, at the same time, to make as much white vitriol as would sell for £400, at the rate of £10 less per ton than the market price. By this good management £100 will be gained by the process. About one o'clock, the time fixed for the balloon to go off, Lunardi became very impatient, and was afraid the mob would break in; so that Fordyce was obliged to humour him, although he had not been able, notwithstanding all his exertions, to collect the quantity of air he wished. Upon trial, it was found that there was not enough to raise the two travellers with twenty-five pounds of ballast, which obliged Biggins to get out; and Lunardi set out by himself, with about thirty pounds of ballast, part of which he threw out almost immediately after he rose from the ground, to enable him to clear a row of houses adjoining the Artillery Ground. We saw everything so distinctly, and were so much satisfied with the safety of the attempt, that it was by no means that awful or solemn scene that I expected—everybody greatly interested, but cheerful and gay; and in about ten minutes he was at such a distance that we could scarcely discover the gallery fixed to the balloon. It went at first north-west, and afterwards nearly due north; and in about three quarters of an hour, was out of sight, I believe, of every person in London. No certain accounts were received in town, of the conclusion of this voyage, till this afternoon, when two letters—one to Dr. Fordyce, and the other to Biggins—came from Lunardi, written from Baker's house in Hertfordshire. In these letters he says, that, after having been up some time, he descended by means of one of his oars (the other he dropped by accident,) till he came very near the earth; and by throwing out a small grappling iron, he brought himself to an anchor in a large field where some men were at work. To these people he called with his speaking-trumpet, and got some information, which he does not specify. After leaving his cat with them, he threw out the remainder of his ballast, and ascended again to a much greater height than he had been before. In his first voyage, the thermometer did not sink below 35°; but in his second trip it fell down to 29°. Some vapour had got into the balloon, and, being condensed, fell down now and then upon him in drops; but, when at his greatest height, these drops were frozen. He does not mention what brought him down a second time. It is thought, notwithstanding his account, the cause of his coming down both times was the waste of the inflammable air through the seams, and perhaps the body, of the silk. The oar was too small to have such an effect as he imputes to it. By his own conjecture, he rose the second time to the height of four miles; but as he had no barometer (which was in Biggins' pocket, and forgot in the hurry,) we cannot depend upon the accuracy of his judgment. He was up, altogether, two hours and twenty minutes; and landed three miles beyond Ware, in Hertfordshire, where he was soon joined by General Smith, and some other gentlemen who had followed him out of town on horseback, with whom he dined, and went afterwards to Mr. Baker's house. In his letter to Biggins, he expresses his regret that he had not his company, which, he says, prevented him from enjoying his voyage—but assures him he shall accompany him on the next; that the balloon shall be filled quite full, and if then it will not carry two, he, Biggins, shall then go up alone. The balloon came safe to town this evening, in Baker's caravan, and was lodged, amidst the acclamations of a great mob, at Biggins' house, in Essex Street. Fordyce had a very ingenious contrivance to let out the inflammable air, if it had been necessary. He fixed two silk tubes about the middle of the balloon, which hung down; and in that position, although open, the light air could not force its way out; but by means of a rope and a pulley, which went over the top, Lunardi could raise up either of the tubes as high as any part of the balloon, and then the air would have flowed out freely. It does not appear that he made any use of this contrivance; but it is a proof the principle is sound, and that the bottom of the balloon was open the whole time. Lunardi was chilled with the cold, although he had on a flannel shirt and drawers. We may expect to see him aloft again in a few days; we are promised, besides, an exhibition of a balloon from Lord Foley's garden on Monday next, with which Colonel Gardner and Mr. Sheldon are to ascend. Blanchard, who went up in France, has brought over his balloon, and will, no doubt, perform some feats, unless Lunardi has anticipated him. He was in the Artillery Ground on Wednesday, and endeavoured to turn everything into ridicule; and, at the same time, to alarm the people, who stood near the balloon while it was filling, for their safety. He sured them the casks would certainly burst. He was so much attended to, that several persons entreated the Prince of Wales, who stood very near, to retire; but he, with great indifference, desired his companion, Tommy Onslow, who was uncommonly anxious to get him away, to retire himself, if he thought there was any danger. Although the concourse of people was immense, yet few, in proportion, came into the Artillery Ground. It is said not more than £400 was received for tickets. —Yours, &c.

I find an advertisement in the Morning Advertiser announcing Mr. Lunardi's intention of ascending from the artillery ground, which the Honourable Company had let to him for one hundred guineas, to be presented to the children of Sir Bernard Turner—an arrangement in which Mr. Lunardi says, he “feels a pleasure inexpressible.”

Romilly was, to the end of his days, one of Bentham's intimates. “I met Romilly,” he said, “in 1784 or 85, on my return from my travels. In 1789, I met him again, at Lord Lansdowne's, which renewed the acquaintance. He was a man of great modesty, of few words, of no conversation. Dumont used often to dine there; and after dinner they would sit together for half an hour without either uttering a word. He had a way of quashing conversation by saying, for instance, ‘Oh, that man is such a fool!’ But he got violent on no one topic, and so laid the foundation of his fame and fortune. He did not bear his faculties meekly—nor was he heard very patiently in the House of Commons. In the Court of Chancery, great oppression is exercised by the seniors towards the juniors; many attempts had been made to set the matter right; but Romilly adhered to the aristocrats. Romilly had the ear of the Chancellor, and trusted to his influence over the Chancellor; and so he got some of his little miniature reforms adopted. Had they been considerable, they would have been resisted with all Lord Eldon's might.”

The following is an extract from a letter from Dr. Symonds, dated Trinity College, Cambridge, April 28, 1785:—

“DEAR SIR,—I should have answered your letter much sooner, if it had not been for my staying to take an opportunity of one of my friends going to London, that he might carry a dissertation, which I beg your acceptance of. It was written during the American war, and most probably never fell into your hands. In 1761 and 1762, I read, with particular attention, the principal Greek and Latin historians, and had many points in view, among which was colonisation: that was not a party question before the Stamp Act passed. When I answered my antagonist, who is a Scotchman, I had nothing more to do than to have recourse to my notes; which soon convinced me that something more than an honest inquiry after truth prompted him to misrepresent the writers of antiquity; and, in fact, he was soon rewarded by the Ministry with a pension of £200 a-year, which he is represented to enjoy at this time.”

There is a very amusing epistle of Bentham's to Mr. Townsend, dated May 12th, 1785:—

“DEAR SIR,—Here am I still: how much longer I shall be here I do not, as yet, precisely know; nor by what track, nor by what conveyance, I shall migrate elsewhere. I am waiting for letters from Petersburg; that is to say, I am in the state and condition of your friend Horace's countryman, who kept waiting for the river to run itself dry. Thanks to my sins, I have to do with one of the most indolent men [Prince Potemkin] of one of the most indolent nations upon the face of God Almighty's earth. I write him letter after letter about business purely his own. He, I am told, expresses much satisfaction; and how do you think he testifies it? You would suppose, by answering them. No such thing: he orders them to be translated out of my dog-French into Russian, for what purpose, or for whose use, I can't pretend to guess: not for his own, most certainly; as he makes, at least, as much use of the French as of the Russ. However, he talks of writing soon, and there the matter rests.

“As for you, I will almost venture to prophecy you will not quit Tin island in a hurry. The quarries of Cornwall have encompassed you with silver chains. I see the would-be Gulliver struggling to get loose in vain: a swarm of little Plutuses keep fast hold of him by the heart-strings. As to Sir Edward Bayntun, I am much obliged to him for his good intentions: they are, like Prince Potemkin's, of lasting stuff, not to be put an end to by performance; I should rather have said, for his declarations, which, assuredly, is full as much as I had any title to expect.

“To come back to milkmaids. You gave me, as your decided opinion, that no such animals would be to be met with, born in two counties at once. After great consideration and some inquiry, I am inclined to think you are in the right; indeed, I never can hear of more than one sort of being that is to be found in more than one place at a time, at any period of its existence. I think, therefore, I have done something in finding, in the person of a niece of my all-capable Scotchman, an intelligent, well-bred, young gentlewoman, of about twenty-five; who, to the theoretical merit of having imbibed sound chemical principles from her uncle, adds the practical requisite of having been born and bred in a Cheshire dairy. You will say that is doing the business but by halves: true; but it would be more than half done if I could get her regenerated in Wiltshire. Now, how to bring about this good work? Of myself, you know, I can do nothing: to the art of regeneration I can make no more pretensions than to its simple prototype. But you, my venerable friend, are alike an adept in both: the last your pastime is, the first your trade. Now, then, how shall I contrive to pay you? for every one must live by his trade, and yours is none of those which men are wont to live the worst by. Don't be wicked now, and think that I mean to propose to you to pay yourself, by intermixing, upon this occasion, your pastime with your trade: that would be curtailing you of a syllable, without making you a jot the richer; besides, that my commission does not extend quite so far; and, sacred as the precedent is, it is possible

she might have her scruples about acting the part of Ruth, although you were to be her Boaz. I mean to pay you more liberally in your own coin. Pewsey, I am told; or the near neighbourhood of it, is a second Canaan: don't be angry, I speak of its produce, not of its inhabitants: the ditches, instead of mud, are filled with milk; and the foot-paths, instead of gravel, are cased with cheese. You cannot but know plenty of your ouailles or of their commères, who, out of Christian charity, aided by the moderate application of a more substantial motive, would undertake this pious work. The process need not take up above a week; and any recompense you thought adequate, two or three guineas suppose, would be cheerfully bestowed. But what, you will say, is become of the Levites now, all this while? Have a little patience. I have a piece of malachites (and, ye heavenly powers, what a piece!) fit to make a breastplate for the angel Gabriel. Who can say that it may not have served heretofore to that use? Stones, you tell us, have fallen from heaven before now; and why may not this be one of them. Sure nothing half so beautiful could ever have been dug out of the earth. This jewel, my fair cheese-maker, who, I understand, is a fossilist to boot, shall bring down in her lap, and deposit, with pious gratitude, in the sanctum sanctorum of Pewsey. To this shall be added about fifty or sixty specimens of Siberian ores, sent over by my brother, in days of yore, as an earnest of better things to come. True it is, these were put up in a bundle, with your direction to them, before I had thought of Pewsey in any other light than that of a place in which I had spent some pleasant hours, and might, possibly—I know not at what distant period—spend more. But the handling of so much wealth hath made me mercenary; and I have vowed a vow—a tremendous, irrevocable vow—that your eyes shall never behold a single grain of them, unless wafted to Pewsey by that enviable conveyance.

“When you see Lord Lansdowne, you will hear of a great pie which was cut up at his house, and in which, alas! alas! I full well know, my reverend friend would have rejoiced to have a finger. I cried out, with a loud voice, Where is he? They answered me, and said, Three hundred miles off, even in Cornwall, too busy and too wise to leave mountains for horse-loads of chip bandboxes. What could I do? There is an hour for pies as for other things. The hour of this pie was come: it had been kept till it would keep no longer. But what hath kept, keeps still, and will have kept when pies and custards are grown stale (how does my little custardophagus?) is the sincere regard and esteem with which I am, dear Sir, your obliged friend and humble servant,

“J. B.

“P. S.—If at this distance you can assist me, I beg leave to propose the best mode of doing it,—that, in your answer to me, you should enclose a letter, addressed to the discreet matron whom you honour with your choice, that I may forward it to her. The lady's name is Miss Kirkland. At any rate, I beg your immediate answer, that other measures may be taken if this should fail.”

EXTRACT FROM MR. TOWNSEND'S REPLY.

“Pewsey, 25th June, 1785.

“MY VERY DEAR SIR,—I crossed myself a thousand times when I saw the breastplate. Had you never told me whence it came, I should have known that it belonged once to the angel Gabriel. I am happy that it fell to earth, and happier still that it found the way to Pewsey. I never saw anything half so resplendent. With it there came a magnetic cristal of iron of a most peculiar form—a non-descript, which I value highly. Most of the specimens are numbered, and refer to some catalogue. I wish you had copied out the inventory, as many of the substances are new to me. I was much disappointed in not finding here my amiable guest; and fear, by the shortness of her stay, that her abode was not agreeable. I hope solitude was her only objection to this mansion, and wish to persuade myself that my housekeeper was not defective in attentions.”

Before Bentham went to Russia, he collected vast masses of information on agricultural, trading, and manufacturing subjects, for the purpose of introducing improvements of all sorts under the auspices of Prince Potemkin, in whose service his brother was then engaged—“Engaged,” says Bentham, in one of his letters, “as Jack of all trades,—building ships, like Harlequin, of odds and ends—a rope maker, a sail maker, distiller, brewer, maltster, tanner, glass-man, glass-grinder, potter, hemp-spinner, smith, and coppersmith.”

Bentham left England in the beginning of August 1785. He had engaged a passage for Smyrna on board the Mary Frances, Captain Richard Birnie, which was to sail for Smyrna from London and Topsham, on the 20th June, for Nice, where Bentham, who travelled overland, was to meet her.

Of the friendly feelings of Lord Shelburne towards him, the following letter is evidence:—

“July, 1785.

“DEAR MR. BENTHAM,—I had a headache yesterday and the day before, which made it impossible for me to write. I send you all which I have been able to write to-day. I have desired the Abbé Morellet to give you letters for Lyons and Marseilles, as he has very good connexions in both places. I have desired Mons. Rayneval to give you one for the French ambassador at Constantinople. You must take your chance about Dijon, Genoa, and Montpellier, though I dare say Mons. Rayneval will give you letters for them if you can find a proper moment to ask him. I will take my chance of to-morrow's post finding you with three letters—one for Rouen, another for Mons. Torryel, a celebrated lawyer at Paris, and another upon my own account to the Abbé Morellet.

“I beg to assure you that you go with the affectionate good wishes of all this family. Lady Lansdowne and Miss Fox desire me to mention them particularly. My last advice to you is, upon no account to be taken in to stay among barbarians: they can make you no offer worth your acceptance, except they were to name you ambassador to China—I own that would tempt me. Come back soon, and bring your brother with you, if he does not get a provision, ample enough to live upon here, in a few years, and as well secured as the Bank of England. In the meantime, get into no intrigues to serve either English or Russian, no, not even with a handsome lady, if any politics should be mixed with it; for I have said in all the material letters that I would be answerable for every part of your conduct, public or private.

"The Abbé Morellet may possibly offer to carry you to Mons. Rayneval; but, in your place, I would go alone; but don't say I advised you to do so.

"I have told Sir H. Mann that you would write me an account of his health.

"I will send you a letter for Blankett in case you meet with him.

"The post is going; and I must defer the rest till to-morrow.

"I am, very truly, yours,

"LANSDOWNE."

The same sentiments are repeated in another letter:—

"July, 1785.

"DEAR MR. BENTHAM,—The bearer, Captain Williamson, appears to me a very intelligent person. He has been last year at Constantinople and the Greek Islands; and I thought it might be agreeable to you to make his acquaintance, which has made me desire him to call on you.

"I hope my servant told you, as I had not time to write as I intended, that we would have kept the Voyages de la Grèce to be bound before we sent them; but as you will convey them on board ship, I thought it might be agreeable to you to have them half-bound in some fashion of your own, that might make them more portable.

"I hope you will have the goodness to present a sword from me to your brother, which you must pass for your own, to avoid the custom-houses through which you pass. Though a Russian colonel, I hope he'll accept an English sword.

"I do assure you that we are all, Miss Fox included, who is sitting by me, concerned for your going. Independent of the loss of your company, which we always have considered as a resource when the interested and the factious deserted us, we are apprehensive that you will lend yourself to some plan, which interested and ignorant people may open to you, and after detaining and robbing you of time, which may be more reputably at least, if not more usefully to yourself employed, may desert you. This observation applies equally to your brother's situation. I told Count Woronzow that I meant, if I continued in administration, to have placed him in some advantageous situation here.

"Count Woronzow knows him, and wishes to see you. If you please, make use of my name to him.

"I am obliged to write in great haste, because Captain W——, and a good deal of company, are by and waiting for it.

"Ever yours,

"LANSDOWNE."

And again, 29th July:—

"Bowood Park, 29th July, 1785.

"DEAR MR. BENTHAM,—I write to you at dinner, where Lady L—— and Miss Fox are, as well as myself, drinking your health and good voyage. I have no other advice to give you, except to desire the favour of you to remember your diary, and to omit nothing, not even what regards the ladies: you may leave a blank for their names. If there are any antiquities to be sold at Constantinople, I beg you will let me know of them; or, if it is not too much trouble, buy them for me, and draw upon me for the money, giving me notice of the draft; provided always that it do not exceed two or three hundred pounds, and are really capital things. Be so good, if you neither see Blankett, nor find a very safe hand to convey the enclosed to him, or destroy it. I wish you every happiness and a safe return.

"I am, very affectionately, yours,

"LANSDOWNE."

I find a communication of Bentham to Prince Potemkin, dated from the Diligence d'Eau, on the Rhine, 27th August, giving an account of his journey, and of the various arrangements he had made in his service. Potemkin's notion seems to have been, to transplant British civilisation and intelligence en masse to White Russia; as if all soils were equally adapted to the growth and development of capital, knowledge, and industry. He failed; as all have failed who forget that the march of mind, in order to be sure, must be slow; that it must gradually create around it "its means and appliances;" that the introduction of one, or a hundred enlightened foreigners into a country, are not sufficient to enlighten it; that premature attempts to cultivate an unprepared soil will bring no productive harvest. Potemkin seems liberally to have scattered about his opulence, and to have exerted his influence, and to have been fortunate enough in the instruments to which he looked for success; but success was, in the nature of things, impossible: so his money was wasted, and his power employed, in vain.

FIRST SONG OF SPRING.

BY JOHN WALKER ORD.

The first sweet song of Spring
Is ringing in mine ear—
The birds their music bring
From hill and starry sphere:
The merry woodland round,
The hawthorn and the broom,
And all the valleys sound
A dirge o'er Winter's tomb.

The sky-lark soaring high,
The blackbird on the spray,
The throstle piping nigh,
In chorus tune their lay:
It is a note of mirth,
Of joyance bright and clear;
And gladness fills the earth
From field and forest near.

Their song is of the dead—
 Of loves and memories gone ;
 For Winter bows his head,
 And breathes his latest moan.
 The Winter storms are past—
 The snow-wreath and the rain ;
 And every raging blast
 That thunder'd o'er the plain.
 It is the voice of Love
 From twice ten thousand throats,
 That swells along the grove,
 And lifts to heaven their notes.
 Love—Omnipresent Love—
 Wakes every impulse now ;
 It guides the stars above,
 And rules the world below.
 The joy fills every breast—
 It springs they know not where ;
 And warmest raptures rest
 On every breath of air :
 For passion's sacred fires
 In court nor palace brood,
 But rear their holiest pyres
 In wilderness and wood !
 They feel the coming breath
 Of Summer's balmy bowers—
 The breezes of the heath—
 The fragrance of the flowers ;
 And every primrose dell,
 And violet-scented glade,
 With song and incense swell,
 The sunshine and the shade.
 O joyous-hearted things !
 O creatures of delight !
 A tide of rapture springs
 To hear your carols light :
 To see each fluttering breast
 Such notes of gladness pour,
 That greet the golden West
 With song's melodious shower.

A myriad myriad strains,
 A myriad hymns they raise—
 The various music rains
 From heaven, in streams of praise
 To Him who reigns on high,
 And spreads the azure calm,
 For glories of the sky,
 For Spring and Summer balm.
 Yea, blessings fill the breast
 Of poet wandering near,
 Along the mountain crest,
 Your melody to hear.
 Nor human skill can bring
 Such harmony and art
 As now divinely ring
 Within the poet's heart.
 Nor envy we the herd
 Of town or courtly sphere ;—
 To me, that little bird
 Hath raptures far more dear.
 The fine Italian trill
 Can no such meanings bear,
 As from that cherub bill
 Are borne along the air !
 Behold ! the sun how bright—
 The heavens so deeply blue—
 The hills are clad with light—
 The vales with golden hue :
 The peeping buds rejoice,
 And every hazel bough—
 Whilst Nature joins her voice,
 And listens to your vow.
 Adieu ! from East to West
 The heavens are all your own ;
 Your music fills the breast
 With every sweetest tone :
 And, oh ! this blessed hour,
 Each various note and theme,
 Will bring your woodland bower
 To memory's dearest dream !

THE PROGRESS AND PROSPECTS OF SOCIETY.*

AN extraordinary book this ; the sound and sober views of the early parts, those which treat of the past progress of society, contrasting strangely with the wild speculations of the concluding portion. Yet who can affirm that such things as those which the author gravely propounds are impossible ? Heaven forbid, however, that we, or our generation, should become members of his Starvation Utopia ; or that society should be near to it, by some millions of centuries.

Taking up society from the highest existing point of civilisation, or a little farther on, when the powers of steam, and its effects, have been much more fully developed, the next great step in the social progress is to be,—all the race of Adam formed into one people ; and distinctions of language, nation, and government swept away, and evermore unknown. The main agent in this great revolution is to be railroads. Already, says our author, "the journey from Edinburgh to London, which once took three weeks, is made in a two-days' voyage ; and ten years hence, the steam-carriage may convert it into a ten-hours' journey." It may be so—nor is it impossible that men may, some time hence, travel from England to India in a week or less ; and our author, believing this, has no doubt whatever, but that the journey from Edinburgh to London will, in a few centuries, be performed in an hour—nor do we see the necessity of waiting for centuries, if the thing can be done at all. Barbarism must soon disappear before a power of this nature. "If," asks our author, "New Zealand could be brought within five minutes' voyage of England—[we shall allow him five hours, nay, five days]—how long would her inhabitants continue a nation of savages ?—how long would they continue to form an independent state ?" Before the same power, national bigotry, commercial jealousy, and rivalry, with the endless trammels which they impose on trade, must give way ; and all countries become gradually assimilated, and finally one. The different kingdoms of the Heptarchy have long been united in one England ; Wales is lost in the same mighty state ; Poland and many other nations are sunk in Russia. "Wales and Poland," we are told, "fell in the struggle, for, their time had come." In short, every thing tends to the centralization of the globe in one nation, and under one sovereignty ; Austria is spreading over Italy, Britain over India, France over the north of Africa, and Russia will yet absorb Turkey. This our author considers to be " as it should be ; these conquests being natural and necessary steps in the progress of civilisation. He admires the sublime idea of Napoleon (defeated by the Allied Powers,) asserting that "The states of Europe must be melted into one ; and Paris must be its capital !" This great pioneer of advancing civilisation was defeated by the maritime ascendancy of England, which seems to be here considered matter of deep regret.

* "The Progress and Prospects of Society. One volume post 8vo, London.

But when the sovereignty of the world is centralized—when there is but one government—war must cease. We are not so certain of this. What forbids those who have no longer foreign adversaries to contend with, indulging in the luxury of a civil war? or the people of the great-globe United Kingdom, getting up a fight with each other for any or for no cause, just as separate nations do at present? But the end of war will also put an end to national debts, taxes, and crooked diplomacy ; all fiscal barriers will be removed, and commerce will flow in its natural channels ; and as there will be no Corn Laws—no landlord legislation—one great blessing at all events—every country will produce that commodity for which soil and climate best adapt it : the division of labour will thus be completed on its true principle. But every kingdom must have a capital ; and that of the great United Kingdom of the whole globe will, our author imagines, probably be fixed in Syria, and occupy the whole of Syria ; as, calculating the number of its inhabitants by those of the capitals of Britain and Holland, and by the then vastly increased population of the world, the globe capital cannot contain fewer than fifteen thousand millions !—the population of the earth being then three hundred thousand millions ! We become stunned and stupified by the magnitude of these ideas, and must, for support and guidance, have recourse to our ingenious original :—

This huge city will be ten thousand times as large as London, and—should its citizens require as much house-room as the people of England do—will occupy a space five times as large as the island of Great Britain. So that, comparatively speaking, London is but a village, after all.

It is long since Winifred Jenkins, overpowered by the magnitude of London, (since doubled in size,) exclaimed, "Bath itself is but a fillich in the naam of Got!" But what would Win have said here? Nor are we prepared to disprove our Author's theory.

The feelings which make us believe that nothing can ever much surpass the things which we have been in the habit of meeting with, induce us to regard the results of the above calculation with incredulity : the same feelings would make a savage shake his sagacious head, if he were told of the extent and populousness of the British metropolis.

We must, before going farther, give a specimen of the extraordinary, or, if the reader prefer the term, the extravagant speculations, in which the writer indulges, before he has got the length of the purely absurd, as, we fear, some of his notions may be considered by persons of tamer fancy :—

But for the introduction of steam machinery, England might, perhaps, stand some chance of becoming the world's chief city : for being situated between the continents of Europe and America, her position would give her an advantage over many places. But the introduction of the railroad will entirely change the commercial position of nations ; thus, for instance, should railroads be formed from Europe to China, and other parts of the East, the commerce of these places will no longer flow round the Cape in English ships, at the command of English merchants ; and, consequently, the superiority of the commercial position of England will pass away.

I shall take it for granted, that long before the earth shall be fully peopled, the metropolis of the world will communicate by railway with every part of Europe, Asia, and Africa ; in the same manner that London before long will communicate with every part of the island of Great Britain.

On looking at a map of the world, we find that all the traffic, by railroad, of Africa with Europe and Asia, must pass through Syria ; and that the greater part of the commerce of Asia with Europe, must pass through the territories which border upon the same country. Thus we find that nearly all the commerce between the great divisions of the old world will meet, as it were, in one spot, in the same manner that travellers from Dover to Oxford, and from Portsmouth to Colchester, meet in London.

As the great highways of the commerce of the greater part of the world must meet in Syria, the raw material which the population of the old world will raise will be cheaper there than in any other spot ; for, in order to reach any other spot, it must travel further : if the raw material of Europe and Asia should pass into Africa, it must travel further than if it should stop on reaching Syria. The means of support also, will be cheaper in Syria than in any other country, for the same reason that, in a few years, it will be cheaper in London than in any other part of England. Consequently, the merchants will be drawn to this central spot by the favourable nature of its commercial position ; and the manufacturers by the cheapness of raw material and provisions.

I believe that the steam-carriage will, in a great measure, supersede shipping ; for there is no reason that a steam-carriage should not be made to carry a thousand or ten thousand tons. The engineers of the present day appear to think that they are bound to make a steam-carriage after the model of a waggon or a hackney-coach ; but this merely arises from the difficulty which these gentlemen find in persuading themselves to do anything which their forefathers have not done before them, and is no reason that the engineers of a future period should not make a bolder use of the power of steam : man builds a canoe before he builds a seventy-four. But should a great part of the commerce of the world continue to be carried by ships, Syria will still be the most favourable spot for commerce ; for she will be able to make the same use of the Mediterranean, the Red Sea, and the Persian Gulf, that New-York makes of the Hudson, the Delaware, and the Ocean.

Syria and the adjacent countries, therefore, will occupy a better commercial position than any other part of the world ; and consequently, will probably become the site of the metropolis of the world.

The metropolis of Great Britain is not situated in the Hebrides : then why should we suppose that the metropolis of the world will be situated at an extreme point of the old world ! The capital of the British empire is not situated in Ireland : why should we suppose that the capital of the world will be situated in America !

All this is tolerable, and, as mere speculation, not infeasible. But other evils await us : our literature is to be annihilated by the adoption of the universal language ; and what shall atone to us for the loss of our Shakespeare and Milton, or even of our Scotts and Fieldings ?

The universality of language will cause many great works that are now called immortal, to be forgotten. The languages of the present day will be no longer spoken ; they will have become dead languages : the noble works that will have been written in these fleeting tongues may, perhaps, be translated into the universal language; but when there shall be an abundance of original works of the greatest merit, in the language of the day, who will care to read translations of works that will be incomprehensible, in consequence of their connexion with manners and customs that will be forgotten? No man could translate Hudibras; who could translate the works of Shakspeare?

The abundance of great new works, when a man equal to Shakspeare may be calculated to arise about once in a century, instead of once in three thousand years, is offered in compensation of this irreparable loss, together with a liberal allowance of something far before what we now reckon first-rate authors, who are to be as plenty as blackberries. Still we are not satisfied that posterity should lose what has charmed us and our fathers; and if there is to be but one universally spoken language, we wish our author would, if possible, contrive to make it out to be English. The French would, no doubt, be excessively jealous on this point; but have we not already in India, in America, and in Australia, made a good start, and obtained an advantage? And the language of steam is English.

But if the kingdom of the world is to have a Shakspeare once in a hundred years or so, it is also, at all times, to have an ample supply of Broughams and Chathams, Foxes and Pitts; and those of a very improved sort; if the universal government is to be representative, which is ever favourable to eloquence. In speaking of the half-dozen representatives which the small electoral district of Britain and Ireland might send to the National Congress in Syria—and annually we hope—our author very reasonably asks, "What chance would many members of our present Houses of Parliament, who now pass for good speakers, have for being heard, if they were surrounded by a thousand of the greatest men of a population of a hundred or a thousand times as large as that which the world at present contains, could produce?" Now, if the faculties of individuals shall increase in the same ratio as the population, we know not what satisfactory answer modern statesmen and orators can give to this. They must be content to sing small.—But if the universal language shall annihilate the existing literature of every modern nation, happy times will the great future authors have of it, as well as the actors and musicians. Authors will then require no copyright protection to make them rich.

Authors, actors, and musicians, in consequence of the fusion of languages and nations, will probably become the most wealthy class of the community. The increase of the population will cause a multitude of provincial towns to acquire greater population than the capitals of the petty countries into which the world is now divided; the unity of nations, and the universality of language, will enable the theatrical star to appear in every land and in every city; and the steam-engine will convey him from one spot to another with the rapidity of lightning. Thus, the great actor or musician will be able to make his "first and only appearance" during a year, in a different city, of, perhaps, the size of London, every night throughout the year. This will enable him to raise immense sums by the exercise of his talents: if a great actor were to appear but once a year in London, he might demand a large sum for his appearance; for under such circumstances, a great number of people would be willing to pay a high price for the privilege of seeing him. Already, the increase of a population speaking but one language has materially affected the salaries of our leading actors: twenty years ago, there were but few large towns to compete with London for the services of the great actor; but now, the metropolis must out-bid many large cities, not only of Great Britain and Ireland, but of America also.

When the population of the earth shall speak a universal language, of course the actor will be as highly paid as the musician. At present, the leading musicians of the world receive but a few hundred pounds for a night's appearance on the boards of our national theatres; but when the population of all the earth shall have increased a thousand fold, and steam shall have annihilated distance, they will receive as many hundred thousands.

The fusion of nations and languages will also increase the fees of eminent physicians, pleaders, and others, whose sphere of action is now limited by the barriers which are thrown in their way by the nationality of states, the difficulty of transit, and the multiplicity of languages.

We are now arrived at what would seem, in our eyes, to be the happiest period of the Future—its Middle Ages, as it were; after which period things, to our feelings, begin to look a little uncomfortable, if not black and dismal. The Malthusian curse then comes into full operation. We have a wise and beneficent central dominion—free trade—no wars—disease disappears—the human form becomes divine—intellectual enjoyments abound—the highest imaginable civilisation is achieved by the whole population—but there is, alas! very, very little to eat. The productive powers of nature have been developed by industry and science to the utmost extent; the whole earth, and every inch of its surface, has been brought into the highest cultivation; and there is not a foot of land which a certain amount of labour will not have rendered as fertile as the richest soils now are: all is teeming and productive; and yet food fails. From animal food, or a proportion of meat, the inhabitants of the Universal Kingdom are first driven to grain, like the Hindoos; and next from rice, maize, and oats, to roots, like the Irish, sauced, perhaps, with a little fish. Pastures are first turned into corn-land; there is no milk nor butter, any more than meat; and, next, all corn-land becomes potato-ground, or ground for raising some yet undiscovered root, or roots, which may yield more sustenance than the potato, from an equal space. Looking longingly back to the flesh-pots of Egypt from this opening Canaan, we are again overwhelmed, and must turn for support to our original:—

The principles which have already turned the pastures of populous countries into corn lands, and the corn lands of still more populous countries into potato grounds, will eventually free the earth from forests, deserts, swamps, hedges, trees, and every other obstruction to the production of the cheapest sort of food. The beast of the field will have no hiding-place, and the species of every bird that cannot live on worms or insects, will become extinct. Poultry, should it be reared at all, will become as scarce as venison has already become in all populous countries. The rivers will afford but a scanty supply of fish for so great a multitude; but the seas will probably yield a sufficient supply to vary, in some measure, the diet of the people. As the North, moreover, in consequence of the severity of its climate, will not be capable of producing the same kind of vegetables as the south, the people will possess more than one sort of root.

The limited extent of productive space will also banish wine, spirits, tea, &c., from the board: men will not be able to indulge in luxuries, when all the earth shall be required for the production of necessaries.

I think we may conclude that when the world shall be fully peopled, a small portion of fish, two or three sorts of roots, and an unlimited quantity of water, will constitute the diet of mankind.

It would be difficult or impossible to decide how large a population the earth, when fully cultivated, will support; but it may not be impossible to show that it will support more than a certain number.

Even with our present skill in agriculture, if we were willing to expend sufficient labour, we might make any acre of ground annually yield 3,000 pounds of food in the form of wheat, 6,000 in the form of maize, or 30,000 in the form of roots. Consequently, should agricultural improvement advance no further, every acre of land in the world will support fifteen inhabitants on a root diet—provided two thousand pounds of roots be sufficient to support an individual for a year. As, therefore, there are about twenty thousand millions of acres of land in the habitable world, the whole earth will support at least three hundred thousand millions of inhabitants on a root diet—and, as I have already shown, to a root diet we must come at last.

But as the world will have but small rations served at its public table—for the quantity of food, no more than the age of marriage, can, at this stage, be left to individual discretion—fortunately it will have little or no labour to perform. Machinery, long ere then perfected, will have thrown the masses wholly out of employment, because their assistance is no longer required—a few persons being sufficient to keep the machines in operation. Besides, manufactures of clothing will have long been useless, as there will be no longer any raw material to fabricate into cloth. There will be neither wool, fur, nor feathers, for beast and bird are extinct; and, fortunately, no more babbling about natural history. No flax or cotton will be raised, nor mulberry trees to feed silk-worms. Roots yield few fibres that can be converted into raiment, and what they do yield will be required by the machinery. Clothing, long excessively dear, will at last be discontinued. We do not see what is to be done for printing and writing paper, when rags shall cease along with clothing; and when the only material will be for a time, the fibres and skins of fishes to convert into trousers and petticoats, or when every man shall be clothed in his own spun hair. Yet our author has grave doubts as to this resource.

The skins and intestines of fish will form a material of which dress might be made; but they will be required for food; for when the people shall be no longer able to procure the flesh of other creatures, they will hold even the skins of fish to be luxurious: even now, men eat tripe. I do not think there will be sufficient human hair to clothe the population; for a man's clothes would wear out faster than he could replace them, if he could procure nothing but his own hair to make them of.

We are of the same opinion, even if ringlets were more luxuriant, and moustaches thicker, than in our days. Did we not say right that this was a dismal, hungry Utopia? The skins of fishes counted luxuries by men who have attained the highest pitch of civilisation, yet who are still unhappily carnal in their unsatisfied appetites! Would there be no danger of them becoming cannibals? The omnivorous human stomach confined to roots!—But for clothing there is another resource besides the shagreen suits.

The metals will be by far the cheapest, if not the only materials that the people will have for making clothes. If, therefore, they should clothe themselves at all, I think they will be compelled to be content with such clothing as they may be able to procure by weaving the finer sorts of metals into garments.*

But, for the following reasons, I think we may presume that the people will cease, for the most part, to clothe themselves at all.

As the population will be settled in the finest climates, clothing will not be at all necessary; on the contrary, a metallic dress, though never so finely woven, would be particularly disagreeable in the sun, and not very pleasant in the shade. The shame of nakedness, therefore, will be the only motive that man will have for clothing himself.

That false modesty which makes us shun nakedness, is an acquired, not a necessary feeling.

We admit this: and now the feeling of false modesty is conquered all over the world—and men and women are again so many stately Adams and lovely Eves; and we have reached the utmost possible state of mortal perfection, and what is it? Universal nakedness, and potato or cassava diet, with no labour to perform, and little to eat!

Long before this, the rate-receivers have become the arbiters of the amount of the rate, till at length all property, swallowed up in the rate, becomes public, and the population is concentrated in the finest climates, that it may be maintained at the lowest expense of food, exactly like Parish Unions in our times. The unemployed masses maintained by the rate (the paupers namely) will be first gathered together; then the whole communities of the globe-kingdom. Sometimes we are tempted to fancy the treatise a piece of delicate irony, as when we read the following passage:—

As a permanently unemployed population will not arise until the land that will previously have been employed in producing the raw material of clothing will be converted into food-producing land, of course, clothing will be excessively dear. The expense, therefore, of finding the poor with the clothing necessary in severe climates will induce the rate-payers to plant the pauper masses in the fairest regions of the earth.

There will be no difficulty in removing the poor; for, at this period, the world will contain but one people, and the railroads will enable the pauper masses to move from one region to another with the ease with which our own poor move from their parishes to the central work-house.

It may be said that the poor will not like to leave their native countries: of course they will not; but did the rate-payers of England consult the feelings of the poor when they made the new poor-law?

The new poor-law of England, clothes, feeds, and lodges the poor; but it does not supply them with any money, because it was discovered, to the great scandal of the rate-payers, that under the old system a portion of the poor-rate was expended by the paupers on mere luxuries and comforts. As the same motives that govern the actions of the rate-payers of the present day, will govern the actions of all future rate-payers, I presume the pauper masses will not be supplied with any money while they shall continue to be in a dependent state.

The members of a family feed at the same table and at the same hour, because they find that by so doing they can obtain a better meal for a certain sum, than they could if they fed separately.

But a grand revolution, which we have rather forestalled above, follows on this. The unemployed masses, the paupers, become the masters.

* Our philosopher seems unaware of the new fabrics of spun glass, which, besides being splendid in appearance, last for ever. They would, in his Utopia, be a great resource while clothes continue to be worn.—E. T. M.

"Time about is fair play, and every dog has his day," says the adage. We like to hear this:

The power which the masses will derive from the greatness of their numbers, will begin to be felt by all; and a wholesome dread of this power will cause the wishes of the pauper to be respected, and his condition to be improved by the rate-payers. After this period, all further increase of the pauper masses will tend to improve their position, by enabling them to demand a more liberal supply of wealth.

When the paupers shall have increased to a certain number, they will possess an overwhelming physical power: and their power will be increased by their union; for they will all have the same wants, feelings, prejudices, habits, pursuits, objects, and hopes; and none will be able to weaken them by putting interest against interest, because they will form but one interest.

Nor will the masses be deficient in that power which knowledge gives; for their ranks will gradually be filled by men who will previously have been manufacturing or agricultural engineers—by men of some science. Those who shall be born paupers, will acquire information from the multitudes that will be continually joining their class, and from tradition. Even now, we may observe, that in the pursuit of knowledge, the operative classes are gaining upon the distributive class; and if this is the natural consequence of our advance in civilisation, as doubtless it is, we may hope that when the period of which I am now treating shall have arrived—when all shall have time for cultivating their minds—the pauper masses will be nearly, if not quite, upon a level, in point of intelligence, with the rate-payers.

Moreover, as the paupers will form so vast a majority, their class will possess a far greater number of men of genius and talent, than that of the rate-payers. Hence, I think, we may fairly conclude that the pauper masses will possess the greatest moral, as well as the greatest physical power.

The pauper interest will then have become the dominant interest. It will be pauper ascendancy all over the world! They will be the law-makers—and all law-makers legislate to suit themselves—at least they have always done so hitherto; so that "reform" will sweep away all the laws which the rate-payers had previously framed for the purpose of keeping down the rate, and the dominant interest will frame others for the purpose of keeping it as high as possible.

Myriads of popular leaders will point out the insufficiency of the poor-rate; millions of paupers will clamour for a more liberal supply of the world's wealth; and the rate-payers will no longer possess the power of resisting their demands. We cannot suppose that the pauper masses will be content with a small increase of revenue; a dominant power never spares the weak; man never voluntarily upholds the interests of others at the expense of his own. Gradually, as the mass shall discover their supremacy, they will increase their revenue by compelling the government to raise the poor-rate. The holders of wealth will see their danger, and will struggle to prevent the rate from rising so high as to swallow up the whole of their revenues; but they must sink, for their supremacy will have passed away, and the pauper will pay no more attention to their wishes than their class now pays to the wishes of the pauper.

Some rather Jack Cadeish legislation is hinted at here; but again interest will correct the abuses of power; for the masses, by the gradual disappearance of the capitalists—first the smaller, and then the larger—come to perceive that, with property now become their own, or common, it is wisdom to adopt the best management; and so—

The same principles that now induce the landowner to employ farmers or tenants in the cultivation of his estate, will induce the masses to permit those who may be inclined to pay the highest rent or rate, to farm the land and the machinery. The natural course of events will fix the number of the factors that will be required for the administration of property; for, by raising the rate to a certain height, the pauper masses may reduce the number of their factors as much as necessary; and it will be the interest of none to throw a portion of the land out of cultivation, and to bring part of the machinery to a stand, by raising the rate too high.

And now, everything being pushed to the extremity, and in the most perfect state attainable in this limited globe of ours, the sole remaining duty is to keep it so. Meat, corn, spirits, tobacco, wine, tea, coffee, everything that men have been accustomed to consider as necessities and luxuries, and as the stimulus to exertion and industry, have been renounced; clothing and bedding have disappeared, and all naked mankind having become, by living on the one root, with pure water ad libitum, healthy, handsome, and beautiful; are living en masse, for the sake of economy. No private families—no separate tables—none of the sacred firesides of our antiquated world—no household gods.

The people will continue to live together in large masses, and every mass will be settled in a fine climate, dwell in an immense public building, feed at public tables, and hold all things in common.

When the pauper masses shall first become the dominant interest, and shall begin to feel their power, of course they will begin to clamour for a more liberal supply of the luxuries and comforts of life. If we place ourselves in their situation, we may, perhaps, foresee some of the demands they will make upon the rate-payers. Each mass will demand that the privilege of electing its officers and representatives, shall be granted to it; that it shall be well fed and well lodged, and that it shall be supplied with sumptuous temples, libraries, baths, theatres, pleasure-grounds, and every other luxury that a public leader shall be able to demand and the rate-payers to supply.

But though the position of the masses will be very good, even while they shall continue, in some measure, under the control of the rate-payers, it will soon become much better when they shall have thoroughly established their supremacy; for they will then be the sole proprietors of all the fruits the earth will yield, and all the raw material the world will contain. They will possess, moreover, a machinery that will be capable of turning all this wealth into any forms they may please.

Although it would be impossible for us, in our present state of civilisation, to form a true conception of the nature or greatness of the wealth with which the masses will be surrounded, I think we may form a faint notion of it.

The population must continue to be divided into masses, because if all the people should dwell together, they could not walk across their halls in a day, or penetrate sufficiently far into their pleasure-grounds to get out of the crowd: consequently, a great number of palaces will be required. As the population will be immense, of course, there will be a vast number of men of genius and taste: these leading spirits will induce every mass to convert its wealth into the noblest and most useful forms. For the sites of their habitations, the masses will be able to select the fairest and the most salubrious spots in the world. In building their houses, and forming their pleasure-grounds, moreover, they will be able to employ a steam-machinery of boundless manufacturing power, and all the marbles, the rich metals, and the precious stones, the earth will contain. The gold which they will be enabled by their machinery to rend from the bowels of the earth, will be so abundant that they will be able to make all their household utensils of it; and they will have sufficient glass to make the interior of their houses as brilliant as the eye could bear.

Few cooking utensils will suffice. If any of the seed of John Bull or his son Jonathan, then remain upon the face of the earth, we prophesy, that there will be grumbling men, though there should be attached to every palace, which they inhabit, a theatre for dramatic representations.

No need of knives and forks, wine-glasses and tea-cups, pipes and ale-glasses!

But to maintain society at this pitch—to ensure to it even the root diet and the water beverage—the population must be kept down by prohibiting marriage to all below a certain age. The author mentions that he has not time at present to calculate what this age may be, but he imagines it to be late in life. Legislation may prevent marriage, but what, we ask, shall prevent children from being born in this new Utopia, any more than in the present meat-eating, wine-drinking, clothes-wearing, sinful, and most imperfect world?—Our author sagaciously concludes that the

Married and the old will be desirous of fixing the age for marriage at as late a period in life as possible; but as the unmarried and the young will prefer “married blessedness” to feasting, of course they will take advantage of the power which they will derive from their superiority in number and energy, to fix it at as early a period as possible.

The lateness of the age for marrying, will have a great effect on the health, formation, and beauty of the human frame.

A great number of our most severe diseases are hereditary: gout, madness, epilepsy, scrofula, and many other diseases, descend from parent to child, through many generations; and thus every man is more or less tainted with a constitutional predisposition to disease. But the lateness of the marriages will gradually deliver the human race from this heavy curse; for most of these diseases carry off the majority of their victims at an earlier period in life than the age at which the people will be permitted to marry.

This is all very well, if no children are born out of wedlock. But what becomes of the enormous fees which, some pages back, were promised to the physicians of the future world, when disease shall disappear from the earth, and men die only by accident or of old age? However, periah the physician and the fee! and let man resume his former perfection of form, and walk abroad in naked majesty in “his natural form and colour.” Whether that colour be black, white, or brown, we are not told. Time will show.

We shall conclude with the final speculations of this ingenious dreamer of dreams which no one can gainsay, as they do not admit of reasoning; and who, we believe, must be, after all, an honest and benevolent enthusiast, and no grave joker, uttering absurdities with a solemn face, to divert himself with public credulity.

Men are now induced to exert their mental powers by the desire of supplying their physical wants; hunger, thirst, cold, and heat, compel us to labour for bread, lodging, and clothing. When the period of which I am treating shall have arrived, such motives will no longer influence mankind; for all will then be supported by the machinery. But men will still have other and nobler motives of action: the desire of power, fame, distinction, an immortal name, will still prompt the human race to exert the superior faculties of the soul. All men covet the respect and applause of their fellow creatures. At present, the mass seek riches because they know that riches confer personal distinction, and command the respect of the world; but when all wealth shall be held in common, and no man shall have the power of becoming richer than his neighbour, this road to distinction will be closed, and men must then employ other means to obtain consideration: Literature, the arts and sciences, the administration of public affairs, the pulpit, the stage, and the rostrum, will be the only paths to distinction. The same motives that now prompt men to exert their energies in the pursuit of wealth, will then prompt them to join in the intellectual race. Every man thirsts for distinction: every man will have time for study, and all will have the means of entering upon some intellectual pursuit.

Of course, we cannot have the faintest idea of the greatness which the human mind will attain when the world shall be fully peopled, and when the energies and intellect of the whole population shall be concentrated on the obstacles which impede the advance of knowledge—when men shall have the same motives for seeking knowledge, which they now have for seeking superior wealth.

I shall take it for granted, that there will be as great a number of men of genius, in proportion to the amount of the population, as at any period since the world was created. If, therefore, the earth should be capable of supporting three hundred thousand millions of people, every generation will have a greater number of men of genius than the whole period that has elapsed, from the Creation to the present day, has produced: a thousand generations will produce more than a thousand times as many men of genius as the world has yet seen.

The world, as yet has produced but one man that could write as Shakspeare wrote; but when every year shall produce as many men of genius as the whole of the period which has passed since the Creation, every century may, perhaps, produce its Shakspeare. A thousand of such centuries will produce a thousand of such poets; and of these poets, one will be the greatest, and, by excelling the greatest poet that time has yet produced, will raise the standard of poetic excellence.

Even this supreme poet may sink into oblivion; for, should the world continue to exist a hundred thousand times one thousand [years]—and, doubtless, the world was not created as the toy of an hour—beyond his time, a thousand names will arise, to rival his.

Nor will poets be the only men whose fame will be eclipsed by fame of the great of posterity. Genius has already produced a hundred great works: when every year shall produce as many men of genius as the world has yet possessed, every year will produce its hundred great works; and a thousand of such years will produce a hundred thousand of such works. Consequently, should the people utterly neglect the literature of their day, and devote all their attention to these great works, they will not have time to read more than a fifth part of them. Five times as much will have been written by men of genius, on every subject of interest, as the population will be able to read; and consequently, four-fifths of this literature must sink into oblivion, with the names of its authors.

When a thousand Newtons shall have appeared, a few only of the greatest of them will be remembered: men will not charge their memories with the names of all. Painters and sculptors will share a similar fate.

The position of the people will enable them to advance with rapid strides in mental greatness. A concentrated population is always more enlightened than a scattered population: the soldier is generally a more intelligent being than the clown. Men unconsciously imbibe the intelligence and knowledge with which they are surrounded: the English peasant who has never entered a school, is too much enlightened to believe in witchcraft, or to worship stocks and stones. The splendid literature, the noble works of art, and the social advantages which all will enjoy, will enable the people at large to attain greater intellectual power, than the most enlightened men of the present day can hope to acquire.

But the moral improvement of the people will be the greatest advantage they will derive from their position.

As there are no distinctions of rank or wealth in the workhouse, the paupers, at the period at which they will become the dominant power, will have been living for many preceding centuries on terms of perfect equality.

Distinctions of rank and wealth, at a certain period, must cease. Nor is it likely they will ever be revived; for no class will possess superior wealth, and when all shall be equal in point of wealth, all will be equal in rank: men are not in the habit of bestowing fine titles on their equals in power and fortune—of writing “wine” on empty bottles. Aristocratical pride and superciliousness, and plebeian servility, envy and uncharitableness, will depart with distinctions of rank and wealth. Men will meet on a footing of equality, and society will be freed from the barriers which now separate men into castes, and prevent all freedom of social intercourse.

As men will have but few private interests, most of the baser passions will be greatly modified. Avarice will cease to pollute the soul; for as none will be able to hold private property, there will be no food for this hideous passion. Cheating, overreaching, shuffling, lying, fawning, covetousness, and a hundred other vices, will disappear with their parent, avarice; and men will wonder how their forefathers could be so base as to indulge in them. Criminal codes will scarcely be necessary; for no man will be able to rob his neighbour, and all will stand in so much awe of the opinion of their mass, that none will dare to commit a mean or dishonourable act. Personal character alone will command respect, or obtain distinction; and consequently, men will have the same motives for seeking to acquire and to maintain a fair and estimable character, which they now have for seeking to acquire wealth: men thirst for gold, only because wealth confers distinction; they will then covet a fair name, because character alone will then confer distinction and command respect. All, moreover, will be sufficiently enlightened to perceive the truth of the Christian religion; none will be so barbarous and ignorant as to prefer the absurdities of idolatry to the only religion that is fit for reasonable beings.

There is certainly in this fair promise of the world, when the different orders of men shall have fairly changed places, until all are equal and all happy, much to compensate for short commons, living en masse, and being placed under the law against marriage, instead of, as at present, under the Poor Law and the prudential check.

CHAPTER I.

THE following papers lay claim only to the properties of a sketch; the subject itself is inexhaustible, and the present chapter a few sheets. The purpose which the author had in view was to illustrate certain propositions, and he has confined himself to this, perhaps with more strictness than was absolutely necessary.

There is a sentence in the beautiful treatise by Sir Philip Sidney—“the Defence of Poesy”—which has been often quoted, and which, by a singular inaptitude, Bishop Percy made his motto on the collection of “Ancient English Poetry.” The sentence is the following:—“Certainly I must confesse mine own barbarousnesse, I never heard the old song of Percie and Douglas that I found not my heart moved more than with a trumpet: and yet 'tis sung but by some blind crowder, with no rougher voice than rude stile; which being so evill appparelled in the dust and cobwebbe of that uncivill age, what would it work, trimmed in the gorgeous eloquence of Pindare?” Now, it is clear enough that it would have ceased to work at all, had it been so trimmed: it would have lost all similarity, either in power or otherwise, to the sound of a trumpet, to an old English ear. But this, and other fallacies of the same family, have never ceased to pass current, and almost every person has some particular style or class that they make a rule whereby to approve or reject all poetry. Poetry has been continually subjected to definitions, and precedents have cramped criticism. The present day, indeed, has freed itself from the arbitrary divisions of poetry into epic, lyric, &c.: but still it is liable to petty and false tribunals, in the more important matters of “proper sphere,” “power,” and “capability:” and it is with reference to these, its essential qualities, that definitions are most objectionable. In its obvious character it is easily described, as in the dictionary, “metrical composition,” or as in the following pages: but, in essence, it is indescribable; a subtle spirit as wonderful as life, and, like life, only to be known through its agents. It is much easier to tell what is not poetry than what is: there is nothing less poetic than to define poetry.

But all that the author feels it necessary to do in these prefatory remarks, is to acknowledge the restricted nature of his sketches, and to state the reason why it is so. Having done this, he will merely add a passage from the courtly writer already quoted. “For the question is, whether the famed image of poesie, or the regular instruction of philosophy, hath the more force in teaching: wherein, if the philosophers have more rightly shewed themselves philosophers, than the poets have attained to the high toppe of their profession (as, in truth, mediocribus esse poetis, non Dii, non homines, non concessore columnæ,) it is (I say again) not the fault of the art, but that by few men that art can be accomplished. The poet is indeed the right popular philosopher.”

It may, perhaps, be possible to divide men into two grand classes; those who teach, on the one hand—and those who are taught, on the other; those who create, who think for themselves, who walk privileged and restless, ever working and opening wider loopholes into the sphere of thought—and those who recognise nothing but what is presented to them, who sit contented with rest and admiration of their superiors, adding only to the history of the world.
